Motions.

Introduction of bills.

THE DEPARTMENT OF MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS ACT

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Department of Municipal Affairs Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Speaker, a short explanation: This Act contains two amendments; one is to authorize the licensing of municipal assessors by the department, and the other is to provide that where property is vested in the municipality under the tax arrears legislation the clerk of the municipality can on behalf of the municipality insure the property and make necessary repairs to maintain it. At the present time there is a hiatus for a period of 30 days in which nothing can be done by the municipality.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): I wonder if the hon. Minister would permit a question in regard to the first Act? Is the licensing of municipal assessors about to become mandatory, or is it just something the department is working towards?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: We are working towards that end at the present time. This amendment is to authorize the department to license assessors, although we are not in a position to begin with this immediately. However, it is a step in the right direction, I maintain.

THE LOCAL IMPROVEMENT ACT

Hon. Mr. Spooner moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Local Improvement Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Speaker, this amendment is to elucidate upon the use of the word "published." It was recently held that publication in a newspaper that had general circulation but that was not published in the municipality was not sufficient notice since the definition required publication in the municipality or in an adjacent or neighbouring municipality. This is to correct this small deficiency in the Act.

THE PUBLIC UTILITIES ACT

Hon. Mr. Spooner moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Public Utilities Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of these amendments is to provide the municipal corporation with power to pass by-laws to regulate the supply and to prohibit wrongful use of water. Other sections are for the purpose of increasing the penalty for wilful damage and causing injury to public utility works.

THE TRUSTEE ACT

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Trustee Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, this is a very simple and short Act. It simply provides that trustees may invest in the securities, the bonds and debentures of the World Bank in addition to those others for which it now has authority.

THE PROCEEDINGS AGAINST THE CROWN ACT, 1962-1963

Hon. Mr. Wishart moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Proceedings against the Crown Act, 1962-1963.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, in explanation of the intent and purpose of this bill, it is to provide first of all for some notice to be given where a claim is being made against the Crown in order that there may be some investigation and possibility of a settlement being reached. This is necessary because the Crown in all its departments and in all its works is spread wide geographically as well as in an administrative sense.

This Act also provides the names and indicates the persons who may be examined for discovery in a department of the government and the type of certificate or affidavit which shall be furnished on production where discovery is required.

THE CORONERS ACT

Hon. Mr. Wishart moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Coroners Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, to give the House an explanation of the purpose and intent of this bill, I think I should say that considerable study has been going forward with respect to The Coroners Act and coroners' procedures generally. This is now before the law reform commission out of which may come a different procedure or rewriting of the Act, that remains to be seen. This Act simply defines certain additional powers, or limits or extends certain powers, with respect to the supervising coroner and other procedures with respect to the holding of coroners' inquests.

PRIVATE INVESTIGATORS AND SECURITY GUARDS

Hon. Mr. Wishart moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to regulate private investigators and security guards.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, we have on our statute books at the moment The Private Investigators Act. This Act picks up the provisions of that Act, with some amendments and enlargements, and now includes security guards with provisions for their licensing, registration and certain provisions as to the control of their activities.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to ask the hon. Attorney General if he will refer Frederick Fawcett to a panel of outstanding psychiatrists from outside the country for examination and report.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, the answer to the question as it is framed must be no.

I would add that on two occasions the Supreme Court of Ontario has found Frederick Fawcett's detention valid. On each of these occasions, Fawcett was examined by very competent psychiatrists and was given every opportunity to adduce all evidence he or his counsel deemed necessary or advisable. He has been examined by at least eight psychiatrists, of whom five were of the opinion that Fawcett is mentally ill. I sincerely believe that these psychiatrists are as competent as any to be found anywhere.

I assure the hon. member that there is no desire to keep this man in custody any longer than necessary, consistent with the protection of the public. He will be examined from time to time by competent psychiatrists and he will be released as soon as it is possible to do so.

If Mr. Fawcett or his advisors are dissatisfied with his treatment or detention they may, of course, at any time apply to the courts for relief as they have done on two occasions before.

Mr. Bryden: There is a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

May I ask the hon. Attorney General how many of the five psychiatrists whose reports were unfavourable to Fawcett are employed by the government of Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I cannot answer that at the moment. I could get the answer. Possibly three!

Does the hon. member imply that they do not give an honest opinion?

Mr. Bryden: I am implying no such thing, Mr. Speaker, but I think it is relevant information. They are all working for the same employer and therefore may have a tendency to back each other up.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I reiterate, Mr. Speaker, that the policy with respect to any person detained in a mental institution is not to keep him there. The goal is to have him released as soon as possible, as soon as he is fit. Those psychiatrists would not be so inclined, I am sure, because they believed it was government policy to keep him there.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Grey South): I listened to my hon. friend on a television programme last night and I understood him to say that it was his feeling that if Fawcett dispossessed himself of the farm, the psychiatrists who had said that Fawcett was insane would then in all probability change their minds and say that he was not insane. Is that my hon. friend's present feeling on this?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, I think I can clarify this for the benefit of the hon. member. The question was put to me by the persons who were interviewing me as to whether the sale of Fawcett's farm would resolve this situation. Of course, I could not answer that and did not answer that. It was their proposal.

I did say that Mr. Justice Spence, at the hearing which he had in 1962 as to the mental capacity or mental state of Fawcett, found on the evidence of the majority of psychiatrists that the paranoia—this man has been found to be a paranoiac—and that the paranoia was concerned and related to the geographical area of his farm and that apart from that he might be very normal through his other walks of life. This is, I understand, quite a common thing in a paranoid situation.

Mr. Bryden: Outstanding psychiatrists say it is nonsense. Better men than—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Just allow me to say what Mr. Justice Spence found.

Then I was asked, "Would the sale of the farm relieve the situation?" I distinctly recall saying, "I can't and I don't propose to direct and I do not think anybody would want me or the department or any government to direct, that he must sell his farm." Perhaps this might clear up the situation, over which psychiatrists say his paranoia exists.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to the hon. Minister of Public Welfare (Mr. Cecile). I presume he has received a copy of the question.

Does the hon. Minister of Public Welfare intend to order an inquiry into the administration of Castle Home, the home for the aged at North Bay? Before he answers the question, I might point out that the chairman of the Castle Home board welcomes the inquiry.

Hon. L. P. Cecile (Minister of Public Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question of the hon. member I would say that upon the request of the board of management for an inquiry I will be pleased to send a representative immediately from our homes for the aged branch, for that purpose. So far I have no request from anyone.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, to pick up on the previous topic, I would like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond).

In view of the Frederick Fawcett case, would the hon. Minister consider amending section 45 of The Mental Hospitals Act to provide statutory basis for his special committee of three, made up of Mr. Justice C. Stewart, Dr. W. E. Boothroyd and Dr. Elliot Markson, to examine patients where grounds for discharge are in dispute?

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the hon. member's question is "no." It would not be in order for The Department of Health to pass legislation that would interfere with the functions of the courts. In this particular case, the decision that the patient is mentally ill and dangerous to be at large has been made by the court, and I do not feel that we are in a position to raise this question again at the present time.

Mr. S. Lewis: May I then direct a question to the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree)?

Has the Ontario human rights commission studied the Frederick Fawcett case to determine whether there has been any violation of the Ontario human rights code or the Canadian bill of rights?

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the Ontario human rights commission has not received any form of complaint in connection with the case of Mr. Frederick Fawcett. From our information, it would appear that this case does not fall within the jurisdiction of the Ontario human rights code, which applies only to discrimination in employment, housing, public accommodation and public notices based on race, colour, creed, nationality, ancestry or place of origin.

The responsibility for dealing with violations of the Canadian bill of rights rests entirely with the federal authorities, and for the information of the House, I would note this, that before either authority can officially study a case to determine if a violation exists, a formal complaint must be registered under either the Ontario human rights code or the Canadian bill of rights.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, I would now like to direct a question—I think it is in three parts—to the hon. Minister of Health.

First, did Frederick Fawcett return to his farm for a period of more than a week at any time while an inmate of an Ontario hospital? If so, when did this occur, and for how long? And were any untoward results observed during or after, which could be attributed to the fact that he had returned to his farm?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, through you, may I ask that hon. members, when referring to persons confined to Ontario hospitals, refer to them as patients and not as inmates.

The answer to the hon. member's question is that Mr. Fawcett failed to return from an authorized weekend leave on July 24, 1964. The Ontario provincial police and the Metropolitan Toronto police were advised. An effort was made by the hospital staff to have his family persuade him to return. When this was unsuccessful, the provincial police were asked to apprehend him. He returned to the Ontario hospital, Toronto, by himself on August 16, 1964. Mentally and physically he was approximately the same as when he left the hospital. No untoward incidents during his period of absence were reported to us.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary) begs leave to present to the House:

The report of the Minister of Public Works, province of Ontario, for the year ending March 31, 1964.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might direct a question to the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) in regard to this Fred Fawcett case?

In view of all the far-ranging ramifications of it, and since it hinges on many departments, would the hon. Prime Minister himself consider intervening to give special consideration to this? It would seem to me that it is in the interest of the government that this should be done. The government may think it is on strong ground but an overwhelming proportion of the population of the province does not think so, and the issue is going to get publicity. It would seem to me to be in the government's interest to want to resolve it. Would the hon. Prime Minister consider this?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I noticed the series of questions that were asked today and I assume there was some pattern behind them. As far as I, personally, am concerned, I want to know all about it and I have so asked. I think the answers given to the questions asked are satisfactory—I have heard them all over the last three or four days. However, I want to make it very clear that as the hon. Attorney General has said, today there is no interest for this government, nor I believe any government, in keeping a man incarcerated in any place if he does not need to be there, and it seemed to me as I listened to these questions in this House that we are calling into question the judgment of psychiatrists.

Mr. Bryden: There are psychiatrists of all sorts.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: However, in my own interests, I really want to know what this is about and I have asked for a complete report on the whole case.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

THE ONTARIO HUMAN RIGHTS CODE, 1961-1962

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour) moves second reading of Bill No. 30, An Act to amend The Ontario Human Rights Code, 1961-1962.

Mr. L. A. Braithwaite (Etobicoke): Mr. Speaker, during the debate on the Speech from the Throne, I brought to the attention of the government certain areas where our party felt the Ontario human rights code could be strengthened. This bill takes some of my remarks into consideration, but in the view of this party, it does not go nearly far enough.

I need not tell this House how important the matter of human rights is to all citizens of Ontario. This being so, I cannot understand why the government does not remove, once and for all, various areas and loopholes in our society, which allow discrimination in any form to exist.

It would seem to me, and I believe I speak for the large proportion of this House, that when one considers human rights and human dignity there is nothing more important. So far as this party is concerned, Mr. Speaker, we have the distinct impression that this government is using the Ontario human rights code as a political football, a play-thing.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether this government is not milking this code for all that it can? Every time that an improvement is made, a mighty press release is sent out and the government takes credit for being progressive. This could go on for years. Meanwhile, some citizens continue to be deprived of their rights.

This is not right! As long as one citizen is so deprived we say, Mr. Speaker, that the code should be perfected at once and for all time.

As an example of what I have said, I draw the attention of this House to section 3 of the code, as it stands and I quote:

No person, directly or indirectly, alone or with another, by himself or by the interposition of another shall:

(a) deny to any person or class of persons occupancy of any apartment in any building that contains more than six self-contained dwelling units;

(b) discriminate against any person or class of persons with respect to any term or condition of occupancy of any apartment in any building that contains more than six self-contained dwelling units;

because of his race, creed, colour, nationality, ancestry or place of origin of such person or class of persons.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you will note that the number six is used. By clause 3 of the Act as proposed, six has been reduced to three. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if next year it will be reduced to two? And how about the year 1967?

We want it reduced to one self-contained unit now. We want the code perfected!

Now let us look at the present section 4, subsection 4-b of the code. We feel that this subsection of the code should be amended so that the distinction between public and private institutions can no longer be in doubt insofar as discrimination in employment is concerned.

Continuing with the field of employment, section 4, subsection 4-c of the code as it stands states as follows:

This section does not apply to any employer who employs fewer than five employees.

One wonders why the number of employees is set at five. Why not three, or two or none?

Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Party does not, and never has, taken the point of view that discrimination should be legislated out of existence by number or by progression. We firmly believe that the Ontario human rights code should be tightened up now so that prejudice and discrimination can be eradicated once and for all from Ontario.

However, since this bill is an improvement of the existing legislation, we will support it.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I feel it is accurate to state that this is a bill the original principle of which everybody in the province has supported for years. It is also a bill the original principle of which, as the hon. member who has just taken his seat has indicated, this government has proclaimed. Indeed, I believe a previous Prime Minister said it was the legislation he regarded as his proudest legislative achievement.

I think in one respect, Mr. Speaker, it is accurate to say that our record in the province of Ontario and our record in Canada in this field, relatively speaking, is a good one. Indeed as far back as 1792, years ahead of Great Britain, years ahead of that civil war in the United States, the Legislature of Upper Canada, the province of Ontario, passed the first anti-slavery bill. But I think, Mr. Speaker, we have now moved into a stage in world history when the conscience of mankind has been aroused to a point in which any continued affront to individual rights and human dignity, and half measures which because the other half is ignored in effect legalizes discrimination, has become intolerable.

I was interested in the historical context that I have spelled out here, to go back and read a magnificent speech, so magnificent, indeed, that the publication put out by our human rights commission printed it in total a year or so ago. It was a speech of George Brown, delivered to the Toronto anti-slavery association on March 24, 1852, 113 years ago, almost to the date.

Mr. Speaker, just to get this principle enunciated in terms which I think are eternal—they do not change—and also for the interest of the hon. members of this House, in light of events that have taken place in recent weeks, where a number of Canadians have seen fit to participate in these events, so that the fruits of that victory a hundred years ago might be reaped instead of withering on the vine, as they have throughout those hundred years, I would just like to quote a portion of that speech by George Brown. It is almost as relevant today as it was back at that time. He said this:

The first time I ever entered an American church was in the city of New York, a Presbyterian church. A friend who was with me went into one pew and I entered another. Immediately I noticed several persons staring at him in a particular manner; and at last a gentleman rose, went to one of the office bearers, whispered and pointed to my friend. The second gentleman left his pew, went to my friend and more politely conducted him to another seat.

Both of us attributed the circumstance at first to courtesy, but we soon learned that he had gotten into the black pew, in which no white man should be degraded to worship his Maker. The thing is too common to be denied. Also, at the sacrament table, the black Christian must sit apart from his white brother worm.

The question is often put: What have we in Canada to do with American slavery? We have everything to do with it. It is a question of humanity, and no man has a right to refuse his aid whatever it may be in ameliorating the woes of his fellow man. It is a question of Christianity, and no Christian can have a pure conscience who hesitates to lift his voice against a system which, under the sanction of the Christian altar, sets at defiance every principle of Christianity.

We have to do with it on the score of self-protection; the leprosy of the atrocious system affects all around it. It leavens the thoughts, the feelings, the institutions of the people who touch it. It is a barrier to the spread of liberal principles.

Who can talk gravely of liberty and equality in the state, while slavery exists? Every intelligent American who professes to be a Christian and upholds slavery is committed to a glaring infidelity which must lead him continually astray in trying to square with it his everyday conduct.

We are alongside this great evil. Our people mingle with it. We are affected by it now and every day enhances the evil.

But how shall we proceed? What shall we do? Speak against it! Write against it! Agitate against it! And when you get a hold of a Yankee, drive it home to him.

Tell him his country is disgraced, wound his pride! Tell him his pure institutions are a great sham, send him home thoroughly ashamed of the black spot on his country's escutcheon.

In steamboat or railroad, or wherever you are, hunt up a Yankee and speak to him faithfully. There is no other man so sensitive as to what other people think of him. You will find strange arguments to meet, but every man of them will be "as much opposed to slavery in the abstract as you."

It's a great evil, they will say, but what is to be done with it? Tell them that slavery is not an evil, but a sin.

Here, the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond), with his rich Presbyterian background, will agree that George Brown was getting back to original sin here. "This is not just an evil, it is a sin," he said.

A breach of every commandment in the Decalogue, and that there is no choice but immediate emancipation.

Tell them there was once a tea tax attempted to be imposed on them, and there was no word of "what's to be done" then. They flung the tea into the Boston harbour, and they must send slavery after it.

They will say with the deepest sympathy that "the poor creatures could not take care of themselves," but you can tell them that we have 30,000 of them in Canada, that they all seem to get along and that the men whom the colonizations wish to make missionaries to the heathen may be safely left to find for themselves food and clothing. They will presently get angry, and assert that but for the violence of the abolitionists, slavery would have been done away with long ago, but you can tell them that the cry of every despot since the world began has been, "Oh, these pests that turn the world upside down."

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, in the wake of events of the last week or two, indeed in the wake of events that are taking place today in that historic march from Selma to the capital of Alabama, and of the protests of Canadians in this country, no more than a few hundred yards from here, at the American consulate we hear the same arguments used today as George Brown suggested would have to be contended with in 1852.

I think this underlines the validity of the contention that has been advanced by the hon. member for Etobicoke in regard to our reaction in this House to this piece of legislation. For example, when the government first brought in a bill with regard to a law forbidding discrimination, against those seeking accommodation, they did not make it apply to six units or less. We, for example, in trying to lead this government to perfection, suggested three. This was voted down.

I think the time has come, Mr. Speaker, to cease playing with any figure—let us look at the principle. We cannot continue to prate about human rights and at the same time wink at the violation of human rights. More important, as a Legislature we have gone too far in proclaiming our beliefs and our determination to have them translated into action, to pass legislation which is a half measure and which in effect legalizes discrimination. That is what this amendment to the human rights code proposes to do.

That this government should initiate such a bill makes a mockery of its high-sounding proclamations down through the years, and now the very fact that the government should introduce such a bill reveals a disturbing willingness on its part to make exceptions, to tolerate qualifications on what has been presented by it as an article of faith.

I want to suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the principle is very clear. If it is a self-contained unit, then there should be no discrimination at all in the renting of that property. We concede that if a dwelling unit is not self-contained—in other words, if it is without separate entrance and without separate facilities—an owner has the right to decide, in effect, with whom he is going to share his home. This is his basic right. But if there is a separate entrance and if there are separate facilities, then he does not have the right to discriminate against those who may seek to rent that property because he does not happen to like their race or their colour or their creed.

Quite apart from the principle, I want to draw attention to two other factors which seem to me to bolster the argument that the principle itself should be upheld. I want to suggest that what the government is proposing, for example, is both unreasonable and a piece of political folly. It is unreasonable for this reason, Mr. Speaker: If a man goes out and builds, for example, half a dozen separate cottages or half a dozen separate buildings, he will not have the right to discriminate in deciding to whom he is going to rent those buildings. If for whatever reason—financial, the amount of space available, or whatever—he decides that he is going to put these buildings under the same roof, he is going to have the right to discriminate up to six on the basis of the Act we have had, and now the government is going to say “up to three.” I suggest that there is no rhyme nor reason to this kind of thinking.

I also want to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is political folly, and why politicians should be indulging in political folly is always a bit mystifying to me. I suggest it is political folly for this reason, that those who support the principle, and really mean it, are going to be opposed to this bill, because it is a half measure and in effect it legalizes discrimination. But those who do not support the principle underlying the human rights code—and tragically there are many in our population still who do not—are not going to be influenced and persuaded because the government reduces the figure from six to three.

They were opposed to it when it was at six; they are going to be opposed to it when it is at three. They think they should have the right to discriminate under any circumstances. Unfortunately, nobody is going to change the thinking of these people immediately by any Act of the Legislature. Their thinking is poisoned by the virus of racial discrimination which is tearing the American nation apart, which is plaguing the world with problems that compound the problems it already has, and indeed is creating some problems here in our own country. So the government is going to end up by pleasing nobody. Those who are in favour of the principle will not like the bill because the principle is violated; those who are opposed to the principle will not like it because the government is playing with the principle, as the hon. member for Etobicoke said.

Therefore we want to urge the government strongly that it reconsider the legislation that it has, and there will be opportunities to assist it in reconsidering it when we get to the committee stage. But at the moment, if the government really believes in this principle, I think it is about time that it acted in accordance with its proclamations, and it has not done so with the amendment it has brought before this House.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to add a few remarks in this debate and to say that we here agree with what has been said by the last two previous speakers. For too long now, our governments have been taking very mincing steps in this problem of treating everyone as an equal. I think that the governments in the western world today, and particularly the government of Ontario, are behind public opinion. It is becoming more and more obvious—judging by the public response that we have seen as to what has been going on down in the state of Alabama—that the people of Ontario and the people of Canada want to see to it that this business of preaching that we are all equal is put into practice. So often when we read the constitutions of some countries we find they have fancy words but they are not put into practice. If western civilization is to survive, and if we, as a free and democratic society, are going to be respected, we are going to have to show that we not only preach the principles of freedom, but we carry them out in our laws.

It is most unfortunate that we of the western world seem to have lost the drive that we once had. Seventy-five years ago, as people from Great Britain and people from the US were going around the world, it was the thing to do to be a part of what the US and Great Britain were doing. But today there is much more opposition to us, simply because we seem to have lost that drive that attracts. We have found out that the western world has a lot of money. We can go out and we can spend it, and yet at the same time it does not win us friends. It is the drive to have ideals and principles that will attract the nations of the world to us and to what we want to do.

Let us bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that we of the white race—of the more-or-less more fortunate people at the present time—are a minority in the world, and that the other races of the world are on the march and they are going to hold us accountable for not only what we have done in the past, but what we are doing today. So I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that this legislation, although it is a step forward, is not good enough and the time has come to treat an individual as an individual, as a person, and not according to what his creed is, or to what his colour is, or to when his ancestor arrived on the boat.

I would like to move an amendment, seconded by Mr. Newman.

Mr. J. B. Trotter moves, seconded by Mr. B. Newman, that section 2 of Bill No. 30 be amended to read as follows:

(a) deny to any person or class of persons occupancy of any commercial unit or any apartment in any building.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, may I ask your ruling? This, as I understand it, is completely out of order on second reading.

Mr. Speaker: I might say to the member that he can move an amendment to the sections in committee stage, but not on second reading.

Mr. Trotter: Very well, I will do that at that time and then we will move the amendment.

But I just want to emphasize this again: Can I not question that ruling, Mr. Speaker? This is a principle of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that you are moving an amendment to a section of the bill?

Mr. Trotter: Yes, but it contains the principle of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Quite true. If you move an amendment to a section, naturally it would be relevant to the whole bill; but I would suggest the place to do it would be in the committee of the whole House.

Mr. Trotter: I can see your technical question, but bear in mind that section 2 really is the centre of the principle of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: I will consult the Clerk on the matter.

Yes, I understand that you cannot move an amendment to the bill during the motion for second reading.

Mr. Trotter: Although we feel that the bill does not go far enough, Mr. Speaker, if it is your ruling we will naturally abide by it. We will probably have the opportunity to change the section.

We can say of the government that it is a step forward, but it is so difficult to understand why the government over the years takes these mincing steps. It is either a good principle or it is a bad principle; and certainly, I am sure everyone in this House, agrees that it is a good principle to judge an individual as a person.

So for this moment, and for this particular principle, I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that we on this side of the House will support the bill on principle as it is, but regret most deeply that more has not been done.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary and Minister of Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, reference has been made in this House to the fact that a former Prime Minister of Ontario, the Hon. Leslie M. Frost, made a point of stating that of his long career in this Legislature what he was perhaps most proud of was his record in this field.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Frost could say that justifiably and deservedly so. Indeed, as a private member and subsequently as a member of the government I take exactly the same position. There is nothing I have supported as a private citizen; as a private member; as a member of Mr. Frost's government, and presently as a member of the present administration, that has given me so much pride in having had the privilege of participation in than bringing these things to pass.

The present hon. Minister of Labour during the course of his tenure of office has brought in legislation of a wide and encompassing nature covering the many aspects within the field of labour-management relationships, workmen's compensation, safety and the like. When the time comes, in the long and distant future, for him to reminisce I think that these amendments which he will have the honour of introducing in this Legislature will stand out in his mind and be long remembered by him.

Mention has been made of the place of this administration in the enactments that have been made in the past. If one were to stop and consider the reasons why this administration has had the affairs of this province in its hands during that period of years, I would think that its record within this field is probably one of the outstanding reasons.

The hon. member for York South has pointed out the fact that this province of Ontario, as early as in 1793, in the first Legislature that ever met, took steps in this direction. Amongst my Canadiana collection I count as a special item the statutes of that day, and it was purchased by me primarily because it contains that legislation.

The years went by and this administration, in the early 1940s took a look at it, as a result of which we in this province were set on a new course in human relationships. In 1944, four years ahead of the United Nations' declaration of human rights, this Legislature took its first major step in "An Act to prevent the publication of discriminatory matter referring to race or creed."

Hon. members of this House will have heard me refer in the past to matters coming within my department and other departments as being the best in Canada, on the continent, and in some instances in the world. Hon. members of the Opposition have not liked to listen to this description.

In this field, not only have we been amongst the best, this administration has invariably been in the forefront, going back to 1944 when this new series began. Here I refer to the Labour Gazette of February, 1961, which reviewed all the legislation within this field throughout Canada. So that it will not be my opinion, my word in this regard, I should like to quote from this edition. I commend all of it to hon. members of the House. I quote:

In 1944, Ontario enacted The Racial Discrimination Act, making it an offence to display or publish any notice, sign, symbol or other representation expressing religious or racial discrimination.

The introduction to that sentence was:

A major development during the decade was the enactment of legislation designed to eliminate discriminatory practices in respect of employment and public accommodation.

This is the first of a series within this province. Then I quote again:

The movement for positive government action against discrimination in employment began in 1951 when Ontario enacted The Fair Employment Practices Act which provided that race, creed, colour, nationality, ancestry or place of origin must not be determining factors in the hiring, firing, promotion or conditions of work.

Mr. Speaker, that Act—although I was not a member of the House I was a supporter of the party—was of significance to me because in the year 1937 I was fired from a job only because of my name. I was engaged one day, and 24 hours later I was discharged because within the 24-hour period my employment card had passed before the works manager and he decided on that name alone to discharge me. Fortunately, the then president of the Steel Company of Canada, Mr. Hilton, was of a different mind and I was re-employed in a different works, at a better job and a higher salary.

So when I saw that this administration in 1951 had placed, in April of that year, an Act which had within it a preamble—now preambles are not popular with the legislative counsel, at least I am told that, but this had a preamble and I should like to read it:

Whereas it is contrary to public policy in Ontario to discriminate against men and women in respect of their employment because of race, creed, colour, nationality, ancestry or place of origin; whereas it is desirable to enact a measure designed to promote observance of this principle; and whereas to do so is in accord with the universal declaration of human rights as proclaimed by the United Nations.

You will see, Mr. Speaker, that now the province of Ontario, which had taken steps four years prior to the United Nations Declaration was now participating in upholding it.

I return to the Labour Gazette, and I would refer to the fact that on page 142 of that edition, the following words appear:

Ontario passed the first Fair Accommodation Practices Act in 1954.

So it was in 1954, as a private member and a supporter of the government of the day, that I was enabled for the first time to participate in the enactment of legislation which was the first of its kind and, indeed, it is that Act which in a way is related to what we are doing this afternoon.

Then in 1958 The Ontario Anti-Discrimination Commission Act was passed, and was amended in 1961. So also was the present section to which the hon. members of the House have referred this afternoon, An Act to amend The Fair Accommodation Practices Act. All of these were first in their field.

I agree with the hon. member for Etobicoke that perfection is something for which men and women should continuously strive. Within our community were men and women in 1944, and indeed earlier, who could have come to this Legislature and have said: "Gentlemen, these are the things that should be done." It would not take those individuals 20 years to bring to the attention of the members those things in human relationships which should be attended to. Yet it is our way in a democracy that there is a continuous process of evolution. We could not have attained the perfection in 1944; we cannot attain perfection in the year 1965—

Mr. MacDonald: Therefore let us postpone it. Why?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: —and I dare say that we cannot attain perfection the field of human relationships in 1985.

Mr. MacDonald: That is an excuse and procrastination. Try it.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: We can try, and we are trying. The record of this administration is all on the books and it has been the best of its kind at the time, and the first of its kind.

Several hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: And in 1962 there came the period when this Legislature saw fit to codify all this legislation into the "Ontario Code of Human Rights," and to provide for its administration. That Act encompassed what had been done in the past. We saw fit at that time, and rightly so, to make available to the people of the province of Ontario this document which I have in my hand and which can hang in their homes, in their schools, in their churches and gathering places. I say that this document—The Ontario human rights code over the signature of the hon. Prime Minister, John P. Robarts—is a document that can rightfully take a place of honour in the home or the establishment of any individual.

The Toronto Telegram during that time—March, 1961—in referring to the proposed codification, referred to it as being "logical and commendable." But then it went on to say: "But this should be no cause for resting on laurels."

So, as we approach a decade with the experience of the past, we are now, I suggest to the hon. members of this House, we are embarked on a new series of legislative enactments which to all of us can be and will be a source of pride through the years ahead. We will not have done everything that is possible, but just as the concern of every single man who is hungry, is the concern of this Legislature so long as he exists, so, too, it will be the concern of this Legislature so long as there is one man or one woman against whom an unfair prejudice exists. It must, of necessity, be of concern to the hon. members of this House. At no time, neither in 1945 nor 1965, nor 1985 nor 2005, in the development of the relations of human beings will there ever be a cause for complacency, or time to stop and rest on one's laurels, because this is one of the most challenging things that can be placed before men and women.

I referred to the fact that I was fired because of my name. It did not stop there. When I went to article as a graduate of the University of Toronto law faculty in one of the law firms downtown, the senior member; the partner, in a tone as kind and as gentle as he could make it sound, indicated to me that they would be delighted to have me a member of the firm if I changed my name. I decided not to. Fortunately, down the very hall in the same building, I went into a firm just as large, where there was no hesitation and no questions asked, and I became an articulated student. It may be that those situations still exist today.

I can say that it was during this last 20 years, the term of office in which the administration of provincial affairs have been in the hands of the Progressive-Conservative Party; that this legislation came into being. This is no time for political partisanship, it is true. The hon. member for Etobicoke tells us where the Liberal Party stands. I have indicated to him not where the Progressive-Conservative Party stands; I have indicated where it has stood and where it has taken action. If anything deserved the commendation, not only of the people of the province of Ontario but of the other provinces, that such an administration was in power to lead the way, it is this one and I think there is a debt of gratitude owed by men and women, citizens all across Canada, that there was a Progressive-Conservative administration in power in the province of Ontario that spelled out the public policy that now exists today.

This policy is in the preamble of the Ontario human rights code, and the preamble today is no longer related to any specific activity as was the preamble written in 1951 which was related to the field of employment. The preamble today states—and this is where the Progressive-Conservative administration of this province stands, under the leadership of John Robarts—

It is public policy in Ontario that every person is free and equal in dignity and right without regard to race, creed, colour, nationality, ancestry, or place of origin.

Mr. MacDonald: Except those who live in two-unit buildings.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Wentworth East.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Chairman, in rising to make some brief remarks in relation to the principle of this bill, I must say that I do so with some sense of shame. I recall that about 1959, or maybe late 1960, I introduced a bill to bring about exactly what section 2 of this bill now asks for. I say that I rise to oppose the principle of this bill, because it places restrictions and has a discriminatory flavour.

I am opposed to discrimination in any sense. When I introduced the bill, asking for the same provisions provided in clause 2, in 1959 I did so reluctantly. I discussed the problem with the civil rights committee of the Toronto and district labour council, a dedicated and progressive group, and they also were reluctant to recommend that kind of a measure at that time. They felt we should ask for the removal of any restrictions in regard to public accommodation, but they said we have to look at it logically and in a practical way. They said our experience with this government is not such that we will have any success whatsoever, and so we should move slowly in keeping with the type of government we are dealing with. I reluctantly accepted that kind of a proposition and introduced the bill to bring about what clause 2 now provides.

I have grown up a little bit more in the past few years, and I think it is a shame that we have to be dealing with the principle of a bill that does provide discrimination in regard to accommodation. I therefore have to vote against this bill on second reading.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Scarborough West.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be brief, and I have but three points to make.

First, we in the New Democratic Party feel that there is an untenable irony between section 1 of this bill as presently constituted, of this amendment, and section 2. Indeed there is an even more dramatic irony as indicated by the hon. Provincial Secretary when he suggested that the preamble excludes no categories of persons in any area. At one point, back in 1951, there was such a specific designation. In 1965, in the preamble to the Ontario human rights code, there is no such exclusion.

May I point out that in section 1 of the bill, no person directly or indirectly, alone or with another, by himself or by the interposition of another shall—and I will move to sub-section (b)—discriminate against any person or class of persons with respect to the accommodation, services, or facilities available because of the race, creed, colour, nationality, and so on.

Section 2 then, in juxtaposition to section 1, says that in fact such discrimination will be countenanced by the government, where it relates to dwellings with three self-contained units.

That is our first term of opposition, Mr. Speaker.

One second is that we cannot accept the Liberal Party rationale. Although we understand and appreciate the dilemma that these things evolve gradually, we cannot accept the rationale that it is valid to legalize discrimination where three such units are involved, but invalid to accept it where six such units are involved. It may be right to make the amendment when we are in committee but we will have to oppose, as a party, the principle.

The third factor I should like to suggest is that the entire current of history in this field on the North American continent is presently irresistible. When the hon. Provincial Secretary talks about perfection, he is not relating his words to the administration of highways or safety construction or municipal regions. He is relating his remarks to a delicate, sensitive and paramount field of human relations. Although we may not be able to enunciate the perfection and to enforce it in a legal sense, it is right and just that it should be embodied in the statutes of this province.

Dean Rostow of the law school at Yale has written, and I should like to read this into the record:

Men often say that one cannot legislate morality. I should say that we legislate hardly anything else. All movements of law reform seek to carry out certain social judgments as to what is fair and just in the conduct of society.

Mr. Speaker, we in this party feel that it is fair and just in the conduct of this society that we unequivocally reject legalized discrimination in relation to three self-contained dwelling units in this bill and would therefore oppose the principle on second reading. If that is defeated, we will of course then support an amendment in committee of the whole.

Mr. D. A. Paterson (Essex South): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate on second reading I, like the other hon. members of our party, am somewhat reluctant to proceed and support this bill. I am sure that when the hon. member for Parkdale submits an amendment to this that I and the hon. members of my party in the Opposition will give this our wholehearted support, and I trust that other hon. members of the House will do likewise.

I feel that I must take part in this debate, as to the best of my knowledge I have been the only member to date so far to have spoken on behalf of the rural ridings. I believe I represent the most cosmopolitan rural riding in the province of Ontario. As I stated in this House last year, these are among the finest people in the world.

The second point concerning my riding that I would like to draw to the attention of this House is that Essex South, the Windsor border area, was the first point of entry for those escaping to British soil to seek freedom. I certainly feel that I, as a member from this area, must do everything within my power to see that there is no discrimination of any sort within our province.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a couple of remarks in respect to this bill. As we look back over the long history of a human race there has been much lip service paid to the phrases of freedom and equality. I think the long struggle of man has been the struggle toward achieving freedom from various types of discrimination, from various types of tyranny and to achieve equality man with man across the nation and across the world.

That struggle has been carried on in large measure by the people who have been discriminated against, even in those areas where lip service was paid. Here today we listen to the hon. Provincial Secretary talk about the long period of 20 years over which certain achievements have been made. So, he said, we are doing this thing gradually; and we hear this time after time in this House and elsewhere, this philosophy of gradualism.

Well certainly we perhaps never achieve everything we want at once, and so the philosophy of gradualism has some validity. But in this case we are close to achievement. It is a matter of a very few more steps. And those few halting steps could be taken at once, in this one step, if this House so felt.

So I say to this government and to this House: Since the government is proud of the steps it has taken, proud of the achievement it has made over these years, then, today take that final step to abolish discrimination. Wipe out the stamp of approval which this bill gives to discrimination of this kind, and get that step made before it finds itself out of office in the not-too-distant future. Then it will have completed this job of which it says it is extremely proud.

Today, in the south, part of this struggle is seen between Selma and Montgomery, where human beings are demanding certain fundamental rights in that land, rights which have been given here as far as the vote is concerned—but rights which we are still holding as not quite valid in the legislation here before us.

Mr. Speaker, I say to this House today that we are enunciating in this bill a principle which is wrong. This bill is admitting that discrimination should exist in this respect. It is wrong, and this House should wipe out that wrong today as we vote on this second reading.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments concerning the bill, coming as I do from the city that was the original gateway to freedom in North America. I join with my colleague, the hon. member for Essex South, in expressing a real sense of disappointment when this government still insists that discrimination is all right as long as it involves only three people, or three families.

At the proper time, Mr. Speaker, we of the Liberal Party will have our amendment to the bill expressing exactly how we feel the Act should be changed. Mr. Speaker, I only wish that the hon. member for Windsor-Sandwich (Mr. Thrasher) could be in here with us so that we in Essex county could express a united front in opposition to the bill as presented. We will vote for the bill, but when the time comes we will have an amendment to it.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Speaker, this is a very important matter. It deals with an area of society with which we are all concerned.

I am interested in the comments of eight previous speakers who made no reference whatever on behalf of the Opposition to other sections of the bill, nor apparently have they studied the bill. If they have read it, they do not seem to understand the implications of those sections. But in any event, the fact is that they have not discussed the bill in this debate in its full import.

I would like to point out to the House that this human rights code has been on our books for some three years. It was a strengthening and consolidation of all the human rights legislation which was then on our statute books. As a matter of fact, the code itself was intended to create, across this province and in the hearts of the people of this province, some leadership, and a climate of understanding and mutual respect in which and through which all segments of our population would have an equal opportunity to develop their potentialities and live full and rewarding lives. It was against that broad concept that these various pieces of legislation were consolidated.

Of course, when the code was first presented to the House it enjoyed the active support of all parties and all members, because they were anxious to follow the leadership which this government was giving in this field of human rights.

Time goes on, but may I first say this, that the essence of the legislation in this province never pretended to be anything but a progressive, continuing type of thing. And this is what it is. Now, looking at the situation, three years later the government and I, as the Minister responsible for the code and its operation, advanced these other amendments, which I suggest in all seriousness that hon. members must agree are advances in this field of dealing with human rights.

Listening to the Opposition, one would think that this government had never seen the human rights code before, but it was this government which introduced the legislation in its first instance. More than that, this is the only province in this country which has a full-time staff devoted exclusively to dealing with matters pertaining to human rights, their impact and their effect on people.

Mr. MacDonald: It was years after the Saskatchewan bill of rights, years after.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Not at all.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): They do not have one yet.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The functions of any other human rights legislation in any other province is a part-time function assigned to persons who have other primary functions.

In this province, our human right commission operates with a full-time staff, and with respect to that, of course, we will have an opportunity when our estimates come up of seeing the appropriations which are asked for in that connection.

Of course, I must be frank to point out that I am amazed at the statements of the Opposition, considering that despite the length and duration of tenure of office of the Liberal government in Ottawa, it remained for the Conservative government to take the lead during the few years it was in power in Ottawa. Let us not forget that.

Mr. MacDonald: They were living down their reputation of discrimination against orientals.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Let us not forget that Canadian bill of rights.

The success, and I say this advisedly, of the operation by our human rights commission of the human rights code in this province, has been due in no small measure to the fact that its aims have won the approval and support of the people throughout this province. With this experience behind us, we now wish to take further steps to make the code a more effective legal instrument for the protection of human dignity. We are asking for the prohibition of discrimination in connection with the occupancy of dwelling units as defined in the proposed amendment. I point this out in connection with the occupancy of any commercial unit, that discrimination will be unlawful.

It has always been the policy of this government that its own employment practices should follow the spirit of the code. No mention of this was made by any of the Opposition speakers.

Mr. MacDonald: Has the hon. Minister read the brief?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The amendments now placed before the House will formalize this policy beyond any question, making the code apply specifically to the Crown, subject to the requirements of The Public Officers Act. Thus the Crown will be placed in the same position in regard to the hiring of an employee as any private employer.

Now in making these various proposals, a number of factors were taken into account. This proposed legislation did not just happen. The case load of the human rights commission was analyzed in order to pinpoint problem areas. Human rights legislation in six other provinces was analyzed and studied and these amendments will solidify, and I repeat will solidify, Ontario's present leadership in the field.

Mr. Gisborn: I thought there was no other legislation!

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Careful study was also made of the legislative provisions of 26 human rights commissions in the United States. I say without reservation, or hesitation, that Ontario's code compares most favourably with any legislation on this continent.

Finally, before concluding on what amendments would be included in this bill, I received the viewpoints of a major community deputation consisting of representatives of religious, community welfare, ethnic and labour organizations whose recommendations have been considered carefully with respect to this matter.

Mr. Speaker, in asking the House to support the amendments to this bill, I ask the House to lend their support to this second reading and to join with us in maintaining not only effective but leading legislation in all aspects with respect to human rights in this province.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Does the member wish to ask a question?

Mr. Thompson: The hon. Minister has the right to reply to me after—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: This is not the practice, Mr. Speaker, with respect to second readings.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Why not? He can speak. He has not spoken yet. What practice are you setting up?

Mr. J. H. White (London South): It is not the practice.

Mr. Speaker: Does the member wish to speak to the motion?

Mr. Thompson: I really want to refute, sir, some of the remarks made by the hon. Minister of Labour.

Mr. Speaker: I have stated that the member can speak on the principle of the bill.

Mr. Thompson: That is what the hon. Minister of Labour was speaking on.

Mr. Speaker: Proceed, within the realm of speaking on the principle!

Mr. Singer: This is just as much on the principle as was the hon. Minister of Labour.

Mr. Thompson: Well, sir, I am taking it that because the hon. Minister of Labour was not ruled out of order that therefore he must have been speaking on the principle. In some of the remarks that he made he inferred, for example, that when the human rights code was brought in, when it was first introduced, that the Opposition had got on the bandwagon with the government.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I did not say the bandwagon. I said the hon. members opposite had supported the introduction of the code.

Mr. Thompson: My party and I consider this a very fundamental aspect—in connection with the number of units in the housing accommodation. We felt at that time that the government could have been more bold, more daring, more imaginative. We said so in the House and we opposed the government on this.

But we have learned, sir, that we have to take the small crumbs as the government moves along, because they are timid in this area; they are nervous and they are frightened. They stick one toe into the water and then withdraw.

I would say to you, sir—

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Would the hon. leader of the Opposition permit a question?

Mr. Thompson: I do not think so, after all I did not get a chance for a question.

We still feel that the government could have gone further than this. We like the principle in connection with this but we feel that it should be a broad coverage instead of just moving—and I understand the government is moving slowly—on three units. They are suggesting that perhaps families or others would want to have their relatives in; that is the argument that was raised when this was introduced previously. I could not see any validity in that argument and I still—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I have not heard that argument.

Mr. Thompson: It did come up and if the hon. Minister looks through the debates in the past this was one of the arguments raised.

So again, we will support the principle of this but we realize it is just a crumb. We are still hoping that in another two years the government will come in and follow through by having that amendment wiped out.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the motion carry?

As many as are in favour of the bill, please say "aye."

As many as are opposed, will please say "nay."

In my opinion, the "ayes" have it.

Call in the members.

Clerk of the House: Mr. Speaker, the ayes are 82, the nays 7.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

LABOUR DISPUTES IN HOSPITALS

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves second reading of Bill No. 41, An Act to provide for the settlement by arbitration of labour disputes in hospitals.

Mr. Braithwaite: Mr. Speaker, my party intends to support this bill, but with a great deal of reservation. I can say, Mr. Speaker, that this decision was arrived at only after a great deal of soul searching, as we are fully aware of the ramifications of our decision.

We realize, Mr. Speaker, the importance of the fundamental right of labour to strike. We are also very worried, Mr. Speaker, as to the possibility that this bill might be a dangerous precedent. And we are worried, Mr. Speaker, that if it is hospitals this time; where will it stop—what will it be the next time?

The reason for our concern is that there seems to be, on the part of the government, a feeling that the rights of labour are not to be worried about. In other words, Mr. Speaker, we detect a point of view on the part of the government which we feel cannot be trusted.

In support of that I would quote from an article which appeared in the Toronto Daily Star on March 4, 1965. I quote from the words of Stanley Little, president of the Canadian union of public employees:

Now he said he was just stunned. He said he was outraged that the Premier, John Robarts, broke a promise made in a letter last December, that interested parties would be consulted before legislation was introduced.

Mr. Speaker, that is one reason why this party is a little worried about what the government has in mind.

I would quote also from the Daily Star, Thursday, January 30, 1964. This article is headed: "Accuses Unnamed Official." "Ontario Forced Two Pacts on Us—Hospital Union."

Apparently James Gray, president of Toronto local 101 of Canadian union of operating engineers, was appearing before the Bennett commission in connection with this whole question of hospital union disputes. At the time, Mr. Gray, in his brief, stated as follows, and I quote from the article:

As soon as the proposed strike was announced, a prominent government official called the union representative into his office and told him in no uncertain terms there would not be a strike at the hospital and to go and make a settlement. This, plus other pressures, forced a settlement of the terms proposed by management.

In a second case referred to by Mr. Gray, he says:

Shortly after negotiations started for the renewal of an agreement, management made an offer, adopted an intractable position and refused to discuss the matter further. When advised the union would proceed to arbitration, the hospital replied that it did not care, because if we threatened to go on strike the government would step in and impose binding arbitration, just as it threatened to do at another hospital.

Mr. Speaker, if what this article says is true, then there is indeed cause on the part of labour and on the part of the citizens of Ontario to have fear as to just what this government has in mind. For those reasons, I say that the support of this party is conditional in connection with this legislation. This support, I want it made quite clear, is for this instance and for this instance only. Our support is based solely on the premise or principle that crippling strikes cannot be tolerated in the normal hospital, and I emphasize the word "normal." We, as legislators, Mr. Speaker, have a duty to see that they do not happen.

In the Liberal Party we believe that the good of the Ontario public stands supreme; that is the only reason that this party gives its conditional support to this bill.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I have a few comments to make on the bill and some amendments that my party would ask the hon. Minister to consider seriously. First, we consider some of the powers given to the Minister by the bill to be extraordinary, to say the least. Paragraph eight of the bill says:

If in the opinion of the Minister—

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the member is getting into clauses of the bill now, which would be more appropriately discussed in the committee stage.

Mr. Braithwaite: Mr. Speaker, I went to great lengths to state that the support of this bill by our party was conditional, and what I have to say here I believe is quite important. It goes to why we feel that conditional support is all that we can offer at this time, and the reasons why. These are the amendments that I am proposing, Mr. Speaker—it is not a formal amendment, these are just things that we want to bring to the attention of the hon. Minister at this time so that he can see why we have fears as to the bill as it stands, as to the principle of the bill.

As I was saying, paragraph eight of the bill says:

If, in the opinion of the Minister, a member of a board of arbitration has failed to enter on his duties so as to enable it to render a decision within a reasonable time after its establishment, the Minister may appoint a member in his place after consulting the party whose point of view was represented by such person.

Paragraph nine says:

If the chairman of a board of arbitration is—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Speaker, I must object to this. The principle of the bill is, are we going to have compulsory arbitration with respect to hospital disputes or not—not the question of section nine or 14 or this or that that the hon. member is arguing. That is committee-stage debate. I am asking this House for the approval or otherwise of the principle of compulsory arbitration with respect to hospital disputes.

Mr. Braithwaite: Mr. Speaker, I am saying only that there are certain reasons why the principle of compulsory arbitration cannot be supported in all cases by this party. Further I am going on to say why there are certain areas—and to show the hon. Minister where these certain areas are—where we feel that compulsory arbitration should not be applied by this government. If that is not the principle of the bill, Mr. Speaker, then I will have to stop now.

Mr. Speaker: Proceed.

Mr. Braithwaite: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, paragraph nine says:

If the chairman of a board of arbitration is unable to enter on or to carry on his duties so as to enable it to render a decision within a reasonable time after its establishment, the Minister may appoint a person to act as chairman in his place.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, we feel that the Minister can pack the board at will. It is apparently his privilege to decide what a reasonable length of time is, and if such a reasonable length of time is exceeded, he can, if he wishes, replace one, two or all three members of the board with his own nominees. This is more than a little high-handed at the best of times, but it is especially so in light of the fact that in almost all cases the government is an interested party.

Mr. Speaker, in conciliation proceedings specific periods of time for the conciliation process are spelled out. In the arbitration process the Minister's rather terrifying powers as mentioned previously could at least be controlled if the bill were amended to specify a period of time which must elapse without agreement before the Minister is empowered to start packing the arbitration board. We suggest an amendment, therefore, which would establish such a hands-off period in which the Minister could not change membership of the board. Such a period of time should, of course, be reasonable. But the definition of reasonable should not be left at the Minister's discretion.

This bill is intended to cover disputes between hospitals and their employees, but it is generally considered that the Ontario hospital services commission is in a position to dictate to the hospitals the pay and benefits they can offer their employees. Since the OHSC is a creature of the government, it follows that the government—The Department of Health—is a vitally interested party financially in labour disputes in hospitals. This being so, it can be argued that if compulsory arbitration is to be introduced, a truly disinterested third party must be found.

In the light of the foregoing, it is clear that the Minister of Labour is not such a third party. Therefore, the government should introduce an amendment or series of amendments to provide for the appointment of a totally independent third party—perhaps citizens appointed with security of tenure, or perhaps some sort of appointment from the bench or from a pool of capable, independent persons.

Mr. Speaker, I have said that the Liberal Party is not in favour of strikes within hospitals but the question then arises, are all hospitals the same? The hon. Minister has decided that interruption of services by strike or lockout at all hospitals is equally against the public interest. This just is not so. Interruption of service in a convalescent hospital ordinarily is not a serious matter for either the patient or the community, merely a minor inconvenience. Even in a general hospital, the shutdown of one wing or department is likely to be a lot less serious than that of another. Therefore, there are grounds here for amendment which would impose compulsory arbitration only on specific kinds of hospitals and leave other kinds alone.

It is worth noting that this is the tenor of the majority recommendations of the Bennett commission. They would impose compulsory arbitration only when patient care is adversely affected or seriously threatened; but the hon. Minister explicitly rejected this recommendation in his statement on the introduction of the bill. I quote:

I am driven to the conclusion that any strike or lockout in a hospital endangers patient care.

Is this the same government whose Minister of Labour during the discussion of his 1963 estimates said:

It is of the greatest importance that we preserve freedom of negotiations in a free enterprise system which involves and includes the legal recognition of bargaining rights, and care must be taken with respect to legislation which might infringe on this principle.

Were these but empty words, Mr. Speaker? One can only wonder as this bill is examined and discussed. We feel that the hon. Minister has gone too far with the bill as proposed. Certain possible amendments have been suggested. The hon. Minister would do well to give them his earnest consideration.

Those are the reasons, Mr. Speaker, why this party supports, but conditionally, the bill as outlined by the hon. Minister.

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Speaker, the New Democratic Party will strongly oppose the principle of compulsory arbitration in the case of disputes between hospital employees and the management.

When we deal with reports of select committees, Royal commissions, public inquiries, or what-have-you, usually the report will be dealt with in several ways, or sometimes they might be shelved and no action is taken whatsoever.

Sometimes they are debated in the House as a report, and then put away unless the government feels that they should bring in some legislation in relation to the particular inquiry and based on the report. Sometimes the Opposition will ask for a particular report to be brought forward and action be taken upon it.

This report is a good report, Mr. Speaker, but it is a good report in opposition to compulsory arbitration in the case of disputes between hospital employees and the management of the hospitals. Almost 100 per cent of the presentations made to the committee were opposed to compulsory arbitration, and I, for the life of me, cannot understand how the hon. Minister of Labour of this province can bring in such a bill with such intent, such an important bill, based on the report of the Royal commission headed by His Honour Judge Bennett.

I would first point out, Mr. Speaker, that—and I believe I counted correctly previously in reading the report—there were something like 15 presentations made by organizations. Part of the report says this:

As set out in Part II, the following individuals, associations and bodies opposed basically compulsory arbitration; recognizing that such legislation applicable to hospitals only might be necessary, in order to ensure that hospital services might be maintained.

The Ontario hospital association, Canadian manufacturers association, Canadian union of operating engineers, local 102 and 107, Essex health association board, Professor Arthurs and Professor Triscoll, board of trade, Metropolitan Toronto, Canadian union of operating engineers, Hotel Dieu hospital, Windsor, and St. Catharines general hospital were among those which expressed this view; I know that there were other organizations making representations which were unalterably opposed to compulsory arbitration in any case. The report goes on:

And the following advocated compulsory arbitration at hospitals in some form or other: The building services employees union, Mr. R. G. Geddes, the Ontario labour relations subsection, Canadian Bar association and Mr. Robert H. Miles.

I will deal with three of these, Mr. Speaker.

The building services employees union do not support compulsory arbitration in disputes between hospital employees and the boards or the administration. At their regional conference last fall they were almost unanimous in opposing compulsory arbitration.

Mr. R. Geddes: I would say that of course he would be in favour of compulsory arbitration and conciliation because he is a professional chairman of those boards and, in my opinion, it would assure him of a job for as much time as he could find to put into this in this way.

With regard to Mr. Robert H. Miles: I am doubtful about his reasons. I am sure that we will be discussing his reasons for compulsory arbitration in this House at a later date. He is a registered male nurse and, of course, we know that the Ontario registered nurses association are asking for legislation that will carry with it compulsory arbitration in regards to nursing in the province.

So the report, in almost its entirety, in reading these submissions by the various groups, is opposed to compulsory arbitration, because the learned people who have been dealing with collective bargaining in their particular areas are convinced that compulsory arbitration will not do what the hon. Minister is attempting to do with this particular bill.

Now I would point, Mr. Speaker, to the dissenting opinion of the one member of the board and I think that it carries some reasoning as to why we should oppose compulsory arbitration.

I will just quote one paragraph in the dissenting opinion:

The recommendations would limit the use of compulsory arbitration to only two kinds of circumstances: (1) where the well-being of patients is to be affected; and (2) where one party to the dispute or both have breached The Labour Relations Act by failing to negotiate in good faith. Not only will it be difficult to contemplate any situation involving a strike or lockout in the case of a hospital where the well-being of a patient would not be in danger; in practice, however, this provision would mean that wherever a strike is called and management is able to operate the hospital with non-union personnel, notwithstanding the fact that the new help may be inexperienced and is being trained at public expense, with funds provided by the Ontario hospital services commission. Patient care may be curtailed, life may even be in danger; management can still claim that patient care is not seriously affected by the strike and there is no need for compulsory arbitration. Management will then be in a position to continue to break the strike and defeat the union. On the other hand, if the union should succeed in calling an effective strike, the government would immediately come to the rescue of management, force the union to call off the strike and invoke compulsory arbitration.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that paragraph I have just quoted deals with the recommendation of the committee itself and this is why I say I cannot understand how the hon. Minister was able to introduce a bill calling for compulsory arbitration when nothing in the report supports it—even the recommendation of the commission itself.

In the case of the commission's recommendation, when it refers to the fact that one party or the other had not bargained in good faith, to my knowledge that section of The Labour Relations Act has never been tested to its fulfilment. I cannot recall any case where management or union have been convicted of failure to bargain in good faith under that particular section. I cannot see at this point, until that section of the Act is defined, where it ever will be tested to its fulfilment or how anyone knows just what that particular section means.

The paragraph I read points out the failure of the other supposition that the commission itself makes—that compulsory arbitration be permitted only where the danger of the patients would be involved.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that a lot of things could take place in this field that would rectify some of the problems faced by the employees in hospitals involved in collective bargaining disputes, rather than compulsory arbitration. Certainly there have been complaints for years of the restrictions placed on employees under The Hospital Services Insurance Commission Act—such as that they cannot bargain freely for fringe benefits or for the amount of money that they might be entitled to because of the grant structure and so on. I think a real look could be taken at that first, and some adjustments made before we go into compulsory arbitration.

I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that we should make second-class citizens out of hospital employees, because this is what they will become if compulsory arbitration is permitted in hospital disputes. They are a class of people now who are working for what we would term substandard wages and conditions, and certainly if compulsory arbitration is invoked in this province I cannot see any chance of them upgrading themselves on a par with some other employees in related industries. They have a long way to go and certainly this will restrict them.

There is no evidence through any representation made to the commission that there have been strikes in hospitals that have endangered the welfare of the patients. Not one representation was made. I am sure that representations have been made to the hon. Minister—and they were referred to in the report—that other countries such as Great Britain, which had compulsory arbitration some years ago, finally came to the point in stages that it was unnecessary and that it never proved anything, and they have now revoked the compulsory arbitration stage.

If we refer to Sweden, of course, where compulsory arbitration is still in use, representations set out the fact that in Sweden compulsory arbitration has been in effect for years and it has never been invoked, or only in one or two slight cases. But, of course, the advancement in the recognition of the trade union movement in Sweden has a lot to do with that kind of situation, and we have not that attitude in this province. This makes quite a difference when one starts talking about compulsory arbitration.

In Sweden, of course, they have had a yardstick for years. It has been related to other industries by people who have a lot of experience in the development of recognition of the trade union movement and proper wage scales and benefits.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that there is not a trade unionist in this province or in this country who would want to see a strike take place in a hospital which would endanger the lives or the well-being of patients in a hospital. But they feel the price is too dear to pay to support the idea of compulsory arbitration, and as all hon. members know, the organized trade union movement across this province and across Canada—and the free trade union movement across the world—are unalterably opposed to compulsory arbitration. They feel that in most of the countries there are enough restrictions on the development of a free trade union movement, and that this would be another toe in the door, and where does it go from here? I am sure if someone could point out, or if the report pointed out, that compulsory arbitration was going to rectify something or was going to better a situation, they would be in favour of compulsory arbitration to remove the fear of a strike in a hospital which would endanger patients.

But they will not support it because this has not been done. They feel that if we have a situation such as we had in Trenton and that if a dispute goes to the point of a strike deadline, it will have stirred up some public opinion. If the deadline is set and it is obvious there is going to be a strike, in the opinion of people interested, such as the trade union movement and the government, that would be the time for us to act. I would be the first one to vote in favour of a specific piece of legislation to avoid a strike in a hospital when it came to the point that nothing else could be done. As almost every other trade unionist would agree, if we adopt a compulsory type of legislation it then becomes the fixture, the mode, and it is going to let these people remain in a position of low wages and poor conditions, without anyone having a chance to know what is really going on.

Many have said in the trade union movement that where compulsory arbitration has been agreed on voluntarily, because of the understanding of the people on the board, they have come out of it with a better deal than they might have received without agreeing to compulsory arbitration. This might be so, and it is a good thing, but it is too high a price to pay to have blanket legislation that establishes compulsory arbitration, because that is exactly what it will be. It will destroy the semblance of collective bargaining, as has been said in the report by many of the people who deal with the employees across the bargaining table in hospital disputes. It will destroy an understanding that has grown up in this province, in the great majority of instances, and we will go back to the point where it will be a cut-and-dried affair and the employees will not get the recognition that they are supposed to get.

Mr. Speaker, we do oppose compulsory arbitration. There is nothing in the report to indicate that this bill is justified. There are no instances of actual happenings in this province that justified it, and I am sure that the trade union movement can grow and flourish in this province, and the hospital employees who need recognition and support can reach their proper place in fields of wages and conditions without compulsory arbitration. Certainly, I cannot understand with what right the hon. Minister of Labour brought in this bill. It indicates to me something I have felt for years—and I have said it before—that the government does not want to encourage the free trade union to grow, it does not really believe in free collective bargaining and it is going to do everything it can to let it be known at this point. We will vote against this measure, and we shall follow it from this point on.

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to enter the debate on the principle of this bill. The hon. member for Etobicoke implied that this government is not worried about the rights of labour. He also mentioned that this is an omen of bad things to come. We are told that we will get conditional support for this bill from the members of his party in this House. I would say, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member is unnecessarily worried. The record of this government in the field of labour legislation is well known.

An hon. member: It is terrible.

Mr. MacDonald: That it is.

Mr. Kerr: We have some of the most progressive legislation on this continent in our statutes, dealing with labour-management disputes.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Labour regrets the necessity for this bill. He certainly believes in free collective bargaining. I am sure the government is against the principle of compulsory arbitration per se. However, in dealing with hospital disputes, by the very nature of the institution, an exception must be made. Hospital facilities and services must be maintained.

There are one or two sections in Bill No. 41 which I will question in committee and it is possible that some minor amendments will be made. However, Mr. Speaker, the principle of compulsory arbitration in hospital disputes cannot be avoided. The machinery provided in this bill might well make strike action unnecessary in the settlement of disputes. There are exhaustive procedures and certainly any negotiations will be exhaustive. Government responsibility to encourage settlement I feel, will be even greater because of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I am personally against the principle of compulsory arbitration. I am sure that this bill is not the start of any trend or far-reaching policy for general compulsory arbitration.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Speaker, I rise to urge the government to withdraw this bill. The hon. member for Halton has just indicated that the hon. Minister of Labour regrets the introduction of the bill. He states that the record of this government in the field of labour relations is well known. It certainly is well known. This bill could only be introduced into this Legislature by a government which has a distorted perspective on labour-management relationships.

Mr. MacDonald: Hear, hear!

Mr. Renwick: I would like to spend a few moments pointing out the serious distortion which is involved in this particular bill.

The principle of this bill is to impose compulsory arbitration in hospital disputes. To understand the distortion and to place the bill in its proper perspective requires that each member of this Legislature cast his mind back to the precipitating events which led to the commission leading toward this bill.

Those events took place in late 1962 and throughout 1963 in the case of the Trenton memorial hospital dispute. The precipitating event which led to the Royal commission was the fact that the hospital board of the Trenton memorial hospital flouted the law of this province by refusing to negotiate in good faith with the union which had been recognized as the bargaining unit for that hospital by the Ontario labour relations board.

Mr. Speaker, this government did nothing whatsoever to enforce the law of this province which was flouted by that hospital board. The evidence of the flouting of the law is contained in the report of the conciliation board at the time that the report of that conciliation board was rendered.

One only need look at the situation of hospital services and the supply of employees in hospitals today to recognize that there is a severe shortage of qualified people who are prepared to enter into service in the hospitals of this province. That shortage is due to no other reason than the usual economic cause, namely, the poor working conditions and the poor wages which are paid in hospitals today.

We are now being asked in this Legislature to agree to compulsory arbitration of those disputes which will involve the trade unions, which are concerned in this area, in negotiating with the kinds of hospital boards which in most instances are exemplified by the hospital board of the Trenton memorial hospital. The result will simply be that this bill, from the point of view of the government, casts a grave aspersion on the sense of responsibility and the proper conduct of those trade unions, without in any way whatsoever criticizing or complaining of the action of hospital boards in other instances in this province. I think that this government should assert, and assert positively by withdrawing this bill, that they do not cast this kind of aspersion on responsible trade unions in this province.

These are the words of the hon. Minister of Labour himself a year ago last October in which he stated that:

Insofar as he was concerned Mr. Albert Hearn, the international vice-president of the building service employees international union, has at all times taken his responsibility seriously and at the same time has shown a frank recognition of the impact which a strike at the hospital would have.

Mr. Speaker, I note that in that statement the hon. Minister of Labour was not prepared to state that the Trenton memorial hospital board had shown the same sense of responsibility toward the requirements of its hospital.

What then did this government do in October of that year? It simply appointed a commission. It did not deal with the situation which existed at the Trenton memorial hospital but it permitted, by the appointment of a commission, it permitted that situation and allowed it to become aggravated to the point at which a strike occurred and went on for some several months. The only thing that the government did in that intervening period was to appoint this commission in anticipation, and I can only say this, in anticipation that by having an actual strike and by precipitating that strike, they would in some way rally public opinion to the principle that there should be no strikes in hospitals throughout this province.

There is no one in the New Democratic Party who would disagree with that principle and there is no one in any of the three unions which are principally concerned in this area who would disagree with that principle.

But, sir, we cannot have that kind of principle put forward today as a blanket form of legislation which is going to apply to each and every hospital across this province in an area which reflects adversely on the trade union movement throughout this province.

Yet at the same time we have just concluded the debate on a bill in which the government prides itself on the gradual and the piecemeal method by which it deals with the problem of human rights. On this occasion they suddenly come forward to place before us a blanket piece of legislation which is to deal with each and every hospital dispute in this province.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is very important that the unnamed party to all these arbitrations should be spoken of in this House, and that is the Ontario hospital services commission. Everyone in this House, Mr. Speaker, realizes that regardless of the format that is put forward in this bill for the settlement of disputes, the Ontario hospital services commission is going to be intimately involved in the negotiation of any settlements which are arrived at if this bill becomes law.

I think that the government should insist that the Ontario hospital services commission take its proper responsibility in the settlement of hospital disputes. The government should simply withdraw this bill and require that in place of hospital boards the Ontario hospital services commission would bargain as the employer in disputes related to hospital services and hospital maintenance, would bargain as employer with the trade unions involved and simply let the particular negotiations go forward in the tradition of collective bargaining. Then I think that if there were to occur in the province of Ontario isolated incidents which would require direct intervention by this Legislature, this party might very well be in a position to support it.

But this party cannot support legislation which is placed before us on a blanket basis to cast a reflection on the trade union movement when the party which was at fault and which precipitated this particular bill was the hospital board of the Trenton memorial hospital.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, with my colleague, the hon. member for Etobicoke, I share the concern that he expressed about the principle involved in this bill. But, quite frankly, I cannot bring myself as far as the hon. member for Wentworth East, when he says that the price is too dear to pay, and that it is more important that the right to strike be preserved even if the life of a patient in a hospital is in danger.

Mr. MacDonald: He did not say that at all; that is a gross misrepresentation.

Mr. Singer: There is ample time for anyone to correct what I heard. His phrase was, "the price is too dear to pay," and used in the context it was used, it could only mean that. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, there is anyone in the province of Ontario who would thank any member of this Legislature at all for preserving a very important right of labour if it endangered the life of even one person who was in our hospitals. Having said that, I think we must express our real concern about the method in which compulsory arbitration can be conducted or is likely to be conducted.

I do not share with the hon. member for Halton the satisfaction that he expressed about the government's good record insofar as labour legislation is concerned. I am not satisfied, as he is, that everything that has emanated from these halls, everything that is in the statute books concerning labour, is good or has been advanced in its thinking. But I do believe that this type of bill would have been much more palatable had the hon. Minister of Labour, when he introduced it, suggested a method whereby arbitrators would be selected. I think that we must begin to move in this province as other jurisdictions have done, notably the Scandinavian jurisdictions, to establish a method that will be accepted by labour and by management for peaceful settlement of labour disputes. But the government, while having paid lip service to this, and having taken this very serious step in this particular instance, has neglected to elaborate at all an idea of where and when and how we are going to find our arbitrators.

I would have hoped that the hon. Minister of Labour would have suggested that at the same time that this bill becomes law, the efforts of his departmental advisers would be turned to preparing a roster of arbitrators, and that he would have asked for the nominations of management and the nominations of labour as to who might be suitable as arbitrators. Having established such a list of arbitrators, I would have hoped that he would have said, "We are going to run a series of courses to train people who will be arbitrators," and that there would be a panel established in this province of compulsory arbitrators who would be reasonably acceptable to labour and to management, who the government would see were advised as to all the intricacies of our labour legislation, who would be given training courses about labour relations, and who would be instructed by and large in some of the problems that they might be expected to face. The government could then say, "We are providing a method whereby these very serious disputes can and should be settled."

I cannot share with the hon. members of the NDP their over-violent concern with the principle as it is in this bill as being a new principle, because we have had, in two statutes in this province for some considerable period of time, compulsory arbitration provisions. Policemen cannot strike; firemen cannot strike. Those provisions are in the statutes and they have worked reasonably well.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is a single person in the province of Ontario who would thank any member of this Legislature for preserving a right, as important as it might be, if there is the remotest chance that the life of one citizen of this province could be endangered.

We did have an unfortunate incident in Toronto just a few days ago involving one of the Toronto hospitals, where a threat was made by a group of employees, which if carried out, could well have endangered the lives of several persons. I think this particular incident arising as it did while this bill was before the Legislature, heightened for me the importance of the decision that has to be made here as this bill takes its way through the House.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I and my colleague, the hon. member for Etobicoke, and the rest of my hon. colleagues here in this party, not with any great feeling of exuberance, will support this bill, but we would believe that the hon. Minister of Labour could have laid the groundwork much better than he has done and could have established a system whereby arbitrators would be appointed, listed, acceptable, trained and available for the type of dispute that might arise in instances such as this. That being done, the hon. Minister could perhaps have convinced the labour unions and others in this province that it was taking a valid step and a seriously considered step toward solving the type of dispute that could endanger the health of individuals in the province of Ontario.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I know where this government stands and I disagree with it, and I shall state why before I sit down. It will not be very many minutes, because I just want to recap why I disagree with it. But for the life of me, I cannot figure out once again where the Liberal Party stands. It is in favour of protecting human rights, but it comes in and supports a bill that is going to legalize the violation of human rights. It is opposed to compulsory arbitration, but it is going to support a bill which is going to impose compulsory arbitration.

Mr. Thompson: The hon. member voted for the bill on human rights last session.

Mr. MacDonald: This is the kind of double talk it practises—being on both sides of the fence at the same time. One cannot be right and wrong at the same time.

Mr. Speaker, let me try to recap very briefly where we stand on this bill. We believe that the principles of free collective bargaining are important principles—basic to a democratic society. This government has professed to support this principle. In the submissions that came before the Bennett committee, with rare exceptions, labour and management expressed support for this government in its stand for free collective bargaining and opposed to compulsory arbitration. Yet in face of all that, as my hon. colleague from Wentworth East has just pointed out, the hon. Minister throws this all out the window and presents a bill which, I may say personally to the hon. Minister, I find as disappointing as any position I have ever seen this Minister take in this House.

We are faced with this legislation, as my hon. colleague from Riverdale has pointed out, because of an outgrowth of what happened in Trenton. What happened in Trenton was an utter, unmitigated shame. This Minister got himself into a position where two of his top civil servants asked the trade union in Trenton to hold off their strike and try once again to settle, while this government virtually went on hands and knees to a recalcitrant nineteenth-century management group—with no success.

But this hon. Minister was willing to let himself be put in a position in which he was double-crossed by the rest of the Cabinet. I am not blaming the hon. Minister, except that, as I said to him before and I will say it once again, that if I ever found myself in a position in which I gave my word of honour to two top respected civil servants, I would resign from the Cabinet before I would permit the Cabinet to double-cross me and sacrifice my honour in that fashion. This government was obviously determined it was going to drive toward the imposition of compulsory arbitration.

If there ever was a case of bargaining in bad faith, the Trenton memorial hospital management provided it. If this government ever wants to have a case about which there is just no argument, they will never get it again.

What did the government do? They did nothing, Mr. Speaker. This government did not have—and let me put it in as polite terms as I can—the intestinal fortitude to impose and to implement the law they had on the books.

Now what does the government do? Having refused to implement the law that was on the books, they are going to come in and violate a basic principle to which even they have hitherto paid lip service—the right of free collective bargaining.

They are going to impose compulsory arbitration across the board. I see my hon. friend from Downsview has gone out; he cannot get his thinking clear with regard to our stand but he will not stay to have somebody try to clear it—oh, the hon. member is under the gallery. Fine! I am glad he is over there.

They are going to impose a blanket of compulsory arbitration. Surely there is all the difference in the world between a blanket imposition of compulsory arbitration and a single imposition of compulsory arbitration, as indeed this hon. Minister promised before he was double-crossed by the rest of the Cabinet. Because his promise to the union was: Withdraw the strike action; go back and negotiate again, and I give you my word of honour—or words to that effect—that when the House meets, which was about four weeks later, I will bring in a bill to impose compulsory arbitration.

There is all the difference in the world between imposing compulsory arbitration in a specific case when you know you have got a recalcitrant management, or, indeed, on some occasions a recalcitrant union. I would like to see this case come up some time when a union would violate the law of the province as flagrantly as management did in this instance: And this government would not move? Oh, they would move with vigour then! This is where we find out where the bias is.

Mr. Speaker, we are opposed to the imposition of the principle of compulsory arbitration in this blanket fashion.

Now, let me finish on this note. Do not let anybody misrepresent the suggestion by concluding that we are in favour of strikes in hospitals. My hon. friend here is a trade unionist and knows what trade unionists think because he has sat behind bargaining tables. No trade unionist in this province is going to foment a strike in a hospital—Mr. Speaker, the proof of that is that they have not done it—to threaten or endanger the lives of the patients. And all of the words—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: There is a strike today!

Mr. MacDonald: I said to threaten the welfare of the patients. The strike today; let me deal with it.

What did the boys who are on strike today do? They have guaranteed the services for the hospital. They are striking against the extension to the hospital at Wellesley. There is no threat at all to the patients at the hospital and no trade unionist—I defy the government to come up with some proof of it—no trade unionist has ever jeopardized the life and the welfare of a person who is in the hospital. Heaven help me, Mr. Speaker, what more do you want? Actions speak louder than words. This is the record of responsible action by trade unions down through the years. In face of that record this government comes in and argues that unions may sometime threaten the welfare of patients. This government, which did not have the intestinal fortitude to get after management in the Trenton hospital, says that unions may do it sometime; so they come in with a compulsory arbitration bill.

This is the wrong principle. We shall oppose it. If this government, with the usual support of the Liberals, passes it in this House on second reading then once again we will try to propose amendments at the committee stage, which will achieve the purpose of protecting the rights and the welfare of the patients in the hospital without this blanket imposition of compulsory arbitration.

But you cannot go around violating principles while proclaiming them; you cannot go around saying I am in favour of human rights and then legalize the violation of human rights. You cannot go around saying you are in favour of free collective bargaining and pass laws that destroy free collective bargaining.

This is nonsense! If Liberals and Tories want to do it, then the people in this province who can think clearly, both within and without the trade union movement, will recognize where Liberals and Tories stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the motion carry?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Speaker, I did not realize that this bill was going to make the leader of the New Democratic Party blow a gasket.

Mr. MacDonald: There is no gasket blown. My engine is in good shape.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: But I would have to say to him, and I say quite frankly as I think he would expect me to, that I take serious opposition to his position.

It is all right with me, whatever position he wants to take, I am sure he has thought it out. But I, too, have thought it out, and as Minister of Labour I have some rather important responsibilities in this government, which I take seriously. If it comes to having a difference of opinion with people on what is going to be done one way or the other, then my duty as Minister, and a responsible Minister, is to stand up and say what I think should be done.

I can understand this. I can understand throughout the whole debate, throughout the whole hearings of the Bennett commission, when people came before us, both management and labour, many of them saying "No we are against it," and then going out in the hallway and talking to each other and saying, "But I privately think maybe it is a good thing."

Mr. MacDonald: But not as a blanket bill.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: All right now, just let me finish. I was pretty kind to the hon. member today and he is a pretty good fellow.

Mr. MacDonald: So is the hon. Minister on occasion.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I know—

Mr. MacDonald: But this is not one of his finer days.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, I will tell the hon. member, I have a high regard for him and I would like to keep it that way.

The situation is that this is a very contentious subject and I had to make a decision.

I am not ashamed of the decision, for this reason: If those elements of management which do not want compulsory arbitration want to take that position on principle, fine. If those elements of the trade union movement want to take that position on principle, that is fine. But I, as the Minister of Labour, speaking for the government of this province, am going to speak for the position of the people of this province and I tell hon. members that for this reason, that there is no man alive that can make an adequate decision as to whether or not patient care is going to be affected.

I tell hon. members today that patient care at the Wellesley hospital is being affected at this very moment, if the strike is still in progress, because the very threat of strikes being on and the uncertainties that go with it, both in the minds of the patients and in the minds of the hospital staff including the medical people, the threat hangs over them when they do not know whether or not the power, or whatever requirements they may need, are going to be interfered with leaving—just hear me out and quit nodding because this is not any time to be a Pearson about it over there—the decision that has to be made by a doctor in determining the kind and extent of medical treatment, whether it be surgical or whatever it may be. The whole area of treatment is one that cannot help but be affected by a picket line walking outside.

I was concerned and interested about the reference to convalescent hospitals. The same thing applies there because the mental aspect of therapy of any kind goes to the very root of the successful use or benefits to be derived from the therapy.

There it is, I put it to hon. members. This is my position and I am not ashamed of it. I say that the interests of those groups, who have publicly stated that they are against compulsory arbitration with respect to hospital disputes, I suggest that those matters will have to take second place to the well-being of the populace of this province insofar as their stay in hospitals is concerned.

Mr. MacDonald: But there is another way than compulsory arbitration.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: No, no; calm down!

This is the position. Now I would think and hope that we could have a difference of opinion. I can understand his position, tied to the trade union movement—

Mr. MacDonald: I am not tied to it.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree:—with some of his colleagues on salary from the trade union movement; and then the hon. member reimburses his salary from the Legislature. I can understand all those situations that put him and his party in a sort of a—well a difficult position. He is tied, that is all right with me—

Mr. MacDonald: Was the hon. Minister not in favour of those principles before he decided to violate them?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree:—I do not see anything wrong with the hon. member being tied. That is all right, it is a legal arrangement. But it is up to the rest of us to tell the rest of the province just what is going on and why the hon. member had to take the position he did.

Mr. Gisborn: The hon. Minister is saying that those people who made representation did not mean what they said.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: By the same token I would expect the hon. member to respect my position. If I have to make a decision that goes against the grain over there, I do not think any Minister of Labour could ever please everybody in any Parliament or Legislature. I do my best. I do not pretend to be perfect but I can tell the hon. member I am right on this one when I speak out for patient care for the people of this province.

I can tell the House why the official Opposition supports this bill.

Mr. MacDonald: Why?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Because it is right; of course it is right. Needless to say, I am asking all hon. members to support this second reading and let us get this bill along the way.

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the hon. Minister?

Mr. Speaker: The member has spoken once to the principle of this bill.

Mr. Gisborn: I would like the clarification of a statement made, and to ask a question.

Mr. Speaker: It has to be in committee stage really, because technically questions and answers are supposed to be carried out in committee.

Mr. Gisborn: I will raise it on a point of order, then. The hon. Minister indicated to me, or implied, that the people who made representation to the Bennett commission were not truthful in their presentations.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Oh, no. I did not say that at all.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister states that he did not make any misstatement, therefore the member has no point of order.

Is it the pleasure of the House the motion carry? All those in favour of the motion will please say "aye." All those opposed will please say "nay."

In my opinion the "ayes" have it.

Call in the members.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow, we will proceed with the second readings as they are on the order paper. As I said on Friday, the next departmental estimates will be those of Municipal Affairs. The Department of Labour will follow. The press gallery party is on Thursday night and we will not have a night sitting. We will move that night sitting to Wednesday night of this week.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Speaker, before you put the motion, may I ask the hon. Prime Minister whether he includes public as well as government bills? Is he going to continue with second readings on all of the bills?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I made this clear last week, that I am going to continue with the government second readings, and the private bills. I will give those people who have public bills on the order paper due notice of when they will be called. In other words, they will not be called without notice being given.

Motion agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, MARCH 23, 1965

The House met at 3 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are always pleased to have visitors to the Legislature and today we welcome as guests: in the west gallery, students from Branksome Hall school, Toronto; and in the east gallery, students from Barton secondary school, Hamilton.

Petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Mr. D. A. Evans (Simcoe Centre), from the standing committee on labour, legal and municipal bills, presented the committee's third report, which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee begs to report the following bills with certain amendments:

Bill No. 31, An Act to amend The Workmen's Compensation Act.

Bill No. 35, The Operating Engineers Act, 1965.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Introduction of bills.

THE CANCER ACT

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Cancer Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, this is a simple housekeeping amendment. At the present time The Cancer Act requires that the chairman of the cancer foundation must sit on the board of the cancer institute. It has not been deemed expedient or wise that this should be any longer and the chairman has asked that we amend the legislation in this regard.

There will still be five members of the foundation board on the institute board. One of those need not necessarily be the chairman.

THE HOSPITAL SERVICES COMMISSION ACT

Hon. Mr. Dymond moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Hospital Services Commission Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, this also is a very simple amendment. When the Act was passed originally the commission was to be known as the hospital services commission of Ontario. By custom it has come to be known as the Ontario hospital services commission. The legal people believe that we should formalize this.

THE PUBLIC HOSPITALS ACT

Hon. Mr. Dymond moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Public Hospitals Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, there are five short amendments in this bill. The first is complementary to The Hospital Services Commission Act so that the name will now be changed throughout The Public Hospitals Act to read, the Ontario hospital services commission.

The second amendment is designed to prevent an unqualified person from being employed in a hospital as a medical or surgical intern.

The third amendment, provisions are re-enacted in order to provide a time limit within which notice must be given by a hospital to a municipality that a resident of the municipality has been admitted as an indigent or that the patient has become indigent after admission.

The fourth clause of the amendment will authorize regulations to require a proper written contract between a teaching hospital and the affiliated university and to require the inclusion in any such contract of those provisions to ensure that the students will receive the best possible instructions without detriment to the quality of patient care.

The last amendment, sir, of this new provision requires that the college of physicians and surgeons of Ontario be notified of any disciplinary action taken against a physician by a hospital authority.

THE PRIVATE HOSPITALS ACT

Hon. Mr. Dymond moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Private Hospitals Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, these two amendments to this Act are in keeping with two of those in The Public Hospitals Act: First to change the name of the hospital services commission of Ontario to the Ontario hospital services commission throughout the Act, and second to provide that no unqualified person can be employed in a private hospital as a medical or surgical intern.

THE COMMUNITY CENTRES ACT

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Community Centres Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, by way of information I would say that this simply provides for the addition of community halls for grant purposes in unorganized areas where the community centres are administered by a school board.

Further, Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day I would like to make a brief statement to the House on a matter that is of considerable importance to the farm people of Ontario.

Hon. members of the House will recall that last fall, in view of the seriousness of the drought situation in many parts of Ontario, a hay freight assistance policy was announced in co-operation with the government of Canada. The purpose of the policy is to assist farmers in drought areas to defray transportation costs incurred in transporting hay from various points of supply.

Under the programme, which is shared on a dollar-for-dollar basis with the federal government, The Department of Agriculture will pay up to 75 per cent of the transportation charges incurred by the farmers, up to a maximum of $10 a ton, whichever is the lesser amount. I therefore wish to inform the House that the Ontario government has decided to extend the operation of the programme, originally scheduled to terminate on March 31, to May 15 of this year.

I might say that assistance given under this programme has been of considerable value to the dairy and livestock producers who, through no fault of their own, found themselves faced with a serious shortage of feed supplies, owing to unprecedented conditions of drought.

In addition to this hay assistance policy, I am sure that hon. members of the House will recall that at the same time the government made provision to the extent of a bank guarantee for the purchase of hay and grain by farmers who had suffered through drought or army worm infestation. To date, 3,670 accounts for hay transportation assistance have been processed at a cost of $365,852.

It was found that many farmers were going to be unable to have the required supplies of hay trucked before the original policy deadline of March 31, 1965. In addition, it is realized that livestock in most parts of eastern Ontario will not be on pasture before May 15, and possibly later in the more northerly areas. For these reasons it was felt that additional time was necessary to allow the farmers to assess their hay requirements and to obtain the necessary supplies.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Grey South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. Minister what was the limit?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: It was $4,500, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have two questions; the first is addressed to the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts).

Does the hon. Prime Minister intend to set up a special committee to study the problems of conservation across Ontario? If so, has the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Pittock) been appointed to it? Finally, is it true that this committee will begin operations before the end of the session?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is yes; notice of such intention was contained in the Speech from the Throne, and if the hon. member will refer to the first paragraph on page 7 of the first issue of the Votes and Proceedings of this House, he will find the exact wording of the notice of intent.

The committee will be proposed to this House in due course. The hon. member for Oxford will be nominated as one of the members from the government side. I think his experience in the field of conservation is such that he could make a very valuable addition and a great contribution to such a committee. He is highly esteemed in his own community and is very well regarded in the councils of the conservation authority of Ontario.

The answer to the last part of the question is no. Select committees, according to the practice in this House, are generally appointed in the latter part of the session and they begin their duties after the Legislature has risen.

Mr. MacDonald: My second question, Mr. Speaker, is to the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart).

Does the Ontario securities commission intend to block additional sales of treasury stock of Equity Explorations Limited, pending the investigation in Quebec?

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to give the hon. member this answer through you.

The Ontario securities commission has already acted in the matter of Equity Explorations Limited, and on March 19 an order was issued authorizing an investigation of the dealings of the company, pursuant to section 23 of The Securities Act. The effect of that order is to freeze all the funds, certificates and securities of the company, and the order has been served on all the persons who, to the knowledge of the commission, have any bonds or securities in their possession.

I just might say, for the information of the House, that this is an Ontario company which has property in Quebec. We have evidence that the cores were being salted and false results were given out for the purpose of disposing of securities. The Quebec securities commission has been co-operating very closely with us and we are both taking the same action. Everything is now tied up.

Mr. Speaker: Does the member for Huron-Bruce have a question?

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have decided to withdraw my question because I have had consultation with the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. Attorney General when I might expect the answers to the series of questions that I posed beginning on January 25, and on several instances after that.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to answer the hon. member. I counted the questions at one time and I think they ran into the neighbourhood of 102—quite a series of questions. The answers, however, have practically all been prepared and perhaps I might even say that some of them have been ready for some little time. I propose to check them once again quickly, make sure they are up to date now, and start giving them out so the hon. member will not be overwhelmed with them all at once. I will be giving them out very shortly.

I would like to say that I think I am indebted to the hon. member, to some extent at least, in having furnished these questions to me, because in preparing the answers to them, I have found that a good deal of detail of which I was not particularly aware at the moment, has come to my attention and I am now very well informed.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

THE EXPROPRIATION PROCEDURES ACT, 1962-1963

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General) moves second reading of Bill No. 45, An Act to amend The Expropriation Procedures Act, 1962-1963.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, in connection with Bill No. 45, The Expropriation Procedures Amendment Act, I thought that it would be well to draw to the attention of the government some of the history that led up to The Expropriation Procedures Act. I do not know whether the hon. Attorney General is familiar with the studies of the select committee, although I am sure that he has read its report, I do not know how familiar he is with the remarks of the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Cass) when he introduced the bill back in 1963.

But I have taken the occasion, sir, to refresh my memory, and I note that when the Attorney General of the day introduced the bill in 1963, on March 19 in fact, he said, among other things—and at this point I am referring to page 1876 of the debates—that the committee was unanimous in its view that there were changes necessary. Then he went on to say that the government felt there were certain matters of substantive law, including the matter of a tribunal to hear these matters, which required considerable study. Then in his remarks, as he developed them in connection with the first reading, he expressed the opinion on behalf of the government that while extensive changes are necessary in the substantive law, the procedural changes were of utmost importance and could be quickly remedied, and it was with that in mind that he introduced The Expropriation Procedures Act. He made it quite clear, in fact, that there was no attempt in The Expropriation Procedures Act to change the substantive law, and I think the hon. Attorney General will agree with me about this.

Then I refer to some remarks he made at page 2710, which is in relation to dealing with that bill at the time it came before the committee of the whole House. The Attorney General of the day said this:

But it has left the substance of law with respect to compensation and the tribunal alone.

At that point he was replying to some points raised by the hon. member for Woodbine (Mr. Bryden). Then further on, on the same page, he said:

—improvement in procedure is included in this bill while the matter of the substance of law and the tribunal is yet to be settled.

And he went on to say:

So, for that reason, I accept the remarks of the hon. member—and that is the hon. member for Woodbine:

—as being very pertinent under the circumstances and a point well taken. I can assure the hon. members that this matter is under very careful study by my department and the other departments concerned.

As of April 23, then, the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas assured this House that the matters of change in the substantive law were under very careful consideration.

Some two years have elapsed since the introduction of that bill. There is no indication before us that the very substantial studies that were necessary have been undertaken. In fact, what seems to be indicated as a result of the amendments to this bill is a panic that has hit the government as a result of the fuss that took place in Oxford county. Suddenly, the government began to realize, I suspect, that even though the studies that it referred to were not even being conducted, something had to be done to cover the ground and make it look a little more reasonable to the people who were going to be affected by expropriation. The very substantial criticism that was levied at the government because of the position in which the unfortunate hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Pittock) found himself, forced these sudden changes.

I ask the hon. Attorney General: Where are the changes in substantive law that were the unanimous recommendations of the select committee? I am sure he is familiar with this report. There is recommendation No. 2, for instance, that a uniform statute be set up to provide a common basis for compensation for all agencies that are authorized by the provincial government to expropriate land, and that the requirement be that the authority make due compensation to the owner of land for any damage necessary resulting from expropriation—in other words, sir, that there be a common basis for all expropriation proceedings. There is as yet no common basis for all expropriation proceedings for determining the value of money to be paid. It still ties itself in with the wording of each particular enabling Act.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, the uniformity of paying compensation, which was so well recognized by the unanimous opinion of the select committee, should have been paid some attention to. And surely we should have expected, two years after the former Attorney General introduced The Expropriation Procedures Act, that the government would have had time to work out in legislative language a method for determining a uniform method of determining payment.

Then, sir, recommendation No. 3 of the select committee said this:

That a special tribunal be appointed by the government of Ontario which would be solely responsible for the assessment of compensation arising from expropriation and associated powers, with consideration being given so that such a tribunal would have sufficient membership to deal expeditiously with all the matters before it.

That is quite a lengthy recommendation. I have only read the first part of it, but in essence it strongly recommended that there be one tribunal and one tribunal only set up, which would deal with all expropriation matters. That touched very closely on the remark made by the hon. member for Woodbine at the time, when he quoted from a judgment of the Supreme Court. The judge he was quoting wondered—and wondered properly, I would suggest—about the dual role that the municipal board had to play, in determining amounts to be paid for compensation. The Attorney General of that day said, “Yes, this is a valid point and we are moving toward this. We are studying it. Give us time and we will do something about it.”

It was with great interest, Mr. Speaker, that I heard the hon. Attorney General rise in his place a few days ago and introduce the expropriation procedures amendment Act, because I had hoped in the two years' time that had elapsed that he and his advisers would have had time to study the recommendations and the substantive changes in the law that seem so urgent, and were now prepared to give effect to some of those unanimous recommendations. Instead, sir, we find this Act is nothing more than a face-saving device, designed to make the government look a little better in Oxford county.

The government got into this position in Oxford county because of the fact that it had not set up the sort of expropriation procedures and the substantive changes in the law as recommended in the select committee's report, and the unfortunate hon. member, as I described him earlier, found himself in the position where he was trying to wear two hats at the same time. Wearing one hat, he was the chairman of the conservation authority which dealt with expropriation matters; apparently he had to take it upon himself to go out and negotiate about expropriation values and expropriation questions with the people from whom the authority was taking land. Under the other hat, being a member of the Legislature, he should have been in the position to listen to complaints. He was not in that position because he would be listening to complaints about himself and his actions.

One judge of the Supreme Court said, in a judgment a few days ago, that the business of Caesar appealing to Caesar makes for very difficult law. This is the position that the government found itself in, because those people whose land was taken in the county of Oxford by the conservation authority, had to appeal from Caesar to Caesar and they really had no one in a position to listen impartially to their complaints.

As a result of this, and as a result of the very substantial criticism, the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) rose in his place one afternoon and said he was going to appoint a special negotiating committee. It was going into Oxford county and would fix everything up. It may be that they have gone in and it may be that they have fixed everything up; I do not know. In any event, the loud-voiced complaints seem to have ceased, so something has probably happened. But this was a one-time effort. However, the government thought that maybe they should enshrine this one-time effort in legislation, and this is what they do.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): This format has been used many times.

Mr. Singer: Well, if it has been used many times, and if it has any value, one would have thought that the government would have re-examined their whole position insofar as expropriation is concerned. With all the great multiplicity of bodies which can expropriate, surely the people of Ontario would be far better served if there were a uniform set of laws governing the manner in which compensation was to be determined? But we do not find this in this Act. What do we find in this Act?

There is power to appoint two people—we do not know who they are. The Lieutenant-Governor can appoint two people who, when they become advised that there is some difficulty, can go out and conciliate.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Two or more.

Mr. Singer: All right, two or more. Now, who are those two or more? Are they going to be some broken-down politicians who are retiring and need to be appointed to another board, so that they will be able to travel hither and yon around the province?

An hon. member: Speak for yourself.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: Well, I must have hit a very responsive chord there from the answers that came forth.

Or are they going to be people who are trained in matters of land evaluation? Are they going to have a staff? Are these people going to have a staff of land appraisers? What training are they going to have? Are they going to be available to every municipality, every hydro board, every hospital board, every university, every expropriating body that exists through the province, or are they not? How big is this office going to be? Have we any idea really whether we are setting up a brand-new department of expropriation conciliators? Who is going to be in this department? What training are they going to have and what advisers are they going to have?

Mr. Speaker, I cannot see anything really new coming out of this Act, or anything of substantive value to the people of the province of Ontario, other than an obvious face-saving effort designed by the government to bail them out of the very embarrassing situation in which they found themselves in Oxford county. It would seem to make much more sense to me that the government, if they were going to amend The Expropriation Procedures Act, would have paid close attention to the unanimous recommendations of the select committee on land expropriation, and would have paid close attention to the remarks of the former Attorney-General, who promised this House that the matter of substantive changes in the law were under careful investigation. He thought that the suggestions were good; well, he should have thought so because he was chairman of this committee and he played a large part in writing these recommendations. We could have, and should have, expected at this time that when the amendments were brought into The Expropriation Procedures Act, an attempt would have been made to deal with these difficulties.

Mr. Speaker, we do not have any uniform board. We do not have any uniform basis for determining compensation. Instead, we have two or more people who are going to be appointed, I gather, as a roving commission, apparently without any other advisers, apparently without any civil service staff to work with them, and apparently without any land evaluators or appraisers set up to assist them. They are going to interpose themselves between the expropriating authority and/or the municipal board or the county court judge or the arbitrator—this whole mystique of varying authorities. The municipal board is being placed in the position where its interest must, of necessity, conflict, because at the same time as they attempt to determine value, they have these other roles insofar as The Department of Municipal Affairs is concerned. None of this difficulty is being cleared up. We are going to have two public relations men, I suppose, to wander around the province and try to work out quiet and peaceful settlements.

In brief, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that this is a poor excuse for an amendment to an Act that is as important to so many people in the province of Ontario as this one is, and that the government deserves very severe criticism for not having listened to the words of this select committee report, and to the words of the former Attorney General, who was charged with this responsibility. In addition, the government should be severely criticized, because it seems to me that the only purpose of bringing in this Act is as a face-saving device designed to rescue from the wreckage of Oxford county a very bad disaster which they got themselves into.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, in dealing with the principle underlying this bill, I want to refer to three general areas. The first is to the substantive changes in the law to which this government indicated it was giving some consideration, following the representation of my colleague some two or three years ago when the bill was first brought in. The hon. member for Downsview has touched on this. I just draw this to the attention of the House and I do not think anything more need be said on it, because we have nothing more before us.

Three years have gone by. The studies have not been instituted; we are no further ahead.

Now, the second general area that I want to comment on is that the main purpose of this bill is to legalize what was, in effect, an illegal procedure. Now the hon. Prime Minister has interjected this afternoon in saying this procedure has been used on a number of occasions.

This may be true, Mr. Speaker. I do not know, except that when the hon. Prime Minister used it on this particular occasion, it was he who said there is nothing in the Act which authorized the government to do this. But we are going to do it. Under normal circumstances, the final decision on arbitration would have gone through to the Ontario municipal board. And he conceded by implication, if not explicitly, that there was no legal basis for this action in this case, or on any other occasion when it had been used. Now, somewhat belatedly, the government has come in with an amendment to the Act which is going to authorize this procedure; authorize it in a standard fashion.

I have not much more to add to all of the queries that the hon. member for Downsview has raised with regard to the operations of this board of negotiation. Quite frankly, it appears to be—as the hon. member referred to it—a panic move; it appears to be something resorted to in a rush to cope with the situation in Oxford. There are not enough details for us to come to any intelligent conclusion; we just have to take it and hope, and then exercise judgment in light of some experience.

Indeed, it may well be, since the hon. Attorney General intimated to me in a question following the first reading of the bill, that this is just an intermediate stage and that the ultimate solution will still have to be made by the Ontario municipal board if this board of negotiations cannot achieve a settlement. It may well mean that it will just prolong the whole process, which sometimes has been a very painful one.

Again, I repeat, we will just have to wait until we see the nature of this new creature that the government has given birth to, and judge its effectiveness in the light of some experience.

However, Mr. Speaker, the third point is the one that I want to stress to this House. When the government and the hon. Attorney General introduced this bill, I asked him whether or not this bill covered the changes in The Conservation Act that were envisaged in the Speech from the Throne, and he intimated yes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, on that basis, I want to say that this is a pathetically inadequate piece of legislation in light of the almost violent protest that has been raised all across this province, concerning the procedures of conservation boards. I hope that under the appropriate estimate we will get back to them.

I was very interested to receive a letter a few weeks ago that was circulated—indeed, it came to me from two or three different sources—from municipal officials. It was a letter that had emanated from the Ontario council of conservation authorities in which it was suggested that what had happened in the Upper Thames River conservation authority with reference to the Pittock dam was an isolated event. They were fearful of the damage to the reputation of conservation authorities as a whole because of the public furore that had been created. They tried to assure the public that this kind of thing was not happening with other conservation authorities.

Mr. Speaker, at the appropriate time I shall document that this is happening in other authorities. Indeed, I was taken aback to learn that many of my own constituents were the victims of almost as atrocious procedures by the Humber conservation authorities—and I am referring to the landowners out in the Eglinton flat in the central portion of my constituency.

Many times before, Mr. Speaker, when we have been talking about the changes that were required in the expropriation Act, I have referred to the fact that the Ontario federation of agriculture, as a result of what happened in the Upper Thames River conservation authority, had studied this matter thoroughly, and indeed it is well known, had done so under the guidance of Donald Middleton, the head of their properties branch. As a result of this study it brought before their convention last fall a nine-point resolution with proposals for bringing the expropriation Act up to date so that the little fellow who finds himself faced with a big authority, a government agency, will have his rights protected automatically rather than have to dig himself in and steel himself to the kind of prolonged battle that the landowners in the Woodstock area, for example, have had to go through for the last year.

I want to remind the House by way of a comment on the painful inadequacy of the bill that we have before us this afternoon of what the Ontario federation of agriculture has considered carefully and has proposed as the necessary amendments to the expropriation Act.

I repeat, they are nine in number. The first one is as follows:

That every expropriating authority be required to prove the need for each parcel of land in a properly conducted trial, freely open to the public.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the reason for this request is that there have been changes in terms of the land that was required; in terms of more land, or in terms of removing some from expropriation orders in the instance of the Pittock dam expropriations at Woodstock.

Indeed, the most startling example of it was the man who was told that his whole farm was going to be required. So he spent a good deal of time last fall in seeking an alternative farm, not only with a barn but with a house so that he could move his family. After he had found an alternative farm and had spent most of the fall rushing to keep ahead of the coming winter in getting a house ready and moving his family in, to his amazement he received a letter from the authority saying that they only wanted half his farm and he could have the original buildings and house back.

Now, for whatever reason this change was made I do not know, but once again I have discovered, in talking with people who feel that they have been the victims of conservation authorities, that there seems to be a strange vacillation in terms of the decisions as to what land is required. This is certainly what is going on behind the scenes and what provoked the request of the Ontario federation of agriculture that there should be a public hearing so that the authority would justify its requirement for that particular parcel of land.

The second point is as follows:

Any authority placing a registered plan upon the property shall immediately pay the landowner an option.

Here is one area of almost consistent protest. In the instance of the Humber conservation authority the situation was complicated because of green belt designation in the circumstances that arose following Hurricane Hazel in the watershed of the Humber River.

The authorities moved and, in effect, froze a certain property so that it could not be sold, it could not be improved nor built upon. All of these changes were made and yet a man gets no compensation at all. There is no option taken on the land. Years will go by. Indeed I will show, when we get to a further point, how far, sometimes, these procedures carry on. Point number three:

All property owners shall be given at least one year's notice that their property is being taken over by an authority.

In the instance of the Pittock dam expropriations they were assured of two years and yet they got notice toward the beginning of last year; and in the first instance they were going to be out by the middle of the year. Later there were postponements in the instance of some of the property holders.

In other words, there is not adequate time being given, particularly if it is to a farm owner who clearly cannot deal with the problem of crop cycles and getting new property if he is given only a few months of notice. I would think that a year's notice would be the minimum in which a farmer would be able to cope in the changes involved in switching farms.

The fourth point reads:

All lands scheduled for expropriation to be valued by properly qualified appraisers.

Now it seems to me to be so elementary that I do not know why this would need to be specified; but again, in the instance of the Pittock dam expropriations, the first expropriations were by appraisers who simply did not have the confidence of the people involved. Here was one of the areas of great controversy between the authority and the landowners, and indeed the Ontario federation of agriculture; because when the Ontario federation of agriculture came into the picture they suggested to the authority that they should hire independent, free appraisers, and the authority did not even reply to their letter. Indeed only later did they quietly, and without acknowledging their action, move to do this—because it was absolutely necessary if they were going to get back on an operating basis with the landowners involved.

The fifth point is:

Landowners whose property is being expropriated shall receive full compensation to the true value of land and buildings, plus 25 per cent for forceful taking.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I understand that the general practice in The Department of Highways has been to pay an extra ten per cent for forceful taking. I was curious to discover why in the view of the Ontario federation of agriculture they felt that 25 per cent was justified. I will report to the House that in seeking clarification on this they made the point that in the instance of farm lands a farmer, if he is a modern farmer, is fertilizing his land regularly, indeed he is investing thousands of dollars in this property, and to take this land away, for whatever use you may wish to put it, you are not just taking the land, you are taking this long-term investment in terms of the fertility of his land.

If he goes and buys another property he may well be buying a property in which once again, he has got to start almost from the beginning in terms of adequate fertilization. Therefore their contention is that 25 per cent addition rather than 10 per cent is justified.

The sixth point:

No property owner can be asked to surrender his land and buildings until the expropriating authority has paid him at least 85 per cent of the appraised value.

Now, Mr. Speaker, here is perhaps the most disturbing aspect of the whole operation of conservation authorities, particularly as far as the victim—if I may describe him as such—is concerned.

As I understand it, the law now requires 50 per cent. In the instance of the Pittock dam they got a higher figure, I believe it was 75, if I recall correctly, or 85. This is why the OFA is now coming in with a proposal that 85 per cent should be paid.

I acknowledge that there is a problem here. If you are expropriating only a portion of a farm and it is not a portion that is being lived on, and it is going to go through to arbitration because a settlement cannot be reached, the figure on which you would pay any amount before they have actually taken it over is clearly a matter of some conjecture and some dispute. But it seems to me that the real hardships emerge in the case of people whose homes are being expropriated.

I could tell hon. members, for example—and this is reverting a bit because in reference to a portion of a farm rather than the whole—of one case in Woodbridge in the Humber valley that was drawn to my attention a week or so ago—of a man who had a portion of his farm taken by the Humber valley conservation authority for purposes of straightening the river. The authority has straightened the river. It has handed part of this property over to the York county roads committee. Yet all of this took place two years ago, and only last fall did it enter into negotiations on the price it was going to pay him for this property.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to be something approaching legalized robbery, certainly an affront to the rights of property, that an authority can come in, take land, use it, give parts of it away, and only some year or two later get to the point of starting to negotiate on payment with the owner of the property.

But if I may return now to the proposition of those who find that their homes are going to be taken, I think that here is the real difficulty. This is a difficulty that I shall detail and document—when we get to the appropriate estimate—in the case of some of those in the Eglinton flats. It is all very well to say to a man and his wife and children who are living in a home: “You have to get out by the end of this year.” But if the authority has not arrived at a settlement figure how is he going to buy an alternative home? This is the dilemma with which many of these people are faced. I do not pretend to be an expert in this field and therefore I do not know the answer to this very knotty problem, but clearly, if one is going to force people out of their homes and they have to find an alternative home, they have to have some idea of what compensation they are going to get so that they will have some idea of what money they are going to have in their pockets when they go to buy an alternative home. There is case after case, both in Woodstock and in the instance of the Humber valley conservation authority where this simply is not true.

Mr. Singer: Everywhere there is expropriation.

Mr. MacDonald: Everywhere, I agree. After two or three years, it would seem to me that this government must have had its head really buried in the sand if it did not realize that there was need for study and action in connection with this procedure, and some sort of solution.

The seventh point, Mr. Speaker, is:

Provision must be made for property owners to have a practical opportunity to appeal the expropriation or appraisal at a nominal cost.

Conceivably, the main amendment of the bill that the hon. Attorney General has brought in will assist in this general area. The board of negotiation may come in and resolve difficulties when the two parties have lost confidence in each other; it becomes an independent body that intervenes and perhaps brings them back together. But certainly the costs involved are something that is too lightly ignored by conservation authorities when they say, in effect, “Fine, if you are not content with the offer go on to arbitration.” And by going on to arbitration the property owner is pouring down the drain some proportion of the price that he ultimately will get.

The eighth point is:

Expropriation bodies shall be required to assume responsibility and costs for searching titles to land.

I think that speaks for itself. Then finally, of course, the ninth point in the OFA resolution was:

No member of the legislative assembly shall be permitted to hold an elected position or an appointment to a conservation authority.

This is the problem that became painful for the hon. member for Oxford. He finally conceded that there was an appearance of a conflict of interests—though apparently he was unrepentant to the end and did not think there was really a conflict of interests, but he resigned the chairmanship.

May I just say here, Mr. Speaker, what I have said outside the House—that if a man is on the conservation authority, his conflict of interests may be somewhat less if he is just a member rather than if he is the chairman, but he does not remove the conflict of interests merely by resigning the chairmanship. He is still in a position to have to defend the actions of the board and therefore he is still not free to fight for his constituents if they feel that their rights have not been protected.

I was interested to read in the papers a few weeks ago that the hon. member for Kent West (Mr. McKeough) has resigned from a conservation authority. He told me privately that he was doing it because he was too busy and could not get to the meetings. I would say that was a fortunate development because I think he is wise to have left the board. If anything develops in his area, he is not going to find himself in a conflict of interests, too, and I think there is validity—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: He told it to you privately?

Mr. MacDonald: I think there is validity in point nine of the Ontario federation of agriculture's representation. I just sum up this way, Mr. Speaker, that after three years—both as regards the substance of law and even more important as regards the procedures, which are a constant source of complaint—this government has not settled down to do a job. Therefore it brings in a bill that is hopelessly inadequate in terms of meeting the needs, in light of the storms that have been provoked in some places. They are going to be provoked elsewhere as long as the government does not take action. I regret this, but once again, this is the kind of piecemeal, gradual approach we have to suffer from this government even when the problems are urgent ones.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, let me first of all disabuse the minds of the hon. members who have spoken—the hon. members for Downsview and York South—that there is any panic about the presentation of this Act. It was not put together in a great hurry, nor did it arise out of the situation in Oxford county; it was planned and considered before that situation was the subject of study. I might say I had the benefit of a committee of my colleagues on the Cabinet—the hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton), the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner), the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Connell) and one other, I believe, the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett), and the Act arose out of a good experience.

Expropriation, the forceable taking of land, is never going to be a popular procedure, but the public good demands sometimes that the rights of the individual must take second place. If the public is to achieve its aims, the private property of some person or persons must be taken, and must be taken by order—or by force, in that context, in that meaning. The Expropriation Procedures Act which was introduced in 1962-63 did a good deal. It laid out, limited and defined times, circumstances, notices, and procedures which were very helpful, but it was lacking, I am frank to admit, in some features which could easily be observed, in that—and these were the chief complaints—there was expense involved to the private owner, there were delays in spite of the procedures that had been laid down, there were difficulties of various kinds, and in this very unpopular business of expropriation, we felt we could meet these difficulties out of our experience.

My colleague, the hon. Minister of Highways, tells me that over the past number of years, in his experience in that department, the number of cases which have had to go to the Ontario municipal board or to a judicial tribunal have been something like one per cent—one out of a hundred—and he and other departments have been using a tribunal or a group of negotiators to seek to bring the parties together, to agree on a price, to settle the matter. This has worked well and has removed a great deal of the complaint and difficulty and heart-burnings that arose through the application of expropriations procedures.

What this Act is designed to do, is to establish a tribunal—and not just one, but as the Act points out, the Lieutenant-Governor in Council may appoint two or more persons. What is intended is an informal, simple, summary, inexpensive procedure that can be used where it becomes necessary for an expropriating authority to take the land of an individual and use it for the public good. For example, if it happens to be a case in Essex county, what is intended here is that perhaps three persons in Essex county, familiar with the area, knowing the unique and peculiar circumstances which apply to land or buildings or whatever the situation may be in that area, will be appointed, will visit the property, will examine it, and will be able to bring the owner together with the expropriating authority and say, "Now, let's sit down and see if we can settle this situation." That is the purpose of the Act.

Just to detail that a bit further, it is intended that it would not be necessary for the owner to have a lawyer, or even perhaps to have appraisers. The gentlemen who would make up the tribunal, one of whom would be chairman, would examine the land and would talk with the owner, would get the idea of its value and they would then sit down, bringing the owner and the expropriating authority together, and say: "Let's try to reach a price." And they would take into account, if I may say this, the 10, 25 or whatever percentage you might want to consider within or beyond those limits for all the circumstances of the taking, the time at which the property is needed, and the time it is to be taken. These things, I think it is fair to say, can be settled. But the only way we know of settling them today is by money; perhaps you cannot settle every damage or every injury in dollars and cents, but in expropriation this is the theory on which we proceed; that by some payment of money you can salve, soften and heal the wound that you create by saying: "I must have that piece of property." And that is what this Act is intended to do.

And it applies across the board, with the exception, as pointed out in the first section, of The Drainage Act. It will apply to municipal situations, it will apply to conservation authorities, it will apply to The Department of Highways, and let me say this; the hon. member for York South said we are legalizing, in his words, an illegal procedure. I would like to say that what we are doing is to legalize not something which was illegal, but something for which we have no lawful authority. But it was not anything illegal that has been done, it is just a good experience that we have observed. We are formalizing it now and saying: "This is the way you henceforth shall do it." We hope to save the owner time, disturbance and dislocation to the greatest extent that can be brought about. The cost of this proceeding will be paid for, as the Act says, out of government funds.

It is no more illegal than it is to try to settle a lawsuit before you get before the judge, or to settle the case before you issue a writ. So we are making negotiation by ordinary, sensible, perceptive, common-sense people a necessity in matters of expropriation.

The hon. member for Downsview says he can see nothing new. Well, I am sorry his eyes are so blind. I think this procedure is quite new in that it now becomes a necessity. It has now become—if this Act is passed—necessary to adopt this new procedure, one which is tested, tried and proven. I was not surprised to hear him come forth with some political comments that he thought this board might be composed of some political hacks—I do not know what the word was—but he announced, as I recall in his speech in connection with the reply to the Speech from the Throne, that he was going to be very political in his comments throughout this session. Well, I do not mind that, but I think if he would observe that in the administration of justice, and this Act does touch that quite closely; so far as my department is concerned, we try to avoid the political tinge, and I say that quite sincerely.

Mr. Singer: You can practise good politics, too.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: And I can allay his fears that there will be any great political colouration to the administration of this Act.

As to the substantive law, I think I shall be very brief in discussing that because, insofar as this Act is concerned, it is simply one principle only—the establishment of a tribunal, a summary procedure that is quick, inexpensive, and informal, to get on with the job of expropriation and remove the difficulties which we have faced heretofore.

There are, perhaps, some areas where we might bring in some new measures of substantive law in an Act, but that is not the Act I present to this House today.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): The hon. Attorney General called it a tribunal.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I called it a tribunal because I anticipate in the language of the Act two or more persons, one of whom will be chairman. It may not be a tribunal; it might be three persons, it might be two. It might be four or five, depending on the importance and nature of the expropriation. I would think, perhaps, that three persons sitting in, as I say, Essex county or in Renfrew county or in the district of Thunder Bay or elsewhere, would be local persons, and they would sit, review the situation, bring the parties together and resolve it in dollars and cents. If we follow the experience of The Department of Highways there will be very few cases that will go on to the Ontario municipal board or to any other judicial court or tribunal to finalize the matter and thereby bring expense upon the person whose property is being taken.

That, I think, Mr. Speaker, should be sufficient to allay some of the fears which have been expressed here today.

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): Mr. Speaker, I will take a moment to make some comments, if I may, because of the fact that The Department of Highways is very much interested in this type of legislation.

I think, Mr. Speaker, with respect, that the hon. members who have been critical of the bill are belabouring a point which is not valid in the context of the bill that is before the Legislature this afternoon.

Now I say, in fairness, that if the hon. members who are critical believe that negotiation is preferable to arbitration they will, as will many others across this province, welcome this legislation. Here I submit to you, sir, without any reasonable prejudice to the positions of parties involved, that there is a provision for consideration of positions in an atmosphere of relative informality, without involving the employment of counsel and without occasioning the related costs. In short, I submit to you, sir, that in laymen's conversation these matters can be resolved on the basis of negotiation. In this manner many disputes can be resolved to the satisfaction of all parties in probably a very great majority of circumstances. I would like to make reference, if I may, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that similar procedures were employed for a rather substantial period of time before the fuel board, which later became the energy board. So far as I am aware, all of those situations were resolved to the satisfaction of the parties involved in these hearings. I do say, Mr. Speaker, that as Minister of Highways, this proposal has been thoroughly considered by myself and my department, and is welcomed. Our record of property acquisition or, to use the unpopular word, land expropriation, as the hon. Attorney General made reference to, in the two-year period ending March 31, 1963, involved the acquisition of 8,010 individual parcels of land. In only 40 instances, out of the 8,010—less than half of one per cent—was it found necessary to resolve these situations by arbitration.

Having said that, I do not propose for one minute to say to the House, and to the hon. members who have been critical of this bill, that we have obtained perfection in this field. We do not feel—

Mr. Singer: What you are saying is you have been doing it without the legislation.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: We do not feel we have attained perfection in this field yet.

Mr. Singer: This legislation adds nothing to what you now do.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Well, of course, Mr. Speaker, I am trying to substantiate that it does, and this is the area of great difference of opinion between myself and the hon. member for Downsview.

Now, while we have had what might appear to be a satisfactory record, I am prepared to say that there have been situations resolved that did not always leave the best taste in the mouth of the party to whom the proposition was made. First, may I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that in The Department of Highways, and I am prepared to say that this characterizes every land-acquiring body of government, it is recognized to the fullest extent possible that we want or require the land and that in most—if not all circumstances—the property owner does not particularly want to part with it. So against that premise, and against that background, are all the reasonable pursuits associated with land acquisition employed.

Now, to hon. members today who have been critical, I say they draw the red herring of the property-acquisition procedures of the Pittock dam across the face of this proposed legislation. I say that it is no more than drawing that red herring across the face of this proposed legislation, because I submit to you that if this legislation had been in effect at that time, it would have gone a long way to resolving the problems associated with these transactions. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the hon. members of the House, that there are two fundamental positions involved in the process of acquiring land for public purposes.

One is simply the best and most judicious, fair and economical use of public funds. Secondly, the employment of the fairest possible treatment of those owners from whom property is required, recognizing again that in all or in the majority of cases the owner does not want to sell, although this is not always the case.

Recognizing the fairness of this premise and regardless of some criticisms levelled here today, it has been my experience that a greater basis of fair play characterizes our land-acquisition procedures than most people realize. Nevertheless, this bill makes it possible to process these situations on a much fairer, much more equitable, basis—on a basis of negotiation rather than arbitration. I submit to you that it will be welcomed by my department and, I repeat, it will be welcomed by hundreds of people across this province who have and will become involved in this sort of thing.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the select committee on expropriations, I want to say a few words. Probably the best way would be to read from the report, because it seems to me that this bill just brings in a pale image of the recommendations of that committee. That is strange, too, because the deputy Attorney General was the secretary of that committee and would be able to give the hon. Attorney General valuable contributions. It seems, even though he is not in the Cabinet, you might have also consulted the former Attorney General, the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas, because he was the chairman of that committee. We had many serious problems presented to us and quite a number of them had to do with The Department of Highways. I must say that the Minister then was the chairman of the committee and not the present hon. Minister, but there were, no doubt, many problems in which The Department of Highways was involved.

One of the most serious problems was the confusion that existed in the minds of individual property owners as to how they could obtain an independent decision which would lay to rest the problem between himself and the public authority. The conclusion of the committee was, in its opinion, that it did not seem advisable to increase the work load of the judiciary and also to trust to the Ontario municipal board, because it has so many other matters brought to its attention in addition to matters of compensation and expropriation. It was the committee's recommendation that a special tribunal be set up by the government which would be solely responsible for the assessment of compensation arising from expropriation and associated powers, with consideration given to such a tribunal with a sufficient membership to deal expeditiously with matters before it.

This was the unanimous opinion and the consensus of the committee, which included members of the government and members of the Opposition, and we discussed it at great length. We had the opportunity to visit many areas of this province and other jurisdictions, and I think we made a definite contribution in this particular phase of it. If the board of negotiators cannot bring the parties together you will have to have some sort of tribunal, or probably go to a judge or the Ontario municipal board. I think I said in the beginning that I agree with the hon. member for Downsview and the hon. member for York South that this is not what we had expected.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, might I just speak to the remarks of the hon. member? The committee which—

Mr. Speaker: I may point out to the Minister that this is a routine motion and you are really only supposed to speak once to a routine motion. It is not a substantive motion, but if the member for Nipissing would wish you to reply to something, I would allow a question and an answer.

Mr. Troy: Well, I would be really pleased to note that any comment of mine would draw a reply from the hon. Attorney General.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I thank the hon. member and I assure him I always listen to what he has to say with great interest.

I would like to say to him that the committee, which was not perhaps as formal as the one he served on, included four of my Cabinet colleagues. I neglected to mention the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Stewart); I did mention the hon. Minister of Highways, the hon. Minister of Public Works and the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs. I think that the departments they head are particularly concerned with expropriations. Mr. Dick, the deputy, was the secretary of our committee.

I think I would just like to say, sir, that the board recommended by our study—I would like to call it a tribunal; or the board of negotiators is what we call it in the Act. I think this is a refinement on the idea of a formal permanent tribunal which might somewhat resemble the Ontario municipal board. I think we perhaps are presenting to you in this bill something which will be more workable and achieve a better result than the original report perhaps suggested.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on this motion, the point which concerns me about the procedure which has been adopted is the pattern which the government appears to be adopting on every occasion when there is a basic problem to be dealt with. The government feels that, if it interjects an additional or alternate procedure in a bill, it will solve the problem.

The basic problem no one will disagree with, is that, if the government exercises its power to expropriate—and everyone here agrees that it must have that power in certain circumstances—there will be a dispute as to the compensation payable. Under the bill and the motion which is before us, an informal procedure is adopted to negotiate—and we agree with the principle of negotiation rather than arbitration—to negotiate a settlement. Having negotiated a settlement, there is no requirement that there be any further proceedings. The negotiation of the settlement, and the settlement finally arrived at, may very well be in complete disregard of the principles of compensation which have been developed over a long period of time. The position would then be that if a settlement is not reached and the parties have to go to arbitration, they will immediately be faced with an entirely different atmosphere, namely, the atmosphere of an arbitration board which is bound by certain long-established principles.

It would be our view that rather than insert an additional procedure in an already complicated and difficult situation, the government should seriously consider restating the basic principle of compensation to take into account the various items enumerated by the hon. member for York South in settling the amount which a person is to receive for his property. The purpose, as we see it, which could be elaborated in finer terms, is simply the wish of the person whose property is expropriated that he be relocated in a comparable situation without any financial loss to himself, and without having to incur any additional expense.

Mr. Speaker, it is our submission that this procedure, while it does provide an informal method of arriving at a settlement, does not in any way deal with the fundamental problem as to the ultimate purpose and basis of compensation. We feel that this restatement of the principle of compensation requires careful thought, because it is quite certain that in the course of the next several years, government will use the powers of expropriation to a much greater extent than it has in the past, and will use them in circumstances where it takes substantial tracts of land. It is our wish that everything be done to prevent the development of strong emotional feelings in the minds of those whose property is taken, and to do so by specifically restating the basis on which compensation is to be established.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House the motion carry? All those in favour of the motion will please say "aye." All those opposed will please say "nay."

In my opinion, the ayes have it.

Call in the members.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE PUBLIC LANDS ACT

Hon. A. K. Roberts (Minister of Lands and Forests) moves second reading of Bill No. 43, An Act to amend The Public Lands Act.

Hon. A. K. Roberts (Minister of Lands and Forests): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few remarks to the House in relation to the problem that is partly dealt with by the amending bill.

I would point out that the amendment indicated in section 2 sets out procedure whereby the Minister of Lands and Forests may release a reservation in letters patent reserving free access to the shores of land that is situate in a municipality, where the release is in the public interest or the reservation no longer serves a useful purpose.

I would like to acquaint the House with some of the problems that various access clauses, reserves and road allowances create. I may say that there was instituted in my department, through the legal branch, an inquiry into this broad subject and it has revealed some real problems. Visits were made to numerous registry and land titles offices in focal points across the province, and the problems and implications of the various clauses were thoroughly canvassed. They can be divided into three categories:

(1) The fisheries clause—reserving right of access to the shores of all rivers, streams and lakes for all vessels, boats and persons, together with a right to use so much of the banks thereof, not exceeding one chain in depth from the water's edge, as may be necessary for fishery purposes.

(2) The free access clause—reserving the right of access to the shores of all rivers, streams and lakes for all vessels, boats and persons.

(3) The 66-foot allowance—In the majority of grants of Crown land in central and northern Ontario, there was established a 66-foot strip between the land and the water or the high water mark. This strip of land may fall into one of three categories, as follows:

Either (a), a road allowance that is laid down by the Crown surveyors, either in the original survey or the survey prepared for the purpose of the grant; or (b), a strip not actually in the Crown patent and which may be created either by exception thereof in the grant, or by describing the land as lying 66 feet in perpendicular width from the high water mark; or (c), a reservation for road allowance where the letters patent expressly provide therefor.

The fisheries clause was approved by orders-in-council dated May 7, 1887, of the Ontario Legislature after it had, by The Fisheries Act of 1885, assumed control of the fisheries in the inland waters of the province. The clause is in use today with wide variations. For example, the federal authority recently served notice on landowners bordering the Great Lakes to obtain access to streams and to study and control the lamprey eel. The clause has been used also to obtain access to shoreline property for fishing.

The only judicial interpretation that I have been able to find on the clause is that contained in a report of a prosecution R. vs. Davy, 27, Ontario OAC Reports—those are the old reports, Ontario Appeal Court Reports —page 508. The end result of that case was that while such a right gave the accused, in common with the public, the right to come to the shore from the water, it gave him no right to access from the shore to the land.

The public lands investigation committee, which sat a few years ago, heard a number of briefs drawing attention to the use of the 66-foot road allowance for roads, and strips of public land for camping and picnicking, and cases of buildings being erected on the road allowance or the 66-foot strip of land. Having said this, I would point out that section 459 of The Municipal Act provides a method for the closing and the sale of road allowances in municipalities. Where the road allowance is in unorganized territory, it may be stopped up and sold under section 480 of The Municipal Act by the Lieutenant-Governor-in-Council.

In the case of the strip of land referred to in (b) of the foregoing, the strip may be disposed of by grant under The Public Lands Act. The item under (c), the reservation for road allowance, may be dealt with under Section 69 of The Public Lands Act where the land is situate in a municipality.

It is the view of my department that the fisheries clause requires further study by an interdepartmental committee, but that the free access clause, which is the one now in this bill, should be proceeded with as provided by this bill now before the House.

As for the 66-foot road allowance, again a further and more exhaustive study is required before I would be in a position to make any recommendations for legislation, but as I have said, the existing legislation does provide methods for dealing with individual cases as they arise. This will now be extended by this bill to the free access clause type of reservation, similar to the present provision for road allowance closing under The Public Lands Act in the municipality.

The other amendments are merely recommended to assure that the original letters patent will reach the registry office and the office of the Master of Titles directly after issue.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE BAILIFFS ACT, 1960-1961

Hon. Mr. Wishart moves second reading of Bill No. 46, An Act to amend The Bailiffs Act, 1960-1961.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE ALCOHOLISM AND DRUG ADDICTION RESEARCH FOUNDATION ACT, 1965

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health) moves second reading of Bill No. 48, The Alcoholism and Drug Addiction Research Foundation Act, 1965.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, while this is really a consolidation of the original bill and all the amendments that have been passed thereto, in the interim I would like to take the opportunity to observe to hon. members that often many of us are unaware that the province of Ontario provides, as part of its health services to the people, the outstanding alcoholism control programme in Canada and one of the most outstanding, in fact, in the whole world. This is the alcoholism and drug addiction research foundation, which operates under this Act and has headquarters here on the University of Toronto campus. It conducts a programme of research, treatment and education that reaches out to all parts of our province.

The foundation, as we were told a few days ago, is under the very able direction of Mr. David Archibald, and he and his staff are well known and very highly regarded wherever scientists, clinicians and educators gather to work out better ways of managing and of preventing the universal curse of addiction.

Many important conferences have been held all across the world—in Turkey, Holland, Italy, Poland, the Scandinavian countries, the United Kingdom, and in practically every state of the Union to the south of us. Mr. Archibald and his associates have been invited to share their knowledge with those seeking answers to the problems created by the chronic, excessive use of alcohol and other addicting substances.

For example, the world health organization in Geneva and the international council on alcohol and alcoholism, in Lausanne, Switzerland, have both sought out Mr. Archibald for service on consulting boards and committees. In fact, many people in Ontario and, indeed, some members of this House, do not have as keen an appreciation of the work of this remarkable foundation as do some people of eminence and influence beyond the boundaries of our nation.

It is for this reason, Mr. Speaker, that in presenting the bill for second reading, I felt it might be appropriate to emphasize again the principles upon which are based the most significant features of the foundation's current operations.

I am repeating some of the things that were said in this House last Friday afternoon, but there are an estimated 100,000 alcoholics in Ontario; some 83,000 of them are found living in urban centres; some 50,000 of them are fully employed; some 16,000 of them are women, but only 9,000 of the total 100,000 can be classified as the "down and out, chronic drunkenness offenders."

The average alcoholic in Ontario is a man in his most productive years, with a job and an established home and a family, all being threatened by his inability to stop drinking. This is the man whom it is particularly important to save, and whose family it is important to save.

Considering the fact that a man with a job, a home, and a family has more to live for, and more to come back to, he is a far better bet for rehabilitation. His prognosis, therefore, is more favourable than is that of the man who has lost, or may never have had, a stable job, a wife, children or a place in the community. This is the reason why the addiction foundation is paying special attention to the treatment and rehabilitation of alcoholic employees.

Approximately half of the province's total alcoholic population is employed, and the facts show that a higher rehabilitation rate is possible with this group—up to 80 per cent reported by at least two companies, and 60 per cent is a figure commonly reported as recoveries by others. Therefore, there is substantial cause for hope that the participation of enlightened employers in a clearcut, positive plan for recognizing and handling alcoholic employees will materially reduce the prevalence of alcoholism in Ontario. To get at these employers, a very intensive programme of education is necessary.

The foundation is constantly working diligently to promote greater interest and understanding on the part of major Ontario employers in this matter, and only a few weeks ago conducted a significant three-day seminar involving personnel, medical directors and senior operating executives from ten large Ontario companies. Out of such meetings as these, sir, with factual information and leadership given by the foundation, will come constructive policies and organized plans for overcoming alcoholism in many thousands of Ontario men and women.

This, we believe, will go a long way toward interrupting the development of alcohol addiction and its later degenerative disorders. But even the best case-finding, treatment and rehabilitation procedures will not accomplish the more basic job of primary prevention—getting at the public health problem before its onset in the individual. This, then, is the task of education.

Something like 45 per cent of Ontario's total population at the last census was under 24 years of age. These are the young people who must be adequately informed about the effects of alcohol, who must be convinced that getting drunk is not proof of manliness, who must be protected against the inappropriate use of alcoholic beverages. Many of them, in a sense at least, must be protected against themselves, against their own inadequacies, their insecurities, the feelings that may make them specially vulnerable to the comforting—and I question that word—effects of alcohol. They must be protected against learning to become dependent upon such effects.

Therein lie two of the tap roots of alcoholism, or so it seems to me: First, dangerous ignorance of the action of alcohol in the human body; and second, immature personality.

If, as I have suggested, both facts and personal development are involved in the primary prevention of alcoholism, then it becomes clear that the two most important agents in accomplishing this goal are the school and the home. The addiction research foundation recognizes these facts of life and through its education division it is working in these two complementary directions.

Since 1953 when the foundation provided its first teacher training on this subject at a department of education institute, there has developed a very healthy working relationship between the foundation and the teaching profession. This has resulted in the preparation of an alcohol studies guide by the foundation for The Department of Education and in the creation of printed materials, motion picture and filmstrips now widely used in secondary schools across this province. Many of these audio-visual aids and teaching materials, by the way, have been sought by other provinces, states of the United States of America and other English-speaking countries. Translations have already been made of some of them into French, Hungarian and other languages, again for use beyond the boundaries of our own nation.

Over 1.5 million copies of the foundation's first comic book on this subject, It's Best to Know about Alcohol, have already been printed; and a second such illustrated booklet, entitled Man and Chemical Comforts, along with another booklet—a development of the foundation which was placed on every hon-member's desk yesterday. This last one has only recently come off the press and has already been acclaimed as another breakthrough in education technique to prevent addiction, this time in the drug field.

It is worth noting in respect to the foundation's work with the teaching profession that there are two principal reasons for its acceptance: First, the foundation deals only in scientifically validated facts and avoids exaggeration and emotional scare techniques; and second, the foundation recognizes that it is the prerogative and responsibility of the professional teacher to work with the young people in classrooms and that outsiders have no right to invade schools for the purpose of making speeches on such subjects as alcohol problems.

But the teacher can only accomplish part of the job of preventive education. Even more basic than the role of the school is the role of the home. What parents say and do about alcoholic beverages is the most important single factor determining what young people will do about drinking. Evidence from a dozen well conducted surveys backs up the assertion that most children whose parents use alcoholic beverages will likely become users themselves, and most children of abstainers will probably remain abstainers.

Further, there is also strong evidence that most young people regard drinking as a means of demonstrating their adulthood. The kind of drinking behaviour they see in their own homes on the part of their parents and other significant adults will be the model for their own drinking behaviour.

That is a heavy responsibility for all of us to ponder—our responsibility as models of behaviour for the next generation.

As a matter of fact, that is essentially the basis of the foundation's main approach to Ontario parents. Their education division strives, through press, television, radio, movies, printed materials, and personal contact, to lay stress upon the responsibility of all adults to learn the facts about alcohol and its effects, to bear these in mind when they are drinking or serving alcoholic beverages and always to remember that adult drinkers are setting the example for young people just coming of drinking age.

Advertising in the mass media is becoming an increasingly important part of the foundation's approach to adult drinkers in Ontario. It is my belief that the facts about alcohol and its effects on people should be much more widely publicized and that massive campaigns will still have to be mounted to impress upon everybody that while drinking in appropriate amounts and on appropriate occasions may be all right, drunkenness is not acceptable any time, anywhere.

In its education work, the foundation is concerned not only with the general climate of society with respect to drunkenness and alcoholism, but also with the attitudes and skills of physicians, nurses, social workers, probation officers, magistrates, police, clergymen and others who have a professional responsibility for helping people with serious problems. This is accomplished through lectures by foundation medical staff to undergraduate students in medicine and allied fields, by clinical teaching in the foundation's own outpatient and in-patient services, by post graduate seminars and by the foundation's annual summer course on alcohol and problems of addiction.

This two-week summer course, which will be held this year at Carleton University and the University of Ottawa, attracts to it senior people in administrative and teaching posts in public and private organizations. They are selected on the basis of their subsequent influence on their colleagues throughout the province—in keeping with the foundation's belief that its good effects can be multiplied many times over by teaching the teachers.

In this connection, the foundation's widely quoted quarterly journal Addictions currently has an interesting article on the experiences of several doctors, nurses, social workers and others who have attended the course in past years and gone back to their communities to organize better ways of handling alcoholics. This comment from a doctor in Kenora is typical:

I would be very happy if one member of our community could attend the summer school each year. The benefits to be gained in return knowledge to the community are immense. It is a very stimulating experience to be associated with people from all walks of life with a common interest.

The universal reaction of professional people attending this foundation course is that it is a stimulating and enlightening experience to learn in this first-hand way about community teamwork. This is the way to go about cleaning up a widespread public health problem like alcoholism, by getting together a team of concerned men and women whose professional skills qualify them to play different complementary parts in the treatment and rehabilitation process and in grass-roots community education.

Through its new community services division, the foundation is now developing this kind of professional and community teamwork throughout the province. The board of the foundation recently adopted the recommendation of The Ontario Department of Economics and Development that the province be organized into ten regions. These economic regions dovetail very nicely with the foundation's orderly growth over the past 15 years and the foundation now has regional centres in Toronto, London, Ottawa, Hamilton and at the Lakehead; and the beginnings of programmes in Sudbury and Kingston.

There are also strong signs of interest in principal population centres of the remaining three economic regions. The next logical step in development will probably be the establishment of small in-patient alcoholism treatment units in each of the university centres of Ontario where training in the health professions is concentrated.

Although established chiefly as a research and education project, Mr. Speaker, the foundation has of late put greater emphasis upon its treatment services. This treatment programme is now functioning at ten different places in the province.

Currently, its clinical services include: 1. A small in-patient hospital at Toronto to be greatly augmented with the completion of the centre now in the architect's hands. 2. A specialized clinical study unit within a mental hospital at Kingston. 3. Six outpatient clinics located at Hamilton, London, Toronto central, Toronto east, Ottawa and Lakehead. 4. The Toronto central outpatient clinic includes specialized staff working with narcotic addiction patients; most other staff are primarily concerned with alcoholics. 5. Two additional regional programmes are now being developed at Sudbury and Windsor.

Last year, 1964, the total number of patients treated in the foundation clinics was 2,744. This is in addition to the 3,950 alcoholics treated in general hospitals throughout the province and the 1,500 treated in the Ontario hospitals spread across the province.

Treatment of narcotic addicts remains largely confined to the special narcotic addiction unit established in the latter part of 1963. This is primarily an outpatient unit seeking to handle as many patients as possible on an outpatient withdrawal technique.

The ultimate aim of treatment is to return the addict to the mainstream of society in a drug-free state—to be achieved over a period of time, which will vary according to the diagnosis and to each patient's potential.

It is too early to assess any results of the work in the narcotic addiction field. But progress to date has been quite encouraging.

Now, sir, it is relatively easy to recognize programmes of education and treatment. It is often difficult to grasp the very necessary and important research programme, yet it is in this work in both social and biological sciences that this Ontario programme has earned a significant place among the research centres of the world.

Over the years our foundation's research programmes have, among other things, developed a new protective drug known as Temposil which helps physicians to treat alcoholism; developed devices which now enable our police to take breath samples at considerable distances from the location of their apparatus for analyzing such samples in connection with impaired driving; discovered new information as to the portion of the brain in which alcohol's effects begin; pioneered the experimental use of a new type of conditioned aversion treatment for alcoholics; tested many drugs and evaluated their role in relation to treatment of addictions; conducted several large-scale studies of the alcoholic population in certain areas, from which we now know what different kinds of alcoholics there are in Ontario and what needs to be done to deal more successfully than in the past with the chronic drunkenness offender or skid-row group of alcoholics.

I propose this bill for second reading, Mr. Speaker, and in trying to emphasize the great value of this entire service to our people, I can do no better than to quote the observation of the late Dr. E. M. Jellinek, former consultant to the world health organization and undisputed dean of the world's alcoholism researchers—a man who, in his latter years, greatly assisted us in our programme here, sir, and who had, prior to his death, bequeathed to our foundation his complete library, which was extensive, on this area of health care. He said this:

The foundation has one of the most modern programmes in the world. Whereas some countries become so obsessed with one phase of a programme that it gets out of hand, the Ontario foundation has neatly balanced research, treatment, and education programmes which supplement each other. Its officers have their feet as solidly on the ground as any other in the world.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE MEDICAL ACT

Hon. Mr. Dymond moves second reading of Bill No. 49, An Act to amend The Medical Act.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, the principle of this bill, as I understand it, is in one part to extend the disciplinary jurisdiction of the college of physicians and surgeons to include incompetence of a member. My concern lies in the piecemeal method in which this particular problem is being dealt with by the government.

My concern arose because of the reports which appeared in the Globe and Mail on February 27 in connection with an inquest which was held in Hamilton. On that day, if I may quote from the Globe and Mail, the report stated that:

Ontario's supervising coroner yesterday warned the public that the province's doctors may refuse to give treatment involving medical risks in the future if their judgments are constantly being subjected to courtroom analysis.

He is quoted as saying:

If each time a doctor's reputation is going to be put on a griddle when a case turns out with unfortunate complications or death, then doctors are going to be reluctant in future to carry out certain procedures involving great risks and even refuse to do so, which is their right even though they know it should be done in the best interests of the thorough care of the patient.

The coroner's jury, in that particular instance consisting of five men and one woman, found that the woman patient in a hospital who had received an overdose of blood transfusions died of heart failure. The jury made no recommendation and did not comment on testimony by six medical specialists that the patient received too much blood in too short time probably contributing to her death last October 1.

Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that at the present time the way in which the competence or incompetence of a professional person, in this case a medical doctor, can be in question is either in an action in the courts for malpractice, or by the finding of a coroner's jury, and that the proposed bill will provide that this incompetence will be a matter within the jurisdiction of the college of physicians and surgeons.

My concern is not with the inclusion of this provision in the jurisdiction of the college of physicians and surgeons, if we could be satisfied that there is no intention on the part of the supervising coroner to substitute in some way this method of determining the competence or incompetence of medical doctors for the method of decision of a coroner's jury.

It would appear to me that this is a very real risk because of the rather forceful and, indeed, inappropriate, in my opinion, remarks of the supervising coroner in the case of the inquest to which I referred. On that particular occasion there would appear to be little, if any, doubt because of the opinion of the various doctors who expressed themselves at that inquest that, in fact, there was incompetence. But because of the very forceful way in which the supervising coroner chose to express himself to that jury, it brought in a verdict without making any comment on the competence of the doctor involved. The supervising coroner complimented the jury and told them that he thought it a very reasonable verdict.

Mr. Speaker, I am aware that this is a very difficult subject when it comes, being a professional man myself, to have one's competence questioned in a way which may be detrimental to the future earning capacity of the man. I do not underestimate the difficulty of the problem, but I would like to have assurance from the hon. Minister of Health or from the hon. Attorney General that there is no intention to interfere in any way with the freedom of a coroner's jury to express itself as to the causes of death, and to the reasons for it, and to make such recommendations as they see fit to make.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member, but I must say that he, in my opinion, is really "reaching." I cannot see, sir, that there is any piecemeal method of dealing with this matter. The college of physicians and surgeons, in our understanding, has always had the right and the authority to deal with matters of this kind, but heretofore it was covered by a section in the Act, the wording of which was not satisfactory to the college nor to the profession, and certainly not very pleasing. It was dealt with under the section dealing with "disgraceful or infamous conduct in a professional sense."

I suppose if one were to stretch one's imagination, incompetence could be considered under that, but it is rather far-fetched, I believe, to suggest that incompetence should be "infamous conduct." At least, it is not as a rule deliberately done.

The adequacy or otherwise of the amendments, I think, can be based on the fact that this is the amendment sought by the profession, sought by the college of physicians and surgeons which is the only body charged with the responsibility, or given the authority, for disciplining doctors in the province. I would hope that we will never reach the stage where any other body will have this responsibility.

I think that none are better equipped to judge their peers, their competence or otherwise, than members of the same profession. This I think applies to all professions as it does to medicine.

It is quite true the supervising coroner did say in that particular case that there might well be a reluctance on the part of doctors to deal with difficult cases. I would suggest, sir, with very great respect, that I would disagree with the supervising coroner in this regard. And this, I suppose, is typical of medical people. If you get five of them together, you are liable to get five different opinions.

I do not think that this will have any bearing on the judgment of the serious-minded physician. Many physicians may be reluctant on many occasions to deal with certain cases when the question of life and death may very well hang in the balance. It would be very easy to say: Well, the patient is not going to get better anyway, let us do nothing. But this, I would hope, will never epitomize the practice of medicine. I therefore disagree with the supervising coroner that any of these cases that are coming up will cause any reluctance on the part of good physicians to deal with cases, no matter how difficult they are. Now to say there could be any possibility through this amendment, or these amendments, of the doctor's competence or otherwise not being called in question by court action or by coroner's jury, is again reaching quite far out, sir, I would suggest.

I would hope that not all our cases come to a coroner's jury. Under this amendment, as in the past, complaints of incompetence or charges of incompetence can be laid against physicians by their peers, by the hospital or by patients or their families and dealt with by the disciplinary committee of the college of physicians and surgeons.

This will continue to be, and there is no possibility, sir, that The Department of Health will ever interfere with the coroner in his duty, or with the coroner's jury. We have no authority to do so and I am quite certain that the coroner is fully aware of this and would tell us where our authority began and ended. The Department of Health has nothing in the world to do with the coroner's duties or coroners' juries. There is not any possibility that this amendment will give anyone the right to interfere with the coroner in carrying out his proper duties, or with coroners' juries either.

To say that there is no doubt of incompetence in this case, again, Mr. Speaker, I say with great respect, is making a statement that can hardly be backed up.

Five doctors thought that the patient got too much blood, after the patient was dead; but I do not believe one of the five doctors was called in consultation on the case or saw the case while the patient was still living.

Who is to judge, other than the doctors who were directly involved in the case? Who is to judge the risks that were inherent in this treatment? Here again might very well have been a case where the doctor was faced with a decision—the patient's life is in balance anyway—and did what he believed was best, according to his judgment and his lights at the time.

Hindsight, of course, is always better than foresight, sir. I would also suggest that a newspaper report is not the most satisfactory basis for judging what was actually said in the coroner's jury. I did not see a transcript of evidence in this case, before the coroner's jury, but I would be more inclined, if I were judging the case, sir, to look at the transcript of evidence than to depend on the reporter's accounting of it, bound as that is by the amount of space allotted to him or allocated to him.

I do not believe that there is any danger inherent in this. In fact, I feel quite confident there is not. I believe it is an additional safeguard and it is believed to be this by the college of physicians and surgeons charged with the responsibility of passing upon the competence or otherwise of doctors in the province.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to add a few words on this debate. We, on this side of the House, are going to support this bill. At the same time we realize the problem that this bill tries to face is most important and there is no one complete answer.

In some respects I agree with the hon. Minister of Health, and in other respects I would say that the hon. member for Riverdale tells much that is the truth. I think there has been a tendency in the past, in the minds of the general public, whether rightly or wrongly, that the medical profession has been too close, that they tend to protect each other. I think the fact that this legislation is coming before the House is evidence to the public that the medical profession is most anxious to supervise itself. I think that the best place where they should be supervised is by the doctors themselves.

For a long time there seemed to be little press, or very few cases, in which doctors were involved. Then suddenly, within the past 18 months, there has been a great rush of cases where the coroner's jury has been called in. I think that some of them have been most unfortunate, for the simple reason that often the careers of medical men have been blasted where they should not have been blasted.

There have been cases, one or two of them, of obvious wrongdoing. But the difficulty of a coroner's jury—and this again will come up under the estimates of the hon. Attorney General, Mr. Speaker, because it is affected in the principle of this bill—the problem of a coroner's jury is that so much can take place during the hearing of a coroner's jury where a doctor has little or no chance to defend himself. He is literally on trial and yet he does not have a lawyer there to defend him. All he can do is sit quietly and listen to many things that, insofar as his career is concerned, are wrong.

In the last 18 months there has been something that has amounted to a witch hunt on the doctors here in the province of Ontario, and I think in many cases it has been most unfair to them. If it keeps going the way it has with these coroners' investigations, it will reach a point where a doctor will be afraid to make a house call.

I certainly agree with what the hon. Minister of Health has said: "Who is to judge when it is a matter of life and death?" Certainly a doctor has to make a decision. It could easily go either way, and we must be very careful that we do not interpret these medical decisions so strictly that it will inhibit the medical profession in making the decisions that are required, and in some cases decisions that are going to mean trying something new.

If a person is on the verge of death a doctor is quite properly going to take more risk than he otherwise would. I think that this is something that we should bear in mind.

It is all very easy to bring a doctor before a coroner's jury and say: You should have done this, or you should have done that. But after all, it is the medical profession that has the technical skill and they should be the ones that in the vast majority of cases are the obvious judges.

That is why I say to this House, Mr. Speaker, that section 2 of this bill is a good section. At the same time, I would urge that a great deal of discretion be used in treating medical cases before coroners' juries. Of course, a coroner's jury is most important, but we must keep in mind that the doctors, to my mind, do not have proper legal representation before these coroners' juries. I think that it is time The Attorney-General's Department took note of this; and also the hon. Minister of Health, in his sphere, should bring what pressure he can to bear on The Attorney General's Department, to see to it insofar as doctors especially are concerned—and of course in many other cases, but in this instance it will be the doctors—that they receive proper legal protection, which they are not receiving.

It is hoped, Mr. Speaker, that by this bill and especially by section 2, many cases that might come before a coroner's jury will be settled properly within the medical profession. But it is a word of warning also to the medical profession, that it is most important that the general public not only know, but believe, that there are no cases being covered up, that this is in the open. I would say that this section gives the medical profession the opportunity it needs to discipline its own members and avoid as much as possible, these most unfortunate—and I think in some cases, most unfair cases—that come before the coroners' juries.

THE NURSES ACT

Hon. Mr. Dymond moves second reading of Bill No. 51, An Act to amend The Nurses Act.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to see that the hon. Minister has brought this bill before the House because the nursing assistants in the city of Windsor have been expecting this for a little over a year.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member has taken in the purport of the bill? At the present time the association is known as the association of certified nursing assistants. There has been some confusion in the minds of some people lest this be taken to mean the Canadian nursing association—CNA in both cases. With the passage of The College of Nurses Act, two years ago, certified nursing assistants came to be known as registered nursing assistants and therefore we are changing the name of the association to the Ontario association of registered nursing assistants.

Mr. Newman: That is the information I had.

THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE ACT

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture) moves second reading of Bill No. 57, An Act to amend The Department of Agriculture Act.

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a few comments in regard to Bill No. 57. They are going to be very brief.

I realize that this bill is intended to re-enact the extension of guaranteed loans made to farmers who suffered damage from drought or army worms, for the purposes of purchasing hay and grain. However, last year we had a situation where the farmers in eastern Ontario were subjected to the elements to the extent that the hon. Prime Minister declared the area a disaster area. As a matter of fact, last year was the worst as I understand it, but the year previous was also bad as far as drought conditions were concerned in the area, and it culminated in a serious situation last year.

I was wondering, in this connection and as far as this bill is concerned, whether the hon. Minister would consider putting a forgiveness clause in the bill, for payment of the guaranteed loan after a certain period of time. My purpose in saying that is, if you have conditions existing for a considerable period of time, even two or three years, conditions that originally made the guarantee of the loan necessary, then I think that really all we are doing is prolonging the agony when we guarantee loans to farmers under these conditions. Eventually these loans have to be paid off, and if conditions are such that the loans cannot be paid off, or if the farmer has experienced very great difficulty in so doing, then perhaps we should consider a forgiveness clause in this regard.

I was wondering whether my hon. friend would give consideration to such a matter.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, first of all I am sure my hon. friend recognizes that in this bill there is a three-year repayment clause for the guarantee, which provides for the grain and the hay that may be purchased. We have also authorized an extension of the payment of any junior farmer loans that may apply to those in areas where this damage has been sustained or where army worm loss has been sustained by the farmer holding a junior farmer loan. In other words, he does not have to meet his principal payment this year; it can be extended another year, or it can be amortized over the remaining period of his loan.

This matter of the forgiveness clause is something that can be given consideration. Frankly, I think the farmer who feels he wants to maintain his herd in hopes that the drought may be relieved in eastern Ontario as it has been in western Ontario during this last year, and who has to buy hay this year to get his cattle through this period—and the figures I mentioned this afternoon would indicate that a great many farmers did have to do this and felt it worthwhile to do so. He would feel it was worth taking the risk to borrow and to pay that money back over a three-year period, which is the span of our guarantee, in order to hold his herd and maintain his breeding stock. I do not think that I would want at this stage—and I do not think my hon. friend would want me—to say that the government would consider forgiving these loans. We are surely not in that position. Farming is a business, like any other kind of business, and I think that the source of credit that was provided through this guarantee was sufficient to meet the needs for the various farmers involved. I would not want to give any indication that such forgiveness would be entertained at this particular stage.

THE FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING ACT

Hon. Mr. Stewart moves second reading of Bill No. 58, An Act to amend The Farm Products Marketing Act.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Speaker, I have a few comments to make in connection with Bill No. 58. It seems to me that our farm marketing legislation in this province has tended to embrace all the phases of the industry connected with producing and marketing of any one particular product. This philosophy is based on the premise that producers will sit down with processors, and vice versa, that in effect management will sit down with labour and bargain for the mutual benefit of all concerned. The analogy between labour-management and producer-processor in this case is not exactly accurate, because there are many more complications in the latter which tend to cloud the issue of establishing collective bargaining on the part of the farmer.

Nonetheless, we have seen examples recently, the latest of which was the tobacco situation where the buyers had no notion of bargaining in good faith. As a result, the whole industry was thrown into chaos. It seems we have gone from crisis to crisis in farm marketing, hogs, milk, tobacco, and now beans. In each of these cases the government, through the farm products marketing board, has come along and suggested—and in some cases, especially in the latter stages, demanded—that the particular marketing board comply with its wishes.

This has been interpreted by some people as the government wielding the big stick. I am sure this has not been intended, but it has resulted in this image being projected.

I look upon this piece of legislation as something that will remove the government directly from the day-to-day watchdog operations or watchdog approach in the operation of the marketing boards across the province. To me, this will place the onus more on the producers and other segments of the trade to work out their problems rather than having the government work them out for them. This, in my mind, will help to dispel the big-stick image which has been created in certain circles.

I feel this will be so, provided that each segment of the trade is given the opportunity to elect members of their own group to the industry advisory committees. I feel that this is very important.

Actually, we have industry advisory committees operating at the present time in some respects, and in dealing with some of our marketing boards. I am thinking of hogs now, in particular. But they have not been given that name. I feel that this is, in effect, giving them official recognition. In this way I think they will be given status and authority which, up to this point, they have not had. I think because of this they will be able to deal more effectively with marketing and with the marketing problems in this province. In so doing, of course, their observations and recommendations, to my mind, will carry much more weight with all branches of the industry.

It would be my hope, Mr. Speaker, that this industry advisory committee will assume a certain amount of public relations work on behalf of all segments of the industry, including the consumers, the producers, and the processors, so that every segment of the trade is kept informed of what is going on in the various groups and in the other branches concerned with the marketing of a particular product.

To me, this kind of mutual understanding is absolutely essential.

I am wondering if this particular bill and this particular Act which sets up the establishment of industry advisory committees is going to be mandatory for every marketing board. I think that it would not be; I think that the initiative would have to come from the marketing boards themselves. If this is so, I would hope that the hon. Minister will make this knowledge available to all the marketing boards across the province so that they are fully aware that this is available, and that they can do this; perhaps, in some cases, that they should do it.

Now, finally, in connection with the conciliation board, I am wondering if there will be only one conciliation board dealing with all plans and with every marketing board where the negotiating-type agency fails to reach an agreement. I am wondering if one conciliation board will handle all the disputes, or if, in the phrase in the bill, "in connection with each plan" could conceivably mean that conciliation boards will be set up for every plan which happens to run into trouble from time to time.

All in all, we in this party will support this bill because we feel it is a step forward in farm-market legislation in this province, because it gets the government out of jumping into every fray and trying to settle every disagreement and, in effect, acting as a referee. Marketing boards, I hope, will be freer to run their own business without government interference. We will support this bill.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Just a further question of the hon. Minister, Mr. Speaker. Might I ask him about the conciliation boards; how are they set up and what personnel will be there and what powers will they have? In industry, of course, when a conciliation board is set up, they make recommendations; then there are certain sanctions that the disputing powers can bring to bear after a certain length of time. Those sanctions, I would think, would be perhaps non-existent in this case. Is this simply a mediating body? It mentions this, and it makes recommendations, but what is beyond that? Is there any thought in the mind of the hon. Minister as to what function this board might fulfil in that respect?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to say I am pleased with the comments of the hon. member for Huron-Bruce who has spoken favourably on behalf of his party in regard to this proposed amendment to this Act. I think I can answer the hon. member for Yorkview in the same connection.

First of all, the advisory board is not mandatory. This is up to the particular marketing or commodity group involved. The whole basis of the introduction of these amendments is that I have felt for some time that where a commodity group finds difficulty in arriving at a satisfactory price between the processor and the producer group, through the process of negotiation and conciliation they may be able to resolve these difficulties without going to the hard-and-fast procedure of arbitration under a judge in a fixed course of action. Perhaps it is due to my rural upbringing, but I have always felt that a lot could be determined and resolved if two people sit down across the table from one another and talk over these things and try to arrive at a common solution.

This is actually what has generated these recommended amendments. The advisory board will deal, as in the case of hogs, as my hon. friend mentioned, with related problems—not together with price, because we know that price in the case of hogs is established on the open market through auction. But there are other matters that relate to the handling of hogs, both from the standpoint of the producer organization and the standpoint of the processor. When they can sit down, as they do now, with an amicable relationship and discuss these things, they can resolve many of them and they have accomplished this and we think this is an excellent step forward.

I think we will have to agree that there have been times when some of our commodity groups advisory boards—and they are known as advisory boards now, or advisory committees—have not been as successful. I think we are all disappointed to know this, but we can always hope that with a change of climate in relationships between the two groups, these relationships will improve and these advisory committees will be more effective. We have every reason to believe this to be the case.

As far as conciliation boards are concerned, they will deal with price negotiations and will have no authority to say to either group that it must accept something. They simply will take on the aspect of trying to work out what seems to be a reasonable relationship, but always with the alternative in the final analysis that the same procedure can be followed as is now followed. This procedure is that a judge can be appointed by the farm products marketing board, and each group can appoint a representative to that arbitration board. They sit down and finally hammer out the solution and an arbitrated price.

Now frankly, I just do not like to see these things happen. I feel there should be a period of conciliation here, where these groups can sit down and resolve these difficulties through a conciliation board. It could be composed of people who might not have a direct interest in this particular commodity, so that no one could say he had a biased or prejudiced opinion on either side. However, they might be able to have a common knowledge of marketing problems—a place where the groups could sit down with a group which would say, "Well, having listened to both sides it would appear to us that this is the proper course that might be followed." And having made that suggestion to the two groups involved, the board might hope that they would be able to accept that kind of suggestion, coming from one who might not be particularly biased. However, if they fail to agree and they throw the whole thing out, they can always go back to what they have today. But as my hon. friend from Huron-Bruce has said, these two amendments really give official recognition and status to advisory-committees and conciliation-board procedures.

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, may I say to the hon. Minister, I do not think he fully answered the question that I asked in the first place as to how the boards will be set up. Will this be laid down in regulations? Will there be an appointment by one faction disputing and one by the other faction, and an appointment made by the Minister or chairman, or how will it be done?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I have not got the procedural outline here; it is in the office. As I recall when we drafted this and brought it to the Legislature, it was intended that the farm products marketing board would appoint the negotiating committee. This would be done, I would think, and I would hope, with the approval of the two groups involved in the problem under dispute, so that we did not appoint someone who was completely lacking in knowledge of the problem in its general principles.

I think my hon. friend would agree that if we were dealing with, say, a case involving negotiations for green beans, one would not want a green-bean grower sitting on that negotiation committee. One would want him to sit on the advisory committee, but when it comes to negotiation, one would not necessarily want that man there. However, one would want somebody who understood the marketing principles that were involved, which would make for an unprejudiced or unbiased opinion, or recommendation.

Mr. Young: Do I understand the hon. Minister to say that the marketing board involved would appoint the conciliation board?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: The farm products marketing board—the Ontario farm products marketing board.

Mr. Young: The marketing boards in the dispute or the processors in the dispute would not have the right to name people to these boards?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Not to the conciliation board. This would be my understanding. I am subject to correction on this. I must confess, as I say, I have not got the blueprint before me. Frankly I do not think it is of great concern. On the advisory committee, which is applied in the first amendment here, the members are members of the group, just as we have members of the hog board today and members of the processors, the meat packers council, on the other side of the table. There must be representatives of the commodity group and of the processor's involved. However, in this other case, frankly I think the farm products marketing board should appoint the negotiating committee, but not necessarily the same people who are involved. I think there is merit in that.

Mr. Young: It seems to me—

Mr. Speaker: I would like to advise the member that we are getting into a committee stage of debate again with regard to this bill. These questions and answers should be left until the bill reaches the committee of the whole House.

Mr. I. W. Thrasher (Windsor-Sandwich) moves second reading of Bill No. Pr9, An Act respecting the city of Windsor.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on this bill. This is the bill that will permit a cable car to be erected from the city of Windsor across to the city of Detroit. We in the community look forward to the eventual construction of this, because not only will it be a tremendous tourist attraction, but it also is going to be a first aerial link between any two countries in the world.

We will be able to transport people from Canada across the river by means of a cable car. This will be a Swiss-style cable car that will be able to carry four passengers at a time. It will be supported by two towers, 266 feet in the air, and it is going to be quite reasonable as far as the cost for individuals to use the facilities.

So, Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pride that I support the bill. Not only, as I mentioned earlier, from the fact that it is going to be a tourist attraction, but in this building, or this project, there are no government funds involved whatsoever. This is strictly private capital. It does go to show how far a community, when they are seriously interested, can project their image in encouraging private enterprise to come in and assist.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, MARCH 23, 1965

The House resumed at 8 o'clock, p.m.

Clerk of the House: The 30th order: House in committee of supply. Mr. W. E. Sandercock in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Chairman, in introducing the estimates for The Department of Municipal Affairs, I should like first to put on record some facts concerning the growth of Ontario municipalities and the extent to which the government of Ontario is now assisting them.

In order to give hon. members a record of comparative figures I would like to use 1953 as the ten-year base, as some of our statistics are completely available only to the end of 1963. If I do quote figures that are more up to date than that, I will so indicate.

For purposes of simplicity and clarity, I will use approximate figures, of course.

In 1953, the municipalities of this province raised locally, municipal revenues amounting to $327 million. In 1963, or ten years later, these same municipalities raised $874 million; which is an increase of 167 per cent.

During the same period the total net general provincial revenue was $364.5 million in 1953 and nearly 1.1 billion dollars in 1963; an increase of 200 per cent.

The net ordinary and capital provincial expenditures were $352 million in 1953 and $996.5 million in 1963; an increase of 182 per cent.

Grants paid to municipalities, boards and commissions by the province were over $137.5 million in 1953 and over $438 million in 1964; an increase of 218 per cent in eleven years.

As the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) pointed out in his address presenting his Budget for 1965 just recently, assistance to local authorities will be increased this year by $48.6 million to a total of $620.4 million.

This represents 47 per cent of the province's net ordinary revenue in the coming fiscal year, as against 39 per cent in 1953.

Ontario in 1953 had 966 municipal corporations and 12 years later it now has 979. These are made up as follows:

Metropolitan areas: There were none in 1953; there is one at present, that is Metropolitan Toronto Corporation.

Cities: There were 29 in 1953; there are now 32 cities.

Separated towns: There were eight in 1953; there are only seven at the present time.

Towns: There were 143 in 1953; there are now 151.

Villages: 157 in 1953; the same number today.

Townships: There were 572 in 1953; and there are 573 at the present time.

Improvement districts: 60 ten years ago; there are 20 now.

Park commissions: There were three in 1953; and these have been absorbed, there are none now.

Counties: The same number today as there were in 1953, that is 38 counties.

Now, examining the assessed population figures for the province is rather interesting, because the assessed population in 1953—and I think when we are discussing assessed population we must remember that the population figures which are reported to the department through the clerks' general return and annual return, is the population as figured and as taken up by the assessors and so in many cases the figures are not exactly correct because the assessors are taking up the census figures over a period of many months during the year—in 1953, the assessed population in Ontario was just over 4.5 million. Now it is over 6,000,000. Actually the figures were 4,648,008 people in 1953, and in 1964 that figure is 6,342,497.

Now with a one-third increase in population, the number of municipalities has increased by only 13, and eight of these 13 were the erection of new towns.

The great increase in population over a comparatively short period has no doubt thrown much added responsibility on the shoulders of the elected and appointed officials of our municipalities. These responsibilities, almost without exception, have been met with understanding and concern, and this, I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, is resulting in greatly increased efficiency in the operation of our municipalities. Considering that our municipal corporations today are looking after the interests and the needs of one-third more people, I would say that a wonderful job has been done by the municipalities in meeting the problems of growth in this province.

The Department of Municipal Affairs has many different operations. It is divided into many different branches, and so I will try in the few minutes at my disposal to give you a quick rundown of the various activities of the department and then later on, when we deal with the individual items of estimates, I will give you more details of the individual items.

One of the fields of activity in which the department is very much concerned, is that of municipal assessment, and you may remember that within the last several years the department has re-established its assessment branch and has produced an assessment manual. This was done at considerable expense. The assessment guide was distributed to all municipalities in August, 1964. This assessment guide is a much more sophisticated form of instruction and guidance to municipal assessors, and there is no doubt that it is going to take some time for the municipalities to bring their assessment up to date with respect to the use of this manual.

So far, no municipality has completely implemented the manual recommendations. A number of municipalities are beginning to use the manual and at least two county units will start reassessment programmes this year. There is no doubt that there will be many other jurisdictions which with the guidance and assistance of the assessment branch will take concrete steps to introduce a revised assessment base.

I might say that much favourable comment has been received concerning the technique and procedures recommended in our new manual. As one example, I might tell you that the institute of local government at Queen's University uses the procedural portion of the manual as a reference text in the university course.

Making this new assessment guide and information available, of course, has presented the problem of training and so we were instrumental in working with the institute of municipal assessors and the institute of local government at Queen's University to rewrite the correspondence course for municipal assessors. The first part of this course was made available in December, 1964. The remaining portions of the other two years of the course are being re-examined and improved; the second-year course will be available in September, and the third-year course, next year.

Under an agreement with Queen's University, the department has underwritten the cost of rewriting this course and much of the time of the full-time personnel of the department has been assigned to this task.

We have also made it possible for the department to refund to a successful student 60 per cent of the cost of tuition on completion of the course.

We have also prepared and instituted a comprehensive eight-week training programme to appoint assessors with sound appraisal theory, basic economics and the techniques and procedures contained in the new manual. This training was made available shortly before Christmas last year; since then, three of these schools have been held and assessors from 13 different jurisdictions have availed themselves of the initial phase of this service. This training programme is intended to complement the correspondence training that is available through Queen's University.

One of the fields of activity in which I think we can make great progress in the years ahead will be in promoting county and district assessment systems. There are now ten counties operating under the provisions of The Assessment Act with a county assessment commissioner.

The first territorial district which began assessment on this basis was the territorial district of Cochrane. The municipalities there supported the appointment of a district assessor and I appointed this person, effective January 1 of this year. The district is being well organized and the work is proceeding satisfactorily.

There are other areas in the territorial districts interested in the same programme, and we have had a number of meetings with municipalities in several of the districts which are interested in obtaining information as to the cost and the subsidies payable in connection with these expenditures.

We hope that before long we may have a number of other districts which will be prepared to go into the installation of centralized assessment systems.

Our assessment branch is composed of the main headquarters here in Toronto, and eight regional offices in the province—in Perth, Peterborough, London, Orillia, Sudbury, New Liskeard and Port Arthur. These branch offices are staffed by well-trained and efficient assessors who provide a worthwhile service to the local assessors and to the elected and appointed officials within their respective branch areas. The same staff people, of course, also do their best to expedite the statutory and regulatory functions of the branch.

During the past year, branch personnel in the assessment department visited all the municipalities in the province and over 400 school sections in unorganized territories to determine assessment equalization factors. These factors, as you know, are used by The Department of Education for the determination of school grants and for the apportionment of costs for homes for the aged and welfare boards in the territorial districts.

A great deal of the time of this branch is taken up with the administration of The Municipal Tax Assistance Act and The Power Commission Act. It is our responsibility to determine the evaluation of properties for payments of grants in lieu of taxes. Approximately 80 per cent of the municipalities were visited last year and some 8,000 valuation notices were issued by the branch.

Another and very important function of The Department of Municipal Affairs is the community planning branch. Last July a new provincial policy to assist municipalities in developing and implementing urban renewal programmes was announced by myself. This policy removes the substantial housing content requirement as a prerequisite to provincial financial assistance towards the acquisition and clearance of land in approved redevelopment areas, so that now, financial assistance is available where land uses other than housing are dominant. Financial aid was also broadened to cover up to 25 per cent of the cost of preparing detailed urban renewal studies and the on-site administration in project areas. Provincial cost-sharing was also extended to incorporate new and improved municipal services such as sewers, water, roads, parks, and so on, to facilitate the most appropriate use of cleared land within a redevelopment area. Loans may now be arranged from the federal government to help municipalities meet a substantial part of their share of costs arising from urban renewal operations.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order.

I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Minister, but he is very rapid fire in his reading. I wonder if there are other copies of that report he is reading that we might have? Is that your annual report you are reading from?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: No, this is not the annual report, sir. The annual report has been in the hands of the printers for some time. It was supposed to be here last Thursday or Friday, but unfortunately it is not available. It will be available.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): That is the Tory government's work; was it a union shop?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I have not any idea. The Queen's Printer looks after that.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): It makes it very difficult for us to properly assess—

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Just go a little slower and they will absorb it.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: In proceeding to discuss this matter of urban redevelopment, you may be aware of the fact that it was through the interest of Ontario in developing a better method, and a better system of assistance to municipalities in connection with urban renewal projects, that we made representations to the federal government in Ottawa, to the late Minister of National Revenue, who was responsible for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation operations, the late Mr. John Garland of Nipissing.

You will remember also that during the last session, the session in 1964, we presented some amendments to our Planning Act to provide for this assistance to municipalities, bearing in mind that we had the promise of the then Minister that the federal legislation would be amended accordingly. Unfortunately, because of the untimely death of Mr. Garland, this same arrangement and the amendments had to be presented by another Minister, the hon. Mr. Nicholson, who has been of a great deal of assistance, I must say. I think both he and his predecessor are imbued with the idea and with the responsibility that the national government has toward assisting the provinces and the municipalities in this very important field of urban renewal.

We have a number of projects under way now. I think that we will see more of these in the days ahead, because the municipalities are now able to accept the responsibilities with much less investment in the urban renewal project than was possible before.

You will also remember that last year we passed legislation enabling municipalities to prescribe by law for the maintenance and occupancy of dwellings. This is a requirement that the municipality's official plan must contain a statement about housing conditions when the municipality makes application for the approval of an urban renewal programme.

During the year we have held a number of symposiums on urban renewal planning and housing. There was a symposium held here in Toronto on December 16 and 17 at which the federal Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was represented. And also, the federal Minister, the hon. Mr. Nicholson, and my colleague, the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall) were present, and the latter's staff as well.

In order to serve the interests of the municipalities in the north country, a second symposium was held in Sault Ste. Marie on January 15 and 16. About 700 people attended both of these meetings.

With respect to local community planning, ten new planning areas were defined in 1964, three were enlarged and one was dissolved. This brings to 385 the number of planning areas in the province at the end of last year.

Through workshops, conferences and other media, there has been increased discussion in many quarters about the intra-relationship between the municipal councils and the planning board in the planning process. We are of the opinion that there is a continuing, increasing interest in planning at an area or county level. Our department produced a Waterloo area report in March of 1964 which was the culmination of a study undertaken by the department in 1963-64. It is expected that there will be a reorganization of community planning in Waterloo county early this year.

We also feel that this report will indicate, and be an inducement, to other municipalities to go more into joint planning action. Many meetings have been held with county councils and groups of municipalities to discuss and encourage a wider geographic approach to planning and development.

Part of our community planning organization is in fact concerned with the administration and approval of official plans and zoning bylaws. This branch of the department has been divided into five regional units with each unit responsible for dealing with municipal matters related to that area, so that the staff people who are working on these things can concentrate on the geography, shall we say, of approximately one fifth of the province.

During the year, 126 official plans are in force, covering 151 municipalities. Zoning bylaw comments are up some 14 per cent. Many of the municipalities that passed official plans eight, ten and 12 years ago are now finding it necessary to amend these plans and to bring them up to date. Of course, our department staff is continually urging the municipalities to review their official plans from time to time in the light of current needs and objectives.

Subdivision control bylaws are in force in 418 municipalities and in more than 100 geographic townships in unorganized territory covered by Minister's orders. The physical standards of subdivision design are generally improving. The department is resisting pressures—and at times it is very difficult—for approval of subdivision applications in areas where urban and resort subdivision pressures appear to exceed the municipality's ability to match growth with services. The department's policy has been to hold the line until the municipality has indicated its awareness of the implications that stem from these applications and its willingness to accept the demands in costs and other responsibilities that are inherent in each application.

In connection with redevelopment activities, last year the province, through this department, contributed $1,374,000 to assist municipalities with redevelopment activities. There is a gradual shift in emphasis from the complete clearance of redevelopment areas to a greater appreciation of the social and economic merits of other alternatives—that is, rehabilitation and conservation. That became more evident last year with the change in both the provincial and federal legislation. This trend is well illustrated, I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, by Hamilton's north-end project and Toronto's Alexander park project.

Another aspect of urban renewal activity emphasized in 1964 was the necessity for looking at urban renewal as an integrated and comprehensive part of the total urban community, rather than as a series of isolated and short-term measures. During the last year, eight Minister's orders were issued in connection with subdivision control and most of these are in the territorial districts.

Much of our work is also in connection with participating in conferences and workshops that are put on by various organizations. For instance, the provincial planning officials, the Ontario planning organization, and the community planning association of Canada met in Toronto and London, and we were represented and took an active part in the discussions at these various conferences.

I have made mention of the Waterloo area report, and we participated in regional and transportation studies dealing with land use, employment and population, in several regions of the province. In Burlington, for instance, a joint study was undertaken and conducted with The Department of Agriculture and the ARDA directorate staff, the University of Guelph and the town of Burlington in connection with the impact of urban growth in agriculture. The branch is also co-operating and working with The Department of Transport, The Department of Highways and Metro Toronto in connection with the work of the Metro Toronto and region transportation study. This is research into conditions and trends and possible future land use in the area covered by this transportation study, and is a very important part of the study programme.

We have had a number of joint studies undertaken with The Department of Highways in connection with existing conditions and growth factors as a basis for regional highway programming. These studies included the Essex-Kent-Lambton counties, Niagara peninsula, Brant and Norfolk counties and the Lake Simcoe district.

In the Whitby and Grimsby areas, the branch staff participated with others in the department and with local representatives, in examining municipal relationships.

Another important branch of our department is the municipal accounting branch. Its main responsibilities, of course, are to maintain studies and research into development of the most up-to-date municipal accounting principles and practices that can be entered into in the municipalities of this province, to make services available to municipal treasurers and auditors, and to assist by the use of our trained and experienced staff who render assistance and advice on all aspects of municipal accounting, reporting, auditing, budgeting and financing. We view the audited financial statements of the 978 municipalities in the province and their local boards and we also license municipal auditors and attempt to promote better municipal auditing standards and practices and techniques.

Many of the municipalities and their appointed officials and elected officials also make use of the advisory services that we have in this municipal accounting branch, because we have available municipal accountants and finance advisers who are experienced not only in accounting but also in reporting, budgeting and most phases of municipal financing. In that way we hope to improve the standard of work performed by the municipal treasurers and auditors in the province.

The finance branch of the department is charged with the general responsibility to effect improvements in municipal financial administration by providing advice and assistance to municipal officials, and also to analyze the financial positions of the municipalities, in order that we may advise the department, the Ontario municipal board and various other agencies of the province. For that purpose, we collect, analyze and publish municipal financial information also for the assistance of the public, governments and, of course, the financial institutions and other organizations of a similar nature. Certainly the financial institutions are very interested in having as much information as possible in connection with the financial stability of our municipalities.

We also provide advice to such agencies as the Ontario water resources commission on such matters as the ability of a municipality to finance the cost of capital works by borrowing.

Another of our functions, and one which has taken up the time of a large number of our staff, is the matter of dealing with amendments to pension plans for municipal employees.

The branch staff, sir, examines in detail many complex amendments to pension plans, which are submitted by the municipalities for approval, and the branch also prepares advice to the Ontario municipal employees retirement system, and in connection with the framework of municipal pension-plan policy in the province.

There will be a report given to the House in connection with the Ontario municipal employees' retirement system, but if my memory serves me right, at present we have something like 22,000 municipal employees now participating in OMERS and at the end of the year I think we had investments of something like $15 million or $16 million.

The municipal organization and administration branch is responsible for making available general administrative advice and assistance to the municipalities. Changes in legislation and local conditions affecting municipal operation, together with the changing complexity of municipal government and other factors, create a continual need for these services.

During the 1930s the role of the department was primarily supervisory, exercised in respect to defaulting municipalities. Today, supervisory duties are carried out only in respect to some 18 improvement districts, and on a limited scale to nine other municipalities, which by Ontario municipal board order are required to obtain the approval of the department for specified functions, usually the annual budget and related services.

The municipal organization section continued the development of its programme and undertook limited studies of county government functions and elections. You may remember that there has been considerable interest in the matter of representation to county councils, and our department has undertaken a study of this very important part of municipal administration. We hope that these studies will be completed before too long and will result in legislation, not at this session, but at the next session of Parliament, to have the effect of providing more or better representation to county councils than is possible under the present legislation. You may remember that we supported, in the private bills committee, a private member's bill in connection with the representation on the council of one of the counties of the province.

Another function of this section has been the study of certain annexation and amalgamation problems in the municipalities of the province. One of the areas in which we pay money is the municipal subsidies branch. The general responsibilities of this branch are to administer loans, shared costs and subsidy programmes and it is also its responsibility to represent the department in its subsidy and shared-cost programme with the federal government, provincial departments and the municipalities. It is also necessary to prepare internal procedures, forms and records to make these programmes available to the municipalities and then to provide information and advice regarding subsidy and shared-cost programmes to federal, provincial and municipal officials.

The municipal works assistance programme, which is the federal loan fund, handled through our department, has now had filed with it some 660 applications from municipalities and school boards. In these applications, and many of them required a great deal of work and a great deal of time, some $122 million have been involved. A number of these applications are still going through the process of being examined, and some are waiting for tenders to be called and various other functions of that kind. All in all, we think that this part of the programme has been well accepted by the municipalities and school boards, and complete examination of it will show that it has made possible funds to municipalities and school boards, which would not have been able to undertake the programmes they did undertake, had it not been for the forgiveness feature of the programme.

We have had to be careful in this programme, of course, not to overtax the municipality's ability to carry this debt, because the purpose of this programme in the first place is to create employment. Therefore, it was necessary for a project to qualify as a project that would not ordinarily be undertaken by the municipality or school board at this particular time, and as a programme that was accelerated because of the benefits of this programme.

Another of the responsibilities of the municipal subsidies branch is attending to the centennial grants that are available through the federal government and the provincial government. As of March 11, we had received some 494 applications. Of this amount, working with a committee headed by my colleague, the hon. Minister of Tourism and Information (Mr. Auld), we have approved 149 projects. These in turn have to be approved by Ottawa and Ottawa had approved 120 of these projects. The estimated eligible cost of the projects contained in the applications which we have received is some $28 million.

Another of the subsidy programmes that we administer in this branch is the municipal works assistance programme, and I have here, Mr. Chairman, the figures for the date February 28, 1965, that is three weeks ago. We had handled applications from 305 participating municipalities and agencies involving employment of some 16,000 men for a total of 1,050,000 man-days for a total cost of $80.5 million. The direct payroll involved in these projects is $21,148,000. This is slightly in excess of the same period last year. At that time, we had more municipalities and participating agencies, but the important figure is the amount of direct payroll involved. Last year at this time it was about $3 million less than in the projects that we have under way this winter.

This branch also makes payments under The Drainage Act, and, of course, The Unconditional Grants Act pays grants for indigent hospitalization and a number of grants of that type. The branch also pays grants under the police and fire departments Acts. The department makes payments on behalf of the province on provincially owned property at the commercial mill rate of the municipality for general municipal purposes. The department also makes payments under another section of The Assessment Act in respect of municipal taxes on provincially owned land that is rented to a tenant.

Another of the important functions of the department is that operated under our law branch, which was established in 1960. The important functions of this branch are the provision of advice and legal opinion on points of law, consideration and preparation of departmental legislation, and also the examination of legislation of other departments that may have an effect on our municipalities in the province. The solicitors in our department are very often consulted by solicitors acting for municipalities on some of the more difficult municipal law problems. We think that this is a very valuable service and that it gives an opportunity for the local solicitor to discuss and test his opinion with our department's legal people.

We administer about 30 statutes in the department and, of course, several of these are very extensive and I must say are very technical in nature, so that this is rather a heavy burden on the part of the law branch staff.

Then the department legal staff also examine all the private bills. These are very carefully scrutinized in the branch and revisions are recommended where appropriate.

Our accounts branch, which the hon. members may be surprised to know has a staff of only five persons, has the functions of payrolls and revenue and expenditures accounting, payments of bills, compiling of estimates and forecasts, periodic statements to the Treasury board, and the responsibility for paying such amounts as our audited claims for grants and subsidies and payments in lieu of taxes required.

The estimated gross payments for the department during this present fiscal year are about $100 million. Next fiscal year it is anticipated that these payments will probably go up to about $150 million because of the amounts which will be paid out through the municipal works assistance programme.

Another of the important functions of the department is that of the library facilities. We have, shall I say, rehabilitated or re-established our municipal library in our offices at 801 Bay Street. University students and planners and persons from other departments are making very great use of this library, which contains a lot of books and publications and various information relating to municipal matters generally and planning matters, and so on. These facilities are being used very much by many people, including, of course, our own staff.

Another of the organizations with which we are concerned, but which we do not operate as such, is the Ontario municipal board. As you know, Mr. Chairman, this has come to be known as the administrative process, because it operates under an Act of this Legislature. My responsibility, or our responsibility in the department, is to provide the board with facilities, office, staff; and, of course, the funds to operate. We in no way indicate to the board what its decisions should be, though we are called upon on many occasions to provide information as to the financial situation in various municipalities. Also, we provide information with respect to various other matters such as zoning bylaws, appeals of various kinds and forms. The board deals with many assessment appeals, of course, and compensation arbitration and matters of that kind.

Now, in questions of law and jurisdiction, there is an appeal from the Ontario municipal board to the court of appeal, and on all other questions there is an appeal to the Cabinet of the province. The duties and the functions of the board are found largely in The Municipal Act, The Planning Act and The School Act; but in addition to that there are a host of various other statutory provisions which confer jurisdiction on the board in a very wide variety of cases.

I think that one could say that the functions and the jurisdiction of the board may be divided into two general categories. There is the responsibility for the sound growth and development of municipalities within the framework of the statute, with particular regard to economic stability; and second, jurisdiction as arbitrator in the first instance, or by way of appeal to determine compensation to be paid by the Crown in the right of Ontario, or its Crown corporation by municipalities and other local authorities and by certain private corporations. The board's jurisdiction with respect to the growth and economy of municipalities can be divided, I think, under the following headings:

First, constitution, boundary revision and dissolution of municipalities; second, approval of capital undertakings and the imposition of rates and levies to recover the cost thereof; third, the approval of restricted area bylaws, official plans and plan of subdivision; and fourth, the matter of assessment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would hope that with this rather lengthy explanation of the duties of the department I might be of assistance to the hon. members when we are dealing with the individual items by providing additional information.

On vote 1301:

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Chairman, through you to the hon. Minister, and through the hon. Minister to his Cabinet, including the hon. Prime Minister—I do not want to miss anybody this evening, I am very generous—I find myself in the position where I have the problem of finding fault with the hon. Minister and his department. I find that is rather difficult to do.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Quite right!

Mr. MacDonald: The Tories are right behind you, George.

Mr. Bukator: It is nice to see you all back; I am not speaking to an empty House, I am very much encouraged.

Mr. Singer: That gang is in full flight again tonight.

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): It might as well be, it is empty anyway.

Mr. Bukator: The hon. Prime Minister, at least the hon. Minister—you see, I am all confused already. The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs is possibly—let us say that if I were going to give out prizes this evening for the best Minister or one who ranks high among the Ministers, I think I would give it to the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs for the work that he does in his department.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bukator: But he has a serious problem—

Mr. D. A. Evans (Simcoe Centre): I was going to leave, but you are making a real good speech; I think I will stay and listen to you.

Mr. Bukator: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. You did a good job today yourself for three and a half hours in this House.

The hon. Minister himself cannot accomplish the many things that he talked about this evening. He skimmed over the top of many departments of government—and many there are. He has no doubt come up to the Cabinet on occasion about the many things that he wants to implement and he finds himself in a position where he cannot get unanimous—I do not suppose—support from the Cabinet, and therefore he takes it and plays it by ear.

He comes before us annually with a nice, well-typewritten report; he gives us a lot of statistics which always confuse me. Lord knows, in my own little business I get all tangled up with a few thousand dollars a year, and he is submitting millions.

He painted a very rosy picture and I am inclined to buy what he is selling, however.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bukator: As a matter of fact, this is not even script prepared for me. I happened to come by it because it is my job to find what is wrong with this department this evening, and I have a letter dated March 8 from the association of mayors and reeves and it reads: "My dear Member"—and I suppose that was written to the many members that belong to that association.

I continue:

Enclosed is a copy of a brief presented to the Hon. J. Robarts and the Cabinet in October of last year. At that time, the Prime Minister assured the president, Mayor G. Stronach, and members of our executive that this would be reviewed again and we would be advised.

An hon. member: It is the hon. Prime Minister's home town, George.

Mr. Bukator: Is that right?

An hon. member: Yes.

Mr. Bukator: London?

An hon. member: His home is there, at Grand Falls.

Mr. Bukator: To continue:

We have only heard by newspaper report that this is going into force in May—

Whatever it is I do not know yet, but we will come to it.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bukator: I think you will be laughing from the other side of your face before I get through with you.

An hon. member: That is right.

Mr. Bukator: To continue again:

The president, Mayor G. Stronach, has sent a wire to Mr. Robarts two weeks ago and failed to have a reply and requested me to ask you to have this matter reconsidered before it is put into force.

You do not even have enough intelligence—through you again, Mr. Chairman; I was corrected by the hon. Prime Minister the other day, you should never talk directly to a Cabinet Minister or to the Prime Minister—so I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that the Prime Minister of this province did not have enough respect for the mayor of London to reply to his letter.

Some hon. members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Bukator: Let me read to you a report that has been standing before the Cabinet for some 15 years, with no result whatsoever. The hon. Prime Minister—again this is naturally written to him, because he is—

Some hon. members: The big wheel!

Mr. Bukator: I will continue:

Honourable members of the provincial Cabinet:

On behalf of the executive of the association of Ontario mayors and reeves, I wish to extend to you our appreciation for this meeting with you today, and secondly, to thank you and your office for the advance notice of this appointment which is so necessary, not only for our offices, but to the elected mayors and reeves who are busy like you honourable gentlemen.

This association is made up of elected heads of municipalities both large and small, and like you, sir, and your Cabinet, are the policy-makers of local government, having to answer to the taxpayers by standing for election. Our association this year again has an increase of 73 new members bringing our membership to 438 and represents the largest municipalities, including cities, towns, villages, townships and counties in Ontario.

Of the total population of Ontario, 6,129,850, we represent 5,990,000 of the population. Once again, Mr. Prime Minister, you will note that in our brief, many resolutions we are bringing before you cover the same requests that we place before you every year and have for the past 15 years—

I can readily understand why the hon. Prime Minister would leave; this would be embarrassing. For 15 consecutive years they have brought these resolutions before you. I quote again:

Our basic aims are still the same:

For your information: To obtain what we feel will be the most equitable adjustment in municipal tax structure in order that municipal revenue will be used almost in its entirety to provide basic municipal services properly chargeable to the property owners.

To provide municipal legislation—permissive, where practical; and mandatory where necessary—to enable municipalities to provide the most efficient and highest standard of service to their citizens.

May I mention, sir, that we have also reiterated this position in a brief to the special Ontario tax committee, set up to look into the tax question appointed by your government.

The following brief and the resolutions which were passed at our annual conference is submitted to you and your Cabinet, with the firm hope that you will find it within your power to implement these requests and in so doing help the local governments in Ontario which are described as “creatures of the province.”

We offer these comments in the interest of municipal government in Ontario and we feel to make this province of Ontario even greater. I respectfully submit, on behalf of the association of mayors and reeves, the following submission.

and it is signed by Mr. Stronach.

I read with interest, later on in this report, that one of our present members was a past president of this organization.

An hon. member: Eddie?

Mr. Bukator: Yes, Mayor E. Sargent of Owen Sound.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bukator: Another gentleman from the county of Welland, Mr. Swart, with whom we are well acquainted, is doing a good job there.

The hon. Minister quoted some large figures, and when he did that I was wondering whether in those figures education was included. It must have been.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That is right. I said on municipalities and local boards that 47 cents out of every dollar that the hon. Provincial Treasurer gets comes here.

Mr. Bukator: Forty-seven per cent of every dollar that the Provincial Treasurer gets goes for school purposes; is that right?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: It goes to municipalities and local boards.

Mr. Bukator: Municipalities and local boards, 47 per cent.

Mr. Singer: Including education!

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That is right. It is a local board, is it not?

Mr. Bukator: This will be most interesting to most members of the House.

Intejctions by hon. members.

An hon. member: Let George make the speech.

Mr. Bukator: I would like to hear that last comment again. It must have been a very nice contribution. To continue my quotation:

Each was dealt with at length, and during the annual conference of the association of mayors and reeves, at its annual conference held in Sudbury, Ontario, June 21 to 24, inclusive.

It should be emphasized, however, that deliberations at this conference were not limited to five resolutions. A total of 127 resolutions were presented to the conference on behalf of 438 municipalities, of which 52 resolutions were endorsed. All of these resolutions were processed through the association's resolutions committee and were presented to the conference after careful and considered deliberation. The resolutions committee met for a total of 13 hours.

Before dealing in specifics, the association believes that many of the ills of Ontario municipalities could be cured if the provincial government would give serious consideration to lack of tax revenues available to municipalities as opposed to the apparently unlimited field of taxation revenue open to the government.

The municipality derives its revenue from direct taxation on real property. The provincial government, on the other hand, derives its revenue from 37 different sources, including taxes on corporations, gasoline sales, races, logging and land transfers.

They did not put liquor in here. I understand, according to the hon. Provincial Treasurer there were $421 million derived there also in the last year.

Some hon. members: Oh no, no!

Mr. Bukator: Put me right! That is gross sales, that is not all profit?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: They may have water in the whisky, but it is not quite that much.

Mr. Bukator: There are areas in which they make themselves very cheap. They have their own little stills. It is only $93 million profit! That is not too bad, you know. It is quite a nice issue.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bukator: Fine and dandy, the total net revenue for the province from various sources is estimated at $1,556,000,000. Am I too far off on that figure? This is according to the mayors and reeves.

Mr. MacDonald: What year?

Mr. Bukator: For fiscal year 1963-64.

On the other hand the municipalities, with one source of taxation, collected $745 million in 1963. These figures indicate that municipalities with one source of taxation are collecting more than half of the total the province gets from 37 sources. It is an indication, we believe, that the property owner is the victim of too much taxation. This argument I put up annually, I think for the six years since I have been here.

It might be pointed out here that municipal taxes increase in accordance with the cost of provincially provided local services. On the other hand, provincial government revenues, the sales tax, for example, increase in direct relation to increased sales.

Three per cent tax on fiscal 1962-63 netted the government $175 million. I remember that at that time that was the deficit of the province. I thought that was about the deficit of the province the year before, and I thought with collecting $175 million in sales tax you would at least balance your budget for one year. If I recall rightly the figure was about $175 million—not a deficit, but a shortfall. I looked it up in the dictionary and it means the same thing.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Not "Windfall."

Mr. Bukator: A "windfall" increase in the amount of taxes at the same three per cent is expected to net the government $183 million in 1963-64; and your estimate is close to $190 million, I believe, in this coming year.

An hon. member: $194 million!

Mr. Bukator: This pattern of increased revenue without increased taxation appeared prevalent in the whole field of provincial taxation. In municipalities, slight increases in assessment failed to head-off increases in levies.

Now then we will get to the education problem. I am sure someone might say that we are not dealing with the estimates of The Department of Education this evening, but municipalities must provide, through their taxation, the money to pay for school purposes, so I would like to touch on that subject with these resolutions.

The cost of education is one of the most pressing provincial government problems facing municipalities today. Typical of the financial burden placed on the backs of homeowners is found by looking at the situation in three municipalities; namely, the town of Kenora, the town of Keewatin and the townships of Jaffray-Melick. Education absorbs 62 per cent of municipal taxes in Keewatin and 73.5 per cent in Jaffray-Melick. Can you imagine that, 73.5 per cent in Jaffray-Melick.

As a result, these and other municipalities have found it necessary to postpone programmes. This is a very important issue. You will find municipalities often condemned for not bringing about the necessary services people want, and for very good reason. If they have to pay 73 per cent of their tax dollar for school purposes they naturally cannot give their people the necessary services that they require.

So, in this paragraph it says, as a result, these and other municipalities have found it necessary to postpone and delay urgent public work projects in order to meet the cost of education and still maintain a reasonable tax base that will satisfy industry. This in essence is the situation:

Municipalities are contributing more and more toward the high cost of education and at the same time are attempting to create a tax climate favourable to the location of new industry.

And naturally we all fight for new industry.

In 1963, total expenditures by municipalities in this province reached $695 million, exclusive of debt retirement charges. Of this amount, $341 million was invested in education. The association has reason to believe that the education costs will continue to climb because of the additional amounts of money which boards of education will require to operate and maintain the new vocational schools which were built by the senior levels of government. The association congratulates the government for constructing these schools, but it hastens to point out that the high cost of operating and maintaining these schools, because of their nature, will be a major factor in subsequent municipal tax bills.

And that has come about already. I remember when you were all bragging about the fact that you were giving them these technical schools, but you did not tell them that they would have to pay for their teachers and maintain the structures. This fell right onto the shoulders of the people.

An hon. member: Oh no, they were told.

Mr. Bukator: It was told very quietly, let us put it that way.

In short, the addition of these new vocational schools has created a genuine financial crisis in civic government and the association feels that this government should contemplate taking an entirely new approach to the problem. It is therefore recommended that—and I think they are asking for too much, there is a limit—

Hon. Mr. Simonett: You do not agree with them.

Mr. Bukator: I did not say that. If they are asking too much and cannot get it, we will settle for a little less. The hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management should know that. You know something of management, I hope. When your estimates come up we will find out how much you know.

To continue:

The provincial government assume 80 per cent of the cost of education, and the provincial government increase the grants towards school construction costs so as to put them in line with present-day costs.

The provincial government pay a board or commission to define teacher categories and establish salary schedules for teachers in the various economic regions of the province.

The provincial government, through its Department of Education, produce a standard set of plans for school construction, and these plans be made available to the municipalities, thereby reducing architects fees.

The provincial government introduce a system in which it assume the share of the outstanding debenture debts to schools, thereby eliminating the debt from the books of municipalities.

The situation with regard to education is an urgent one. The association earnestly implores the government and honourable members to give this problem serious consideration with a view to giving education and the municipalities a new deal.

I would like to touch on some figures I have not read into the record. I have here the Ottawa-Eastview and Carleton local government review. This is the first copy, and it is only a review with no recommendations, but I found some very interesting figures in here. This is page 110.

In 1963, education expenditures represented more than half of the total municipal corporation expenditures in Stittsville village, at 62.4 per cent. The Nepean total was 51.2 per cent, but it was less than one-quarter in Cumberland, Fitzroy, Huntley and Marlborough townships, about 23 per cent and 24 per cent. But overall, more than 50 per cent of all revenue collected they pay for school purposes.

Can you imagine again, 62 per cent of the total tax dollar is paid for school purposes!

This is very much along the same line. There are 100 pages or so pertaining to the school question.

I do not know what particular department to take on next.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Public works!

Mr. Bukator: I have something to do with Public Works, but that is not the department before the House.

Here is a serious one that not too many people in this House have touched on—administration of justice. It says here, in this particular resolution to the Cabinet again, and this I know has been coming up annually for quite some time:

The administration of justice, while not a basic municipal responsibility, yet it is one which municipal government in Ontario assumes. Under existing legislation the municipal taxpayer is obliged to provide jails and lockup facilities, to pay the salaries of the jail guards, to finance courthouses for the county and supreme court, to pay coroners, pathologists, post-mortem and inquest fees, witnesses and jurors, to provide accommodation for division court, magistrate's court, to pay salaries—

I do not know if they pay magistrates or not, it says here that they do. They mean a portion of it, no doubt.

—and their staff, to provide accommodation for the legal law library for lawyers, to transport—

Can you imagine that! Providing libraries for lawyers at the cost of taxpayers:

—to transport prisoners, provide funds for the administration of family and juvenile courts. Services provided are, generally speaking, of a federal and provincial nature except in the area where municipalities use them for the prosecution of local bylaw cases.

And I can assure you that is not a very large percentage.

In comparison to the direct expenses of municipalities, the amount of money returned through fines and forfeitures is insufficient or insignificant. Therefore, the association of Ontario mayors and reeves petition this government to recognize and accept the fairness of the argument presented and take whatever steps are necessary to assist the municipalities by assuming the entire cost of administration of justice, including the burdensome cost of buildings and maintaining courthouses and jails.

That is a fair request. Many of you represent small towns, townships and summer resorts. People come in from all over the country, they do get in trouble from time to time and that particular municipality or that county has to bear the cost. The cost of jurors is paid for 100 per cent by the county. It is not quite fair.

Therefore, I think there is a certain amount of revenue that does come in and I do believe the government should collect that and pay the bills. They should be paid from the provincial level.

There is quite a brief here on hospitals, but I will leave that until the estimates of The Department of Health.

I think the administration of justice is a problem that the government is acquainted with. I am sorry the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) is not here; I suppose he is wrestling with this. I remember coming before his predecessor or maybe the one before that—the hon. Dana Porter—with a submission from the county of Welland pertaining to this very problem. The hon. Dana Porter, being the gentleman that he is, said the whole question should be looked at. He realized there was a problem there. But I do not know who has been looking at it, because nothing has been done. This is not a just portion of taxes to be borne by the man who owns a little house down the side street; this is not a just portion of taxes for a man to pay as business tax on a little store that he runs around the corner. This is a tax that should be borne by the province and I hope eventually it will do the same with that as it does with the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions (Mr. Grossman). Some of the departments, I understand, are paid for 100 per cent by this government, which is very good. All the government has to do is take on the rest of the job and we will be in business.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): I will think it over.

Mr. Bukator: Thank you very much, you are a gentleman.

An hon. member: And there are not many of them left.

Mr. Bukator: I should not be laughing at a time when things are so serious in this House, but what amuses me is that the hon. Minister does get up and make an exceptionally good report annually and we buy it, but here is the other side of the story. I remember the former Prime Minister, Mr. Chairman, having these people before him and I remember him putting his hands up and saying, "You are the grass-roots government. We are glad to hear your submissions. You are closer to the people. We are glad to have you." I remember on one or two occasions, when I sat there for five consecutive years, the directors and vice-president of the OMA were before the Prime Minister and his Cabinet, and he turned to one of the Ministers when a resolution came up and said: "This we are looking into. This is a point, you make it well." Then he would turn to one of us who was making the argument and say: "Is there anything else you have to say about this problem?" Naturally, he took your shotgun, took the bullets out, handed the gun back to you and said, "Shoot."

So on went the years. My hair was black then and now it is almost white, but the same resolutions are presented to the same government. Well, not quite—

Mr. Singer: Well, the Minister would not even meet with them this summer.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Where?

Mr. Singer: In London.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Oh, do not be silly. Which Minister, me?

Mr. Singer: That is what the press said.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I might tell you that I think I was there more than most of the delegates who were authorized to attend the convention. How do you like that?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bukator: I am going to keep the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs honest from now on in.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I have always been honest.

Mr. Bukator: I am also going to attend the OMA and the mayors and reeves conventions just to get in touch again with the folks I knew so well at one time. No doubt we will meet there and we will settle these problems between us, and we will not have to bring them back to this House another year.

Municipal councils, having passed through several economic recessions since the end of World War II, have become increasingly concerned about the problem of social welfare. At the Sudbury conference this year, member municipalities made several representations in this regard, pointing out that demands on municipal treasuries to meet welfare costs have increased from $54 million in 1962 to $57 million in 1964.

The association recognizes that the provincial government contributes 80 per cent towards welfare costs. This we have known for a long time. But it respectfully points out that this grant is made with regard to only certain costs. It does not, for example, go towards administration charges, nor does it go towards the cost of the so-called supplementary benefits. And where these are in fact supplementary or necessary is open to question in the association's view.

The government made no contribution towards the cost of drugs. In the city of Cornwall last year, the city welfare department spent $303,000 to provide needed drugs to indigent welfare recipients.

With regard to the question of administration costs, this association would merely point out to the government that these tend to increase in direct proportion to the demand.

The association is also concerned with the nature of a resolution provided by the Ontario welfare officers association at its 1953 conference, with reference to so-called charge-backs to municipalities for non-resident welfare recipients.

I guess most of you are acquainted with that. If an individual moves to another town and becomes a recipient of welfare, it can be charged back to the city that he comes from, or town that he comes from, if he has not lived in that particular city that he moved to for 12 consecutive months. They charge it back to the municipality from which he came.

Under present arrangements, the municipality is entitled to reclaim money expended on welfare for a person who has not been resident for a period of one year and who has not worked for income during that period. This charge is made to the municipality in which the recipient formerly resided.

The effect of the resolution provided by the Ontario welfare officers association would be to eliminate certain of these provisions, placing a burden on the larger municipalities because these are the places to which indigents flock during time of economic recession. Thus, this association urges this government to make no change in the present charge-back provision on the grounds that the present legislation is adequate to protect municipalities.

You see, they are good to you. They agree that you have some law that still applies.

Therefore, the association recommended:

(a) That the province assume payment of 80 per cent of the cost of administration and welfare; and (b) that it contribute 80 per cent for the cost of supplementary benefits, including drugs; and (c) that it make no change in the charge-back legislation.

The association of mayors and reeves wishes to go on record as stating that it vigorously opposes the adoption of certain pieces of legislation which may adversely affect the municipalities. For example, the Ontario Legislature has given three readings to Bill No. 132, An Act to amend The Planning Act—

Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister and I could have quite a debate on this brief that they sent along, pertaining to his committee of adjustment. But I will not take up the time of the House with this one tonight. We are both acquainted with the problem and I am hoping something will be done.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I think it will be all right. It is just a matter of time. It is just a case of working it out.

Mr. Singer: Just a matter of time! How long?

Mr. Bukator: To quote further:

In essence, Bill No. 132 transfers certain powers from the planning board to the committee of adjustment in the area in which consent is required by a subdivider or subdividers. Under the present provisions, it is up to the planning board to give consent, subject to the approval of the elected council.

If this bill is enacted, then the committee of adjustments could give consent without having to process the matter through municipal councils. Thus the council has no choice but to register its objections before the Ontario municipal board, often with additional expense of hiring legal assistance.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: If they hire legal assistance, they will be able to pay for their own books then.

Mr. Bukator: Well you would know better than most of us, because you are closer to it than we are. Well, I should finish this page and make it, let us say, coherent.

In the association's view, this piece of legislation adversely affects municipalities because it transfers certain powers from the elected representatives of the people and places it in the hands of a committee which does not hold itself accountable to the people.

The association suggests that: (a) Bill No. 132 be not given final approval; and (b) that in case of legislation that may adversely affect municipalities The Department of Municipal Affairs notify this association immediately after such a bill is given first reading. In this way the government and the municipalities may be able to work out their differences in the best interests of the people they serve.

We feel this to be so serious that a supplementary brief dealing with the subject is included.

And I made reference to that brief which I will not read.

There has been a lot of talk of regional government and I have read many reports pertaining to regional government. There have been experts, people from the law society, people from the University of Toronto, and most important, at least one man who had more than his adequate proportion of courage to submit this particular brief—I see the hon. Minister of Economics and Development is not here, but he no doubt has heard about this report of Professor Krueger's more than once. I think Professor Krueger has done an excellent job of showing the government their weaknesses, and so I do not know that I care to take up more time of the House with that particular problem. Most of us are acquainted with it, and it is an exceptionally good one.

I would like to touch lightly, though, on some areas of regional government. I have a report before me, a primary report again, on local government in the municipality of Lincoln and Welland counties. There have been many of these reports throughout the province and I think that they make a point here that could be applied to many areas of local and county and regional government.

When I make reference to the welfare, I must admit that the government has taken a step in the right direction when they have appointed county welfare administrators. They have them in two or three counties at the moment. They have not been in business long enough to prove the point, but I do believe, along with the fact that they take care of people on welfare, they may be able to scout about through their travels, and find work for the recipients of welfare rather than pay them relief; put them to work because many of them want the jobs anyhow. So you have a county system of welfare administrators and I think this is good.

But listen to this most interesting paragraph or two, pertaining to the police question in the counties of Welland and Lincoln. It takes in both counties.

Unlike assessment, policing is definitely a government service. Some would put it as the most basic, since without law and order civilized life is impossible. In essence the question is whether large political police units are necessary either (a) on a county basis; or (b) for county and city combined, that is two police forces for the region or regional, that is one police force for the whole region. The overriding argument is for efficient policing, that some amalgamation is desirable beyond question.

In Welland county in 1960 forces in the municipalities ranged from two to 47 people. No force of less than five can have a man on duty working 40 hours a week, every hour of the day and night, man a central station and carry out patrolling duties adequately as well. Detection, too, and identifications are a necessary part of police duties. Expert opinions have noted that some part of the regions in both counties do not receive proper policing.

This is proper. How can you give proper policing with only two policemen in a force? Naturally, they cannot put in the time, Mr. Chairman. I quote:

Sufficient policing depends not only on a large enough, and specialized enough force, but also on training and equipment. Here again, the small force is at a grave disadvantage. Training, pay, fringe benefits and recruitment of good men all suffer in small forces. Until a few years ago, only a few municipal police departments in Ontario gave the members of their uniformed branch a recruit-training course of recognized standards.

A source of municipal police departments in the province of Ontario—the police college report, Department of the Attorney General:

The province established a training facility at the police college in 1960, but preliminary evidence tends to show that small forces do not take advantage of it. Attendance is not mandatory.

Legislation may be required to put policing on a regional or county basis, but there is no reason to think it could not be forthcoming after due consultation with the hon. Attorney General. The Police Act, RSO 1950 makes it plain that the overall responsibility for policing is provincial, and that the province delegates most of the responsibility to local authorities. As to cost, a submission to the Welland county council committee is indicative. This estimates that a total amalgamated force for the county and the two cities would cost a trifle less than the total cost at present, and at the same time be more efficient. The various municipal contributions towards the cost of the united forces could be worked out. For example, contributions might vary with assessments, and so with ability to pay, although this suggestion would need further inquiry.

Clearly, this proposal for county and regional police forces requires further study. Such a study should include also the role of the OPP acting for the small municipal units in the region. For instance, is the OPP becoming largely a highway patrol? That is a good question. They like to keep them there, but I do believe they should do the policing in the small municipalities also.

Should all traffic patrolling be left to the OPP? Is the OPP going to curtail its police policy of contract to small municipalities? I hope I never see that day. Possibilities should be investigated to see whether something like the English system could be adopted, whereby chief constables are appointed subject to the approval of the Attorney General, or a central grant of 50 per cent of the local police budget is given and where a staff of inspectors of the local police department is maintained.

Now when I make reference to the police department, that could apply in many other areas.

You talk about your planning boards and you are quite pleased about them and you should be. Where a city has appointed a planning board and the board works conscientiously to designate the area for many purposes—they have their five per cent for park purposes; they tell you what you can build; you have your industrial areas and your commercial areas and your residential areas—this is all good. But the problem comes just beyond that particular municipality, when you have your fringe area.

People who cannot afford to live up to the standards in that city, find themselves in little shacks; find themselves just outside of the service area so they do not have sewers, they do not have water, they do not have garbage collection, they do not have police protection.

You find yourself with one serious problem—you might have three planning boards in one county, with areas in between that have no regulations whatsoever. Recently, the hon. Minister has seen fit—this government has seen fit—I think in the last year, to pass an amendment to The Planning Act whereby counties could have a county planning board.

Now, I may be wrong about when that happened, but I think it was in the last year. This is very good, but the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs, being the kindly gentleman that he is, does not take it on to himself to try to persuade the Cabinet, in areas such as the one I speak of, to make it mandatory to have a regional or a county type of planning area, where you can control the area where you are getting the undesirable growth that no one wants. When I said mandatory, I speak for myself, naturally. I am not committing my party to that, but I think it would be a good idea.

I could continue for many more hours. I would like to give you one statement here from a very good friend of mine, which I think would sum up what could be done to bring all the loose ends together from the many reports that you have. I will read just one paragraph of a very well prepared paper.

The Goldenberg commission recently is examining the strength and the weaknesses of the form of government established in Metropolitan Toronto. We of the Liberal Party propose that a commission be established immediately to examine the whole of the local government structure, including the financing of services within Ontario, and to make recommendations respecting the establishment of regional government throughout the province.

I do believe the sooner the proper personnel is appointed to a committee or a commission of that type to pick up these loose ends, the sooner we will be on the right track to putting this government or this province of ours in an area where there can be proper planning for the province.

I will have more to say as the different estimates come up, and I feel there is much more to be said about the hon. Minister's department on behalf of my hon. colleagues.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister has placed before us certain observations about the work of his department and the hon. member for Niagara Falls has commented upon various aspects of that department. After that blast of grapes I see the hon. Minister has survived and is still smiling across the floor, but tonight I would like to concentrate on one of the fundamental problems that we face in the field of municipal affairs.

The hon. Minister has outlined many of the activities that are being undertaken by him and by his department, and I think we can sincerely congratulate him for many of the achievements he has outlined. Progress has been made in the whole field of urban redevelopment, and in increased interest in planning at the county levels, to mention two points he talks about. The assessment manual is under way and is doing, I think, a good job in giving guidance to the new assessors. We hope it will play a very large part in bringing some uniformity to the whole assessment procedure across the province.

But in this whole matter the fundamental problem the hon. Minister faces is this: He is in the midst of great activity, but that activity is carried on in a piecemeal way. And it is piecemeal because he is trying to administer an archaic municipal system. During the last few years the select committee has been at work looking at the whole gamut of municipal affairs and we hope that that report will be available before too long. I say to him that his greatest problem arises out of the fact that we do have an archaic municipal system and he is trying to administer that system, which grew up at the beginning of Canada in 1867 and beyond. The hon. Minister knows this, because this problem is absolutely fundamental and very difficult for him at this present time.

As our select committee moved across the province, and as we heard briefs presented to us within these walls, we saw certain problems emerging which took on a pattern. We saw the problem of staffing the small municipality. The small municipality cannot afford the kind of staff that the large one can. We saw one brief presented to us just recently which said that in the safety field only 19 of the 38 municipalities have appointed safety inspectors. Some of the dog catchers and combinations of clerk-engineer and so on take on safety functions, too, as do welfare administrators and all these others. The small municipalities cannot afford either the staff or the present-day machines to do a modern and efficient job.

We saw it in the police system a year ago, where across the province small one-man, two-man and ten-man police forces are not able to cope with the problem of organized crime and the growing crime wave in this province.

Waterloo township, in presenting its brief to us, told about the problem—and I have clippings here which I will not read—of how its fire trucks had to go ten miles through another municipality to reach the scene of a fire. I know there are arrangements being made through municipalities for co-ordination of fire services, but what happens when fire breaks out in a municipality which otherwise might give help to the other one? So the whole co-ordination of firefighting is a problem.

In Hamilton we saw the problem with the suburban roads commission. Hamilton is perfectly willing, you see, to contribute toward the suburban roads commission, because, in the first place, those good roads bring the shoppers in to spend their dollars in the shopping areas in the city. But the roads do the other thing—they also take the families out to the surrounding municipalities to educate the children. So that the burden of education is taken off the taxpayers in the city and they are quite happy with that kind of arrangement.

We saw, too, in the Wentworth roads commission, which is being corrected now, a whole commission administering 1.5 miles of road.

On the hospital situation: Down in Ottawa, Carleton county does not spend any capital money for hospitals but it gets its hospital service in the city of Ottawa, which must foot the bill.

In industry and industrial development—the responsibility of The Department of Economics and Development—we find different areas across the province struggling to bring in industry and each municipality striving to bring industrial assessment within its boundaries to cut down on the tax rate. And so that struggle, which is unco-ordinated, goes on endlessly.

We see the reaching out of a central core of a city trying to annex the suburbs, the struggle for annexation all around the perimeter of so many of our cities. Then there is the strip development from city to city as those municipalities in between strive to get assessment, with hot-dog stands and garages and service stations and theatres and this kind of development.

One of the striking features about many European cities is that you come to the edge of a city and you are in the country; there is no strip development. So far, they have been able to hold that kind of development. At the edge of the city is the rural scene; the new city or the town! The time is here when we have to face the whole problem of strip development along our highways and along our concession roads.

Up in Port Arthur-Fort William, at the head of the lakes—the hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Wardrope), of course, would say this is because of his good administration up there; it is municipal but perhaps he had something to do with it, I do not know—but Port Arthur has abundant water supply. Fort William, just to the west, has to get its water from Port Arthur.

The logical development of this area is to the west; there is plenty of room. But if Port Arthur lets Fort William have more water, and so lets development proceed, it loses the assessment it might otherwise have. So there is a dilemma there which has to be faced.

The result of this situation is that in two cities of almost the same population, both about 45,000 or 46,000, there is a commercial mill rate in Port Arthur of 74.5, and in Fort William it is 84. The public school rate in Port Arthur of 68; in Fort William of 75.

There is a fundamental problem here: How are these municipalities going to get together? Is Port Arthur going to keep its water and forbid development, particularly where Fort William does not have sewage disposal facilities and Port Arthur has? What about the growth of this area? I have here a great many reports from the Ontario water resources commission telling of the situation along our rivers: Some cities and towns with sewage disposal and efficient sewage disposal plants, others with none; industry pouring its effluents into those rivers, even though the towns themselves may have sewage disposal plants—a real problem for that whole river basin, the Thames, the Grand, and many others. So we have the multiplicity of problems reflected in a report by Norman Pearson called "The Failure of Planning in Ontario." This is put out by the civil engineering department of Queen's University. He says this:

Our 970 municipalities, 39 counties, 30 cities, eight separated towns, 150 towns, 154 villages, 575 township municipalities, 20 improvement districts, 11 districts, 3,053 school boards, thousands of other boards and commissions to the tune of one level of government for every 1,200 people, are obsolete. In planning for one simple matter in the Hamilton-Wentworth area, some 87 bodies had to be contacted to get a common planning policy; in the Greater Kitchener area it is necessary to get about 24 chairmen to agree. These are the symptoms of a political failure.

The planning system of Ontario will not be corrected until we radically reform our methods of provincial government, our taxation and grant systems. More and more the real decisions are made at provincial level while the folklore suggests that what matters is local autonomy. More and more the real decisions are made outside the Legislature by appointed boards and commissions and administrative tribunals.

The constant erosion of local government has made nonsense of the original Baldwin concept and now the multiplicity of redundant levels of government militates actively against planning. The myth of local autonomy in an age of centralized power actually weakens local government and destroys responsible government. The functional units, within which we work, are never within one boundary and it is politically impossible to get coherent adherence to a plan when all factors favour irresponsible government. There is no incentive at present to proper planning.

I realize some of the figures that Mr. Pearson gives are not identical with the ones the hon. Minister gave us tonight, but the principle enunciated is still valid and sound.

Faced with this situation, the fact is that the hon. Minister is not only trying to administer an archaic system of municipal government, but his own fellow Cabinet Ministers are ignoring his municipal divisions and are completely at odds, with perhaps one exception, with what he is trying to do. Their administrative units are different from his, and we have the different Cabinet Ministers setting up their own administrative units for their own purposes. Regional offices of all kinds are springing up.

The hon. member for Niagara Falls mentioned the Krueger report which I want to quote briefly here. Professor Krueger says this:

Because of the lack of effective municipal units on a regional scale, many of the Ontario government departments have increasingly had to rely on their own administrative regions. The growing acceptance of regionalism is a valid concept in the development and conservation of resources and, in economic and municipal planning, has led to an increased emphasis on regional programmes implemented through administrative regions. There has been a growing tendency to establish regional offices to help administer Acts on a regional basis, to collect data, to conduct research, to carry out educational programmes, and to provide a means of two-way communication between government and the people, through field representatives.

Generally [he says] each department has eliminated its administrative region for its own specific purpose, without regard to regions of other departments. The basis for eliminating administrative regions has varied from department to department. In some cases the regions have been limited on a basis of physical geography. The Department of Agriculture has used the county as the basic administrative unit and it seems to be the only one that is sticking to that. Other regional boundaries have been chosen arbitrarily in order to divide the province into areas with approximately equal amounts of administrative work. For still others, the regional units seem to have been made on an ad hoc basis which is difficult to explain.

Mr. Chairman, as we look at this situation, we find that various departments have outlined to us what their regions are. We have The Department of Lands and Forests, for example, which gives us 22 regions; Tourism with 32. The Department of Reform Institutions is now encouraging the various municipalities to substitute a new institution for the old county jail, and will give grants if they will group together; but these groupings will likely have no relationship to the others.

Conservation authorities run up and down the river valleys, and so bear little relationship to the others. Education in its regional high schools, Health with its health units, all these are delineated without harmony and in violation of the municipal boundaries within which the Minister has to work. And Krueger says that, after reviewing the provincial regional administrative organizations, one is led to the conclusion that when confronted with an outmoded municipal structure, the government of Ontario, in place of the needed basic reorganization of that structure, superimposed upon it a whole new and complicated set of administrative regions. This expedient has, in turn, created a fundamental impediment to rational planning of resource and economic development.

I realize I am not telling the hon. Minister anything that is new or different here, but the fact is that we are completely out of harmony as far as the Cabinet Ministers and their administrative areas are concerned. Out of this chaos the hon. Minister has a great challenge to bring some sort of harmony;

this is a big job he faces, and this House faces, in this field over the next few years. All this means that we have to think in terms of regional government, which my hon. friend mentioned a few moments ago; but, basic to it all, I think, is a fundamental change in our whole approach to planning in this province. And fundamental to this change is a basic power to plan, and the question, "where is that basic power going to rest?"

Today, of course, the final planning power is with the Ontario municipal board. The OMB does a great deal of work, too much work. It has control of our financing, of our law making at the municipal level, planning of municipalities, and all sorts of odds and ends which the Cabinet Ministers, I suppose, through the years, did not want to be responsible for and shunted off to the municipal board. The board did start with a pretty clear idea of its responsibilities and functions, but those responsibilities grew like Topsy over the years, without any plan, in this haphazard way, until today the OMB is overworked. It has just too many functions; it has too much to do, and it does not have adequate staff to do the job. Any one of us who has tried to get decisions from that board, or information from the board, realizes that the staff just cannot keep up with the volume of work it has to do.

I was interested in looking into the public accounts, Mr. Chairman, and finding that the money spent last year in the public accounts for staff, other than salaries for the board and travelling expenses, was $162,921.32—$163,000, roughly, for staff other than the board itself. This cannot possibly provide staff large enough to do the great volume of work which this board is expected to do. Too many minor things are referred to it and these men cannot handle the volume they are expected to handle.

One of the functions of this board is planning. It handles the official plans, finally, for land use, zoning by-laws, rezoning if disputes are referred, and it has no planning staff to help it.

I would say this: at least those I know on the Ontario municipal board are good people. They are dedicated to a job, and to trying to do a job. But they have had practically no experience, with perhaps two or three exceptions, in the whole field of municipal planning—particularly in the exploding suburban areas where the great problems are met in this field of planning today. These men are expected to be the final experts in the planning field, in a field where they have not had experience. And so they are, as far as planning is concerned, a group of semi-experts struggling to do a job without the advice of a planning staff and without the advice of planning experts they ought to have.

I know that the department does give them some advice from time to time but if they are expected to do this kind of a planning job, Mr. Chairman, I submit that they should have a staff set up adequate to survey the province and do what is expected of them.

I think, for example, of two or three instances of happenings in my own municipality. In the St. Andrews subdivision, at the corner of Bayview and 401, a plan was outlined and submitted to the council, with a density of about 7000 people. For two years and more the council struggled with that plan and then finally it was sent back to the Minister with a density of 2,400, not the 7,000. That is what the council and the planners felt was proper because of the limited access, and because of the various factors there. But the Ontario municipal board gave the original subdividers almost all they wanted with a density of about 6,000 instead of the 2,400 which the local planners felt was right. Today the problems of schools, where registered lots had to be bought, the problems of parks, and particularly the problem of traffic, is building up. The people in that area are now blaming the local council of that day and the planning board and the staff for a bad bit of planning.

I think of another situation: Leslie Street between Sheppard and Finch, east of the Don River where a railway line runs close to Leslie Street. The planners, the planning board and the council tried to work out a logical development of that area. They tried to widen the area between the railway and Leslie Street so that two things could happen; a rational industrial area could be built along that railway, and that the grade separation on Finch Avenue could be far enough away so that the Leslie intersection would not interfere with it. But unfortunately the chairman of Argus Corporation sat with his home at one corner of Leslie and the chairman of Dominion Stores sat at the other. Whether that had a bearing on it or not, I cannot say here tonight, but it was well over a year before that plan which set the area pattern could even get through the municipal board and then it was turned down. Well, these men have rights, but the establishment of their rights presents now to the planning board and the council a whole new set of problems, a new set of problems of how to use that narrow strip between Leslie and the railway, a problem of grade separation, and a problem of a new kind of plan when these pieces of property at each end are to be developed in the future.

Now I quite agree, as I said a moment ago, that the individual landowner has basic rights. But this problem on Leslie Street brought into very sharp focus one of the fundamental planning problems of the municipality, and one which the hon. Minister has to face. I think the hon. Minister will agree and all of us, and certainly it has been the policy of the OMB and most municipalities, that re-zoning of land does not take place unless it is an application from a person who owns the land or at least has an option on it.

That makes sense. I should not be able to make an application for my neighbour's land and have it re-zoned, particularly down in value. But what happens if a municipality wants to plan ahead? What happens when land should be zoned down in order that this plan should go forward? What happens when the president of Argus, or the chairman of Dominion, wants to stay where he is? Or what happens when plain John Doe wants to stay where he is? Yet the municipality wants to plan ahead for two, three, four, five, 20 years. Sometimes street lines must be changed if that kind of rational planning is going to be done. This is the fundamental problem that we face in a situation like this. We are facing it also, I suppose, down the south side of Queen Street.

Ultimately it would seem that the power to make certain fundamental planning decisions must rest with the municipality itself. If it is going to plan ahead, it must be able to expropriate certain key pieces of land, and if it is going to expropriate those key pieces of land—whether they belong to very important people or less important people—then it must have available money which it can borrow at reasonable rates to buy this land. It then becomes an asset for the municipality, it is no liability. To do this, we come back to the big problem of a municipal development bank which other countries have had and which we in Canada desperately need. Perhaps if some of my hon. friends to my right would take the message down to Ottawa, this could be established and established soon.

An hon. member: We will do that.

Mr. Young: Well, I am glad you are going to do that because this is one of the things we need. Now, if the money is there we come to the problem that no municipality has the right to zone a person's land down in value. The municipality should buy it and having bought it take possession of the property, put the zoning on it, or the services. It can change the outline of a street—whatever needs to be done. At that point it can either sell the land back to private developers with a plan on it, or it can move ahead to develop that plan itself.

So here we find one of the key problems that we have to face, and that we have to solve—the problem of long-term planning in the municipality itself.

There is another problem here which the Ontario municipal board poses to us and I want to use an illustration of a case which occurred—the Bimini Crescent case—in my own municipality where in July 1963 bylaw No. 18033 was passed, zoning certain lands. This was in connection with a plan of subdivision. People moved in. Notices had been sent out to the original owners of the land, people who at that time were builders or subdividers. The assessment rolls had not been brought up to date at that time of year and so the people who moved in—and a few were there at the time—did not get notices. Because of that, the Ontario municipal board in December, 1963, ordered that the original bylaw be set aside.

Then a little later came a hearing, May 12, 1964, and at that time the board said certain things. They believed they had been mistaken in the original bylaw. They said they were surprised to discover that most of the proposed new location of a six-acre park shown on exhibit one was included in the area, and most of the proposed park already had been re-zoned for semi-detached or duplex dwellings and only one acre or slightly less was left for park purposes. In some way the Ontario municipal board had made a mistake here. They said that having been misled by the evidence of the applicants' chief witness—this was an official of the North York planning board—the board could only assume that the objectors were similarly misled, and that their objections might have been stronger in the argument of counsel on their behalf, and more vigorous, if they had been aware that the proposed park location shown to them on exhibit one was not available.

As a matter of fact, the park was available. A mistake was made. And further representations were made to the board with the result that on September 22, 1964, the board confirmed the original bylaw 18033 passed on July 22, 1963. But at that time the board said nothing about its statement which got very great press coverage across this province, about being misled by the evidence of the applicants' chief witness. Because of that statement a municipality was branded as doing very poor planning. An election came on. In that election, this case played a very prominent part. On platform after platform the statement of the Ontario municipal board was quoted and much bitterness built up because it was said that the planning people in that municipality had misled the Ontario municipal board and that poor planning had been done. That incident played a very large part in the elections last fall, even though in the midst of the campaign the board reversed its decision and okayed the original concept.

So I say tonight that the Ontario municipal board has no business in the planning field, except in one area. I bring before you the Gordon report. I hesitate to quote an authority such as Walter Gordon in this House, because of the smiles that it might bring to certain of my hon. friends here, but Walter Gordon, in this case I think, had far better advice than he had a little later in certain affairs that happened in Ottawa. In any case the Gordon report dealt with certain problems that municipalities are facing, and among them he made two recommendations, one of which has already been implemented, the transfer of certain functions to The Department of Municipal Affairs. But he also said this:

At the present time, official plans and amendments require the approval of the responsible Minister, but he may, and if requested, shall refer them for approval to the municipal board. This procedure has the merit of providing an opportunity to hold a public hearing, a feature which we believe should be preserved. After its examination, however, instead of making a final decision on the matter, the board should submit its recommendation to the Minister and the final decision should rest with him. In making his decision the Minister no doubt would be influenced very greatly by the recommendation of the board and would also be able to take into account information, supplied by his departmental officials, of a technical character relating to the proposed plan and to the financial competence of the municipalities and others involved in the project. Quite apart from this, the proposed change would comply with the principle of ministerial responsibility.

This report has been gathering dust in the library since the time it was issued in 1959, and it would almost appear that this government is anxious to see it buried as far as this part of it is concerned. I will give them credit; they did implement the first part, but this part has not been implemented; and, to date, we have no assurance that it is going to be.

It may well be that the government hopes it can be forgotten and that the Ontario municipal board will continue to take the heat off the Minister when there is a dispute between subdividers and voters. That heat deflection is a valuable function of the municipal board as far as the government is concerned, but it is not a proper function of the board.

The responsibility for planning should be with the Minister concerned. The Ontario municipal board is not a policy-making body, or it should not be. The Minister himself should be carrying that function of making policy. That responsibility should be put back where it ought to be and the Minister himself should have the final say.

As the Gordon report suggests, he could refer disputes to the board for hearing and it can make recommendations. But those recommendations then come back to the Minister and there the Minister makes the decisions.

If this happens, and even if it does not, the Minister is faced with a problem of expanding his staff. He has mentioned tonight how he is struggling with this problem of trying to get people. I know that there is a tremendous bleeding process in a staff of the kind the hon. Minister gathers together. As municipalities build up, establish planning staffs and planning boards and want planners, they perhaps, first of all, look toward the provincial department. So a lot of people pass through and, in that way, get valuable training and are able to pass on that training to the province as a whole. But certainly there should be a very great build-up of staff as quickly as possible, within the department itself; and those people should be trained in the planning function.

The hon. Minister has mentioned, at various times, the problem he has in building planning boards and getting municipalities to take this responsibility. On January 16, 1965, the Toronto Daily Star reports him as saying that, of the 385 planning boards in Ontario, 150 of them may be said to be inactive—either because they have ceased to exist through non-appointment of members or because there is no current planning being carried on. Only 34 per cent of the planning areas is covered by official plans and, of these, 39 per cent is out of date and otherwise inadequate.

This, perhaps, is not the fault of this hon. Minister particularly, except insofar as he has been a member of this government over the years. At the present time, I will give him credit in that he is trying to get things moving and trying to do a job in the planning field. But the job is so big that far more money must be allocated for this job. Far more staff must be built up, and built up quickly, so that that staff can give assistance across the province; and also, if the Gordon report should be implemented, it can give the kind of planning advice that the hon. Minister will need in that regard.

In the Krueger report again, on page 19, we have these words:

It has been stated by government officials on a number of occasions that the purpose of these surveys was to provide the facts upon which a regional planning organization could be based.

These are the studies to which the hon. Minister referred tonight:

However, in most cases, the regional studies have not resulted in the establishment of an effective regional planning organization. The government seems to have been unwilling to act unless there was spontaneous demand from the municipalities in the region, and the municipalities have not requested action because they do not seem to appreciate the need for a regional organization to tackle problems that are regional in nature.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister has spoken of regional planning boards and his encouragement to planners on a county basis, but the fundamental problem here is one of power. The regional planning board, or even a county planning board today, under the present set-up, can make recommendations; but it might make recommendations to two, four, six, or a dozen municipalities within that area. But if one of those municipalities refuses to carry out the recommendation, the co-ordinated plan that is recommended cannot be implemented in full. And while one or two of the municipalities might be willing to implement the plan, that plan, if it is a united and co-ordinated plan, stands or falls in its entirety. And while some advantage would accrue to a few municipalities to implement part of the recommendations, by and large, unless the whole thing is done, the planning board finds itself frustrated. It begins to ask what is the purpose of working to discover what the best planning procedures are for the area while many of the officials concerned refuse to take it seriously.

Along with the expanded staff in the department, Mr. Chairman, one of the early jobs which should be undertaken by that staff and by the hon. Minister, is a survey of this province, thinking in terms of regional governments of the most practical kind, regional governments which will reflect what is already being done by the other members of this Cabinet, regional governments which will encompass within them logical planning areas, river valleys, the various regions the other Cabinet Ministers have outlined.

That harmony will not be easy, but a thoroughgoing study should be undertaken so that this job can be advanced. I would say tonight that definite areas should be studied; areas such as the Lakehead, Sudbury, Ottawa, Kingston, Oshawa, Hamilton and the Niagara area, the Kitchener-Galt complex, London, Windsor and the Georgian Bay tourist area, where the whole problem of lake pollution and use of land has to be faced, and faced soon, if we are to rationalize our whole tourist programme and our whole cottage development.

No purpose is served in this study unless the cities and the separated towns are brought into the region as part and parcel of these regions. As regional government is set up, it is only in a government of that total area that the study shows there is sense in co-ordination.

With this regional survey, something else must be done. The next step must be the establishment of a provincial land-use plan which will lay down the guide lines over the next couple of decades, delineating certain areas where certain kinds of development will take place. In a short brief presented to the mayors and reeves in Sudbury last year—and I can vouch that the hon. Minister was there for the last day or so and made a good speech to the convention. The brief says:

The province must decide, for example, whether the only areas in which we can successfully grow grapes, peaches and other soft fruits, should be conserved for this purpose, or whether industrial users should be allowed to overrun them. The province must decide whether green belt and agricultural areas should separate Oshawa, Toronto, Port Credit, Oakville, Hamilton and Niagara Falls, providing fresh food and breathing space, or whether the so-called Golden Horseshoe should be allowed to complete its urban sprawl around the head of the lake. The same applies to other industrial constellations around the Great Lakes and elsewhere.

Plans for development of northern Ontario in industry, agriculture, mining, forestry, fishing, tourism and holiday industries, and so on, should be laid down so clearly that northern municipalities would have a proper frame of reference in which to operate. Only senior governments have staff and resources thus to map the future of the north.

Mr. Chairman, a land-use plan such as this should be flexible; it must not have rigidity so that it brings development within a strait-jacket. But it must give guide lines so that land is designated for these uses, and municipalities can plan within these designated uses, over the years ahead.

This having been accomplished, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the hon. Minister that the next step that should be taken, as regions are established in this province and as regional governments are set up, is that the final power to plan should be handed over to these regional governments except in the case of border disputes. I presume that when two municipalities cannot agree upon certain fundamental problems affecting both of them along their boundaries, at that point the hon. Minister and his staff would have to step in and perhaps make some decisions. And so the hon. Minister, with that responsibility—and I suppose a power of appeal would have to be set up here, too—would press for the development of more regions and the handing over of more planning power to those new regions.

The final goal of the hon. Minister in this field, it seems to me, would be to get final planning power out of his own department, except for those bits and pieces of municipalities that may not be within regional governments.

But I suppose that day will never come entirely for this matter, and I suppose that there will always be a real problem for the Minister in this field. Even though the regional governments took over this final power to plan and set up their own appeal boards, with final appeal perhaps back through to the government, the fact remains that the Minister will still need a very large staff and a very efficient staff. He will still need to train his people to feed them into these new regional governments.

And while we look to the future, and while I hope this hon. Minister is planning along these lines, we realize that the road is long and difficult and is not going to be easy. But one thing is dead certain: Unless we outline a plan for the future, unless we begin along steps which are practical and feasible, we are not going to even start on a programme such as this. We are still going to be handicapped by the kind of problem the hon. Minister has. So I hope that he will be able to persuade his own friends in the Cabinet to allow him to do what they are now doing; that they will allow him to tackle this problem of regional government realistically; that they will give him the financial resources and the manpower to build this kind of practical regional development in the municipal field. If they do that, and if they say to him: "Mr. Minister, you must modernize your department now and build new boundaries and new concepts in municipal government." Then I think this province is on the way to a future which can be bright in the municipal field.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted to pass a few remarks about some of the comments of my hon. friends.

In the first place, I would like to thank my hon. friend from Niagara Falls for his very kind comments. The hon. members of the House might be interested in knowing that he and I have been interested and actively involved in municipal administration for many years; and though he was a municipal representative from a municipality in the southern part of the province and I was from the northern part of the province, and our municipalities were separated by perhaps 500 or 600 miles, nevertheless we had the opportunity on several occasions during the year to meet with the municipal associations of which we were fortunate enough to be executive members. In that way, I must say, Mr. Chairman, I acquired a very real appreciation of my hon. friend from Niagara Falls and his work in the municipality in which he resided, where he still resides and has resided for many years. On these occasions when I present the estimates of this department or legislation involving municipalities, I know that I am talking to him and that he understands and knows the subject matter of our discussions. So in order that we may understand that we are not coming to the hon. members of the Legislature under false pretences, I wanted to make this statement, that it has been my pleasure to have been associated with the hon. member for Niagara Falls, not only in this House, but in many activities of a municipal nature before we both became members of this Legislature.

There was reference made by the hon. member in connection with a telegram which had been sent to the hon. Prime Minister from the president of the Ontario mayors and reeves association. I am sure that you realize that it is not possible for the hon. Prime Minister to answer all of the communications which cross his desk. The subject matter of this telegram was entirely a municipal matter and the hon. Prime Minister asked me to reply to this communication. I did, and I explained the situation to the president of the Ontario mayors and reeves association, and I advised him in my letter that after the receipt of this telegram, the hon. Prime Minister had discussed the matter with me. I advised him, I had given the hon. Prime Minister a full report on what the subject matter was, what attention and consideration and study had been given to the subject matter, and I set out all of these things.

The subject matter of the telegram was related to an item of legislation which was debated in this House and approved by the Legislature during the session of 1964. I had given the matter consideration during the year, and representations had been made on both sides of the argument by many people interested in this subject. I felt that a reply coming from my office would be sufficient to satisfy the inquiry of the president of the mayors and reeves. Had I thought that he would not have been satisfied with that answer, I would have had the reply prepared for the signature of the hon. Prime Minister and it would have been sent in that way.

So I do not think there was any great difference insofar as the recipient of the telegram was concerned. At the same time, there was correspondence from the clerk of the city of London regarding the same subject, and in that instance the hon. Prime Minister himself took the time to reply and I have a copy of his reply here.

Mr. Singer: But that one was from London, that is different.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, maybe.

Mr. Singer: That is just a little different—if it comes from London it gets more attention.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, anyway, I think that the recommendation contained in the telegram from the mayors and reeves association was given every consideration, and that as far as we are concerned the matter is now closed.

In connection with this particular piece of legislation—and it deals with the matter of the handling of land severances—you might be interested if I were to refer to some other correspondence here. I might say that in a number of instances, members of the association of mayors and reeves have taken the trouble of communicating with us here, either in The Department of Municipal Affairs or directly to the hon. Prime Minister, advising that it was not the opinion of this particular municipality, or these particular municipalities, that the executive of the Ontario mayors and reeves were speaking on their behalf. I have here in my hand, a copy of a letter which went to the hon. Prime Minister enclosing a copy of the letter to the president of the mayors and reeves, advising them that as far as this particular member was concerned—he represented a member municipality—the stand of the mayors and reeves was not his stand, and that his municipality was favourable to the legislation which has now been proclaimed.

Mr. Singer: You are bound to find dissenters.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: There have been more than one or two dissenters.

Mr. Singer: Some disagreed with you, though.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That was the executive, not the body.

We have arranged a number of seminars in the province of Ontario to deal with this matter concerning the transfer of consent granting authority from planning boards to committees of adjustment. There will be a session held in London, Ontario, on March 25. Another one will be held in Brockville on March 31. One will be held in Sudbury on April 5, and one will be held at the Lakehead on April 8. There will be others held in different parts of the province, so that all of those people interested in the subject matter, will have the opportunity to discuss the rules and regulations and the methods of dealing with these severances with the departmental staff. So, I think for the moment, Mr. Chairman, we will leave that matter.

Now, the next matter mentioned by my hon. friend from Niagara Falls, dealt with the matter of the administration of justice costs, and just at the moment I cannot give you figures to substantiate the statement which I make now, but more than a year ago—it is perhaps two years ago, as a matter of fact, I think it was before, no, it was while I have been in The Department of Municipal Affairs, it was in the days of the former Attorney General—one of the municipalities made an appeal to us that the cost of the administration of justice in this particular municipality, was onerous. And so it was decided at that time that we would brief departmental staff to study the actual cost involved in this, and when we received the report of our staff we were very much surprised to find that it did not cost this municipality anything for the administration of justice. As a matter of fact, they were making a few dollars, and we asked the representatives of the municipalities to come to a meeting and we gave them this information. I might say that we have not heard from them since.

I do not say that that applies to all the municipalities across the province that are faced with this question, but I might mention again that when the hon. Prime Minister and the Cabinet approved the appointment of what is known as the Ontario committee on taxation headed by Mr. Lancelot J. Smith, that all of these municipal expenditures and municipal revenues were matters which were referred to this committee for study and report. It might be valuable to refer at the present time to the terms of reference of this committee.

The committee is composed of Mr. Smith, Mr. Eric Hardie of Toronto, Dr. R. Craig MacIvor of Hamilton, Mr. Carl Pollock of Kitchener and Mr. R. Bredin Stapells, QC, of Toronto.

The committee was charged with the responsibility under The Public Inquiries Act to:

(a) Inquire into, and report upon, the taxation and revenue system of the province of Ontario and its municipalities and school boards; in relation to their expenditures the tax and revenue sources available to them; their debts and other financial obligations, with a view to determining whether, within the constitution of limitations existing, and having regard to present and potential financial requirements, such tax and revenue system is a simple, clear, equitable, efficient, adequate and as conducive to the sound growth of the province as can be devised.

(b) In connection therewith, to inquire into such other matters as the commissioner shall deem advisable.

(c) To co-operate with the Royal commission on taxation, and with any other bodies of inquiries appointed by other provincial governments, and

(d) After due study and consideration, to make such recommendations in accordance with the objectives and terms set out herein, as the commissioners see fit, to the Prime Minister and the Executive Council of Ontario.

As you know, this committee is still in operation. It has not yet finalized its study, and I hope that in due course of time—I am advised that it is hoped that the committee will be reporting some time this coming summer—that this study in considerable depth will be able to provide information as to the terms of reference which have been referred to it, and which will deal with the matters of the municipal-provincial cost and how these matters of welfare, administration of justice and these other matters can be improved and how they may be improved.

I think that we all realize that there is no money-making machine here in the hands of the hon. Provincial Treasurer; he just has so much money. As a matter of fact the complaint is that he is spending more than he takes in, and placing future generations in the position where they are going to have to repay debts that are now being consummated by the present residents of the province. Some day these things are going to have to be paid.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Who is making that complaint?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I think it has been said in this House—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I would say that at the present time there would appear to be a very reasonable balance between the revenues of the province and the debts of the province. I think that we could, perhaps, take an analysis of the provincial debt and indicate that it would appear to be, in its present form, certainly, good business practice. So I agree with the hon. Provincial Treasurer in what he has done in this regard.

Now, great stress has been placed, not only by my friend, the hon. member for Niagara Falls, but also from the hon. member for Yorkview, in connection with regional government. As we all know, we have in this province, at the present time, 38 county organizations. When you examine the legislation that is now available—the authority now available to the county organizations—there is no doubt that there is, in the municipal legislation at the present time, very many areas where county government should become more active than it has in the past. I have tried in the several years that I have headed this department, to co-operate with the association of counties in the province, and we have tried to instil greater interest and activity into county government.

We have not achieved very much success, but I think that we have made some progress. As an example of our co-operation, in co-operation with the cities of Ottawa, Eastview and Carleton county last year we entered into an agreement involving a special study of the area that I mentioned, which is supported financially by the province of Ontario and by the municipalities which I have mentioned.

The terms of reference in the particular case of the Ottawa-Eastview-Carleton county local government review—50 per cent paid by the province and 50 per cent by the participating municipalities—the terms of reference of this study, Mr. Chairman, may be of interest. These are:

To inquire into and report upon: (a) the structure, organization and methods of operation of all the municipalities and their local boards in the county of Carleton, including the cities of Ottawa, Eastview and the corporation of the county of Carleton.

(b) All aspects of the functions and responsibilities of the existing local government institutions within the said area and, in particular, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, intermunicipal relations and problems which concern, or may concern, any two or more of the municipal corporations or local boards having jurisdiction within the said area.

(c) Here we get into the planning end of it—the anticipated future development of the area or other changes therein which may require the reorganization or revision of the existing system of local government in the area.

(d) The effect of present and anticipated future projects and operations of the national government upon the responsibilities and resources of local government therein, and

(e) Any other related matters affecting the local government structure within the area.

I think those terms of reference are of the broadest—as broad as they possibly could be. The hon. member for Niagara Falls has in his possession a copy of the initial research work which has been done. The consultants performing this work are holding public hearings and discussing a very large number of briefs which are being presented to the consultant, so that before too long we expect to have a report on this study of the review of all the facts of municipal administration in that particular area of the province.

In this area, you will remember that—I think it is about 20 years ago—the federal government called into Ottawa a planning consultant from France who designed the development of the national capital, and a very fine design it was and is. Actually, this planner, not being able to look into the crystal ball any more than one of us, I think myself—and I am no planner, I have no time to be—I think that he failed to realize the great increase there would be in federal government operation in the national capital, because the development that he saw taking place as of 1980, has now arrived in 1965. The green belt surrounding the national capital, I think we may find, is not quite in the right position. It may have to be moved out.

Those are some of the things that occur, and you find through a study in the local municipality. But you cannot take that study and that report and apply it to Metropolitan Toronto, or Hamilton or Welland, or some other place.

For that reason, we have conducted a number of studies of our own and some in connection with other municipalities. Professor Krueger has been mentioned. Another one has been Professor Mayo, who has done some considerable amount of work in Welland and Lincoln counties. These studies are going to be, I think, an indication to us as to what can take place, and perhaps in the future, if we have the results of half a dozen or a dozen of these studies in reasonably large areas, we may be able to get some trends that would indicate to the department that what has worked out well in one area, might fit somewhere else. This is what we are doing now.

In connection with the Lincoln and Welland areas, much work has been done by the counties. With the help of Professor Mayo—and there may have been others—we have agreed to put up a proposition to those municipalities in those two counties, and we have already arranged that we are going to call a meeting of representatives of the municipalities in these two counties in Niagara Falls on April 28. That is the earliest date, because I want to be there myself. That is the earliest date that I can see that I can be present and it is the earliest date at which I can be sure to have present the reeve of Thorold township, who has been a very important figure in promoting this study that has taken place in the past.

An hon. member: Good fellow!

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Yes, of course; he is another friend of mine of many years standing in municipal administration. I am glad to know that you think he is a good fellow, because I have a very great deal of respect for him; I think he is a very fine man.

Mr. Bukator: There is only one thing wrong with him.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Is that so?

Mr. Bukator: He belongs to the NDP.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Oh, I was not aware of that.

Mr. Singer: He was one of those people who opposed the land division system.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: He opposed that one; that is all right. That is a matter of opinion. I think that talking about the land severance again, give us a year or so, and all these things will find their proper place and you will not hear any more arguments at all.

Mr. MacDonald: Maybe evidence will prove you are wrong as well as the association.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I am not going to worry about that at the moment.

The hon. member for Yorkview has said, and rightly so, that municipal administration in the province is a problem. We have 6.5 million people, the larger proportion of them centred in the large urban areas of Metropolitan Toronto, Hamilton, London, Windsor and so on. We have many rural areas, which require municipal services, where financial ability to pay for services is limited, financial ability to invest is limited. Our growing population is centered more and more in the urban areas, and we try to spread them out through the activities of our community planning branch, and so on and so forth.

You have no idea, sir, how difficult it is to deal with this matter of subdivision plans, for instance, and land severances, and the requests which come to my desk and my staff. Every developer in the country has an idea that all he has got to do is cut up a piece of land into lots and go out and sell it and make a fortune. Of course, that is where we stop him.

Mr. Singer: That is the whole point of the argument.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That is the whole point of the argument; that is right. And that is where we stop him; because we say, "Oh no, you must provide for the municipal services which the buyers of these lands are going to require, and you have got to put up land for other purposes, such as park lands."

Mr. Bryden: And he tacks that onto the price.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, why not? He cannot get it anywhere else.

Mr. Singer: That is just what the committee of adjustment cannot do.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Oh, the committee of adjustment is going to look after your problem. You are going to be so happy it is not going to be funny; because it is going to bring all these questions dealing with the matters of severances of land out in the open, where they have not been in the past. And I am telling you there will be no nonsense, because severances have taken place in this province about which the adjoining owners and neighbours did not know anything for years. Was that fair? Not at all.

Mr. Singer: If you cannot control this matter, that is your fault.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: We are going to get it out in the open; that is what is going to take place with the new legislation. There will be no developers making nice quiet operations for land severances without the public knowing about it. That is where we have got to get this done. Let us deal with that and I am sure you will find that, within a year from now, everybody will understand where they stand with this matter of land severance.

Mr. Singer: We have that now with the municipalities which operate in this province and you are responsible if it does not operate satisfactorily.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I just passed the legislation last year, and we proclaimed the Act as of May 3. That is the way it is going to be.

Mr. Singer: You have dug in your heels.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Yes, sir; and we are not going to have any more of this business of land severance taking place and then, several years later, the neighbour finding out that a severance has taken place, he has never been notified, he does not know anything about it, and his land has been injuriously affected because of that.

Mr. Singer: That is just a red herring.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: There is no red herring at all; because if it were not here—and I do not want to be naming names. I would be able to tell you some of them, you see, and you might be surprised. Let us end it at that, because this is going to work out properly, you just wait and see.

We will get back to municipal administration. As hon. members know, we expect momentarily to obtain a report from the chairman of the committee which has been studying The Municipal Act and related Acts.

Mr. Singer: Presses are turning this minute.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Yes, the presses are turning this minute. I have been made aware of that by the chairman of the committee.

What have I done to meet that problem when I get that final report? I will tell you what I have done. In order to prepare myself,

I act like the surgeon who is going to operate on someone tomorrow morning. He makes arrangements with the hospital to have an operating room, to have staff and nurses and so on, and he sharpens his scalpel.

Mr. MacDonald: Have you made arrangements with the undertaker?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I do not know about the undertaker; I am not going to bury anyone.

One of the very loyal and hard-working members of The Department of Municipal Affairs for the past several years has been Dr. Lorne Cumming. I must pay tribute to Lorne Cumming for the contribution he has made to municipal government in this province—right from the time he was city solicitor in Windsor, went to the Ontario municipal board, and eventually came into The Department of Municipal Affairs as a deputy Minister. I have enjoyed my association with him.

Dr. Cumming was 70 years of age on January 14, 1965 and, according to civil service regulations, he must retire.

Mr. MacDonald: Appoint him to the Senate!

Hon. Mr. Spooner: No, we cannot appoint him to the Senate.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Knowing that the report on The Municipal Act and related Acts was going to be promulgated—I think that would be a good word for it—in due course of time, I came to the conclusion that it would be wise on my part to retain the services of Dr. Cumming as an adviser and to charge him with the responsibility of doing the work that would come about as a result of this fine report. So, Dr. Cumming is, like myself, awaiting momentarily for this report so that he can get to work in sorting it out. Of course, in the meantime, he is busy with other responsibilities, such as the—

Mr. MacDonald: He is keeping his hand in.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: He is keeping his hand in, yes—such as the study in Carleton county, and the study in the Welland-Lincoln county areas. We have another project under way involving municipalities in the county of Waterloo.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. Minister has no idea of what is in the report?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I have no idea what is in the report; no, sir.

Mr. Thompson: The hon. Minister said it is a fine report.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I am told it is, yes. I have been assured of that. But I have no knowledge of its contents any more than anyone else, other than the members of the committee. I am quite convinced, of course, that the members of the committee know what is in the report. Not being one of those, I have no idea what is in the report.

Mr. Bryden: Did the hon. Minister watch CBC on Sunday?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: No, I did not watch CBC on Sunday. I have no time to watch CBC any day, let alone Sunday. I was at a meeting with some of my Legionnaire friends on Sunday and had no time to look at television.

However, Dr. Cumming in the meantime has some special responsibilities in the department. Mention was made about the development of the municipalities at the Lakehead. I want to say something about that also because that is another area where we are going to undertake a study on a similiar basis to that which I have explained in other areas, and there again we are going to proceed to the Lakehead to arrange a meeting with the five municipalities. There are two cities and three townships, and we are going to discuss with them the possibility of engaging an outside consultant to undertake a study of this kind to see whether it can be proven to the municipal people, and also to the residents of the area, that there would be some advantage gained in some form of regional government. As you know, in the territorial districts there is no county council.

I think that we are making some progress in these fields, and I am quite convinced that as the years go by, that county government or regional government will get back into performing its own functions on a regional basis. I am quite convinced that there are many areas of municipal administration today that could be better performed on a regional basis than can be performed on an individual basis. To give you an example, in the field of municipal assessment, for instance, today with the use of data processing equipment, I am sure—because I have done municipal assessment myself—I am sure that a much more efficient operation can be carried on with a large assessment so that the costs can be distributed over a very large area.

Mr. Bryden: Would the hon. Minister permit a question?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Yes, sir.

Mr. Bryden: Does the hon. Minister think that the counties can operate efficiently as a form of regional government when the cities are separated from them?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That is one of the points that I am not going to try to answer tonight, because it is a pretty complicated thing. Of course, we must remember that the cities in many cases are subscribing funds to the suburban roads, and it could very well be that a study of this situation would indicate that the city might be better to come back into the county organizations where it would not have to subscribe to the suburban roads. You see, there are arguments on both sides of the fence, and I am not prepared at the moment to say that one is better than the other.

I was dealing with the matter of assessment. Under either a district assessor or a county assessment commissioner, I think that we are making progress in making a profession of municipal assessments. We have spent a lot of money to rebuild our assessors' course. We have agreed to pay a subsidy of 60 per cent of the cost of tuition to the individual who passes the course. We are going to make some more progress in that field.

I hoped that the municipalities would put up the other 40 per cent. I do not know of any which have so far, but I would hope they would. I think by having assessors or people working in assessment who would be doing only that, that they will have a greater interest in maintaining their position and improving their position. I am quite convinced that with the subsidies that we are paying towards the cost of county and district assessments, that better paying jobs will be available to these people who will make a career of this work.

Mr. Singer: But you have to be brave enough, as brave as the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis), to make them do it instead of just suggesting it.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That is right. I am not quite as brave as he is.

Mr. Thompson: What about the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond)?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: It is now 11 o'clock and I am not very brave at 11 o'clock.

However, I wanted to say something about staff training again, because we are into another field also and mention has been made about community planners. Planning people are very hard to get. I thought I was very smart by putting planners out in the branch offices and, just as the hon. member for Yorkview said has taken place, they were stolen from me by the municipalities. Basically, you see, that is a good thing.

It is a good thing that those particular people have come to The Department of Municipal Affairs and are going to work in a municipality. That is perfectly all right, but it certainly creates havoc with my staff.

Now, here is what we are going to try to do this spring. We are going to bring into the department perhaps five or six young men from grade 12 or grade 13, and we are going to pay them a salary, and we are going to put them through a training course in the community planning branch in the hope that in a year or two we will have not planners, not engineers with a planning specialty at MIT in Boston, for instance, we will have people who will be able to go out in our branch offices and from our head office, who will be able to discuss planning matters knowledgeably with the professional planners, the consultants, and in turn with the municipal people.

I think that in that area, Mr. Chairman, we can make some progress.

Mr. Singer: You are not going to keep them unless you pay them good salaries.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: We are going to pay them, and I have already arranged all that with the civil service people. We are going to pay them a salary that will be a reasonable salary, it is not going to be—

Mr. Bryden: Not like the salaries you used to pay?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I do not know what they used to pay.

Mr. Singer: Not like the salaries you paid your planners who went to the municipalities?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Just a minute now. I think the planners we had in our branch offices were reasonably well paid, and there has been an adjustment, as you know, in the matter of salaries of all civil servants within the last year or two. I think the salary schedules we have, by and large, are reasonable. I know that the hon. Provincial Treasurer and the civil service commission and the association are always in consultation on these matters.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that I have dealt with a number of these matters. There are many other details that the hon. member for Yorkview, particularly, has mentioned, and I have made notes of those. I hope when I come back next year I will be able to show a little more progress than has taken place in the last 12 months.

But I want to assure you of my intense desire to make progress in the field of municipal administration in the province, because I think it is most important that local people, through their municipal councils at whatever level, have to realize that we are in a different age, and we have to make progress. They have to accept more and more responsibility at the local level. One of the things that we are trying to do in the department is to provide more responsibility for the local councils in various ways, and as I bring in legislation during this session, I think you will see that I act in the way that I speak. Thank you.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, three-quarters of the department is under the first vote.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: If you want to go on, we can go on all night on this 1301.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves that the committee rise and report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report progress and asks for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will resume the estimates of this department.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 11.05 o'clock, p.m.

Mr. Speaker: We are always pleased to have visitors to the Legislature, and today we welcome as guests, students from the following schools: In the west gallery, Deer Park public school, Toronto; and in the east gallery, North collegiate institute, Barrie, Central collegiate institute, Barrie, and Oakville-Trafalgar high school, Oakville.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary and Minister of Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would ask your indulgence and the indulgence of the hon. members of this House, to make a short statement.

The other day, on the occasion of the second reading of Bill No. 30, I made reference to an incident which happened between the Steel Company of Canada and myself, an incident which was duly reported in the newspapers.

In fairness to the vast bulk of that organization and to the present-day Steel Company of Canada, may I say that that incident happened over a quarter of a century ago, in the late 1930s, and that the Steel Company of Canada was an organization of some considerable size even then, with divisions and branches. My relationship with the Steel Company of Canada in the years that followed were of the highest kind. Indeed, if I had not worked the following five summers with the Steel Company of Canada, I would no doubt have been unable to complete law school and Osgoode Hall. My father has completed 34 years of service with the Steel Company of Canada, is retired on pension, and is still unable to understand how the steel company can operate without him, but he is resigned to that.

May I say that the Steel Company of Canada, in the 25 years that has passed, has proven itself to be one of the outstanding corporations of the country. I would want nothing that I said the other day to be misinterpreted as relating to anything of a recent nature.

Hon. L. P. Cecile (Minister of Public Welfare): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day I would like to make an announcement which I am sure will be agreeable to all hon. members of the House.

Commencing April 1, 1965, some important changes in regulations of The Mothers' Allowances Act and The Dependant Fathers' Allowances Act will be effective. For both these allowances, there will be an increase across the board which will average 15 per cent. We have also removed the previous maximum which amounted to $255 a month, and replaced it by a ceiling of $300 monthly for any case. Of course, additional benefits continue, such as medical, hospital and dental services, and family allowances.

Another notable feature is that of increased exemptions permitted for earnings from employment. The new regulations allow employment of 120 hours monthly, in place of 24 hours weekly, and the income exemption has been nearly tripled, based, of course, on the size of the family. For example, a woman with three children previously would have obtained an exemption of $23 monthly. Under the new provisions, she can now earn $60 a month, without deductions, plus 25 per cent of any amount beyond that sum. This regulation will give more flexibility and encouragement to women who are in a position to accept employment. Where a son or daughter in the household is employed, we have provided for a complete exemption of their income up to $80 monthly.

Foster mothers' allowances have been increased in this instance from the previous rate of $30 to a new rate of $40 monthly.

These amendments, effective from April 1, will involve a review of some 12,000 cases.

I shall also inform the House that the Cabinet has approved, with effect from April 1, an increase in the rate under The Homemakers and Nurses Services Act. The new sharing arrangements provide for homemakers services at an amount up to $12 per day, in place of the previous maximum of $8. The restriction of the homemakers employment to an eight-hour day, has also been removed.

Payment for nurses services has been established at $4.50 a visit, in place of the previous $2.50 a call.

The province shares 50 per cent of these expenditures.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I was wondering if the hon. Minister would permit a question. The question is this: Has he given any thought to giving an allowance to those families who are not on welfare, but whose income is actually less than those who receive welfare?

Hon. Mr. Cecile: Mr. Speaker, the only answer I can give to that is that this matter is being studied. There is nothing definite yet, but it is under study.

Mr. Trotter: Is there any hope of doing something?

Hon. Mr. Cecile: I am afraid that I cannot even give that information to my hon. friend at the present time.

Mr. S. Farquhar (Algoma-Manitoulin): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I have a question to ask of the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts), notice of which has been given to him.

What steps is the department taking to ensure that all of its conservation officers are officially sworn in under the provision of The Game and Fish Act?

Hon. A. K. Roberts (Minister of Lands and Forests): Mr. Speaker, the question of my hon. friend appears to have arisen from an article appearing in the Sudbury Star of yesterday, which infers that conservation officers of the province of Ontario should be sworn in, and that without such oath, they have no authority to administer The Game and Fish Act.

I should like to assure the hon. member that there is no requirement for a conservation officer appointed under The Game and Fish Act of Ontario be sworn in, except such oaths of allegiance and secrecy as are required under The Public Service Act. These oaths are taken by a conservation officer at the time he is first employed by the department. With his appointment as a conservation officer no further oath is required to authorize him to carry out his duties.

Accordingly, the department will not be taking any action along the lines mentioned by the hon. member. Some department staff who are conservation officers hold office under federal statute, such as fishery officers under The Fisheries Act, or ex-officio game officers under The Migratory Birds Convention Act. In making the appointments under the federal statute, it may be that the federal authority has omitted to arrange for the administering of an oath for due performance of duties, but that has now been remedied.

Mr. Speaker: The member for York South.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Haskett).

Would the hon. Minister tell the House whether his department makes a practice of selling a carbon copy of passenger motor vehicle permits to private firms; and, if so, for what purpose?

Hon. I. Haskett (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, an arrangement was made more than 30 years ago with Might's Directories Limited, whereby a copy of the motor vehicle registration information was made available to it. In return for the information, the company agreed to pay to the department, one cent per registration, and to supply the department with a statistical breakdown of all registration information by counties and cities.

The company was authorized to sell statistical information to the motor vehicle manufacturers relating to new motor vehicle sales, and to others in the automotive trade for advertising purposes. This information is now supplied to R. L. Polk Limited, who purchased the motor list part of the business of the original company and, I might add, sir, that every province and every state on the continent, makes similar information available for like use.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The eighteenth order, House in committee of supply; Mr. W. E. Sandercock in the chair.

On vote 1301:

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who regretted to hear the proclamation of a certain bill last year, Bill No. 132, which the hon. Minister (Mr. Spooner) discussed last night. I was rather interested in some of the statements he made at that time, regarding the consent transfer. He said, as I understood him, that the main reason for this transfer of consents from the planning board to the committee of adjustment was so that a public hearing might be held. I find it difficult to understand all the ramifications of what he has said, because fundamentally most lands where land divisions are made are already zoned, and if they are not zoned, then a public hearing must be held in regard to the re-zoning. More than that, one of the big places where suburban areas find the need for this kind of land division is in subdivision plans, where registered lots are already in existence and where blocks may exist zoned for apartment buildings of some other purpose. Then a syndicate wants to buy a certain part of that apartment land, and for purposes of mortgage, the land needs to be divided.

Zoning is not affected. And yet under this kind of a transfer which the hon. Minister has recently announced a public hearing must now be held in the case of single family lots. I may have a house built on two lots, and, if they are registered lots, there is no reason why a public hearing should be held for me to build a house on the other lot. If I am on a very large lot, and the land is now zoned, I get the land division and I build, but my neighbours know that that is land that is zoned properly and upon which I have a right to build.

If there is some restrictive covenant, then, of course, that must be referred to a public hearing. Or if there is any violation of a zoning bylaw, this must go to the committee of adjustment for a public hearing. So for the life of me, I fail to see why it is so important for a public hearing to be held in cases of this kind.

I realize that one of the ideas that may be in the back of the mind of the hon. Minister is that the planning board members might also be committee of adjustment members. In the large municipalities, the time factor makes this a sheer impossibility, and so these two boards must be separated.

But, fundamentally, land separation is a planning process. The planning board and the council lay down certain guide lines for planning. Subdivision plans are outlined and processed. The zoning is laid down at that time. Even there, there is no need for a public hearing.

But now we propose that the committee of adjustment, which has not been in on the planning, which does not know the guide lines unless it is going to take a great deal of time now to study the background of planning in each municipality; that body is going to be able to plan in very important respects. They are, in many cases, going to be able to frustrate the whole intention of the planning board and council in their ongoing planning schemes.

And so, Mr. Chairman, through you, I would like to ask the hon. Minister why he is so concerned about the matter of public hearings? It seems to me that in this House, having made a fundamental error we should rectify that error; because over this next year there is going to be very great pressure upon the hon. Minister. Delay after delay will occur in this whole matter of consents. Where a consent can now be put through, if there are no problems, in a very short time, consents in the future may take up to six weeks or more. There is going to be a great deal of frustration in development, particularly in the rapidly developing areas of this province.

Perhaps the hon. Minister can give us some answers on this.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Well, Mr. Chairman, in reference to the matter discussed by the hon. member for Yorkview I would like to again repeat in part explanations which have been given to this House a year ago in the session of 1964, and again during this session that we are now in. It was during the 1964 session that we passed the amendment to The Planning Act. This amendment was enacted with the proclamation date to be named by the Honourable the Lieutenant-Governor.

The major purpose of this amendment to The Planning Act was to relieve planning boards from the responsibility of dealing with applications for consent to sales, mortgages or long-term leases of lands located within areas of subdivision controls designated under a certain section of the Act—I think it is 26—and to transfer authority for the granting of such consents to the local committees of adjustment, or in certain cases to the Minister. It is our belief that by relieving planning boards of what was essentially an administrative function the planning boards would be enabled to deal more effectively with their primary responsibilities, which are advising their respective municipal councils and other local authorities on what we think are increasingly pressing and complex problems of planning the future development of their communities.

The granting of such consents is in effect the granting of a special exemption from the subdivision control bylaw and should only be used—and I stress this—should only be used in individual cases to prevent unnecessary hardship to an owner under circumstances where registration of a plan of subdivision is not warranted.

Local committees of adjustment are really local administrative tribunals and I suggest that they appear to be particularly well qualified to handle exemptions of this type, in substantially the same way as these same committees of adjustment have been dealing with applications for exemptions from zoning bylaws.

Unlike planning boards, committees of adjustment already have well developed procedures for notifying affected parties of applications submitted to them, for holding public hearings and for the handling of appeals from their decisions to the Ontario municipal board. On the whole, the record of committees of adjustment in dealing with zoning matters is very good and I am confident that they will despatch their new responsibilities effectively and conscientiously.

Now, in addition to putting planning boards into a better position to perform their principal duties, the coming into force of the amendments to which I have referred will correct two defects in the existing arrangements for granting these consents. The first of these concerns the power of the consent-granting authority to impose conditions when granting a consent. Experience has shown that the division of a single parcel of land by consent is in every way as effective a subdivision of the original parcel as the registration of a plan of subdivision. In order to safeguard the interests of the municipality and its ratepayers, there should be the same power to impose reasonable and proper conditions of approval, dependent upon the circumstances in each case and subject to the same rights of appeal.

However, Mr. Chairman, the growing practice of imposing such conditions has raised serious legal problems resulting in a series of cases in the courts, culminating in an important decision of the court of appeal delivered on February 3, 1964, which seriously questioned the legality of the imposition of certain conditions, including in particular the imposition of a condition which required the demand of a sum of money to the municipality.

Now, the second defect in the existing procedure was that only the applicant for a consent to a severance was given a right of appeal from a decision of the planning board, refusing a consent or imposing conditions of approval to which objection was taken. As a result, there was a serious danger that the whole purpose of establishing areas of subdivision control might be defeated by the unwise exercise of the power to consent to individual severances. It was becoming more and more apparent that there were many situations where another interested party, perhaps a neighbour or even the municipal corporation itself, might want a consent decision to be reviewed on appeal by a higher authority, similar to the present appeal to the Ontario municipal board from decisions of the committee of adjustment on zoning matters.

Let me assure you, Mr. Chairman, and assure this House, that these 1964 amendments to which we now refer were not brought into force immediately because it was realized that the municipalities and their planning boards and committees of adjustment would require ample time to adjust their organization to the new procedure, as well as to complete their consideration of pending applications. Moreover, it was decided that the local municipalities and their officials might well require further time to obtain a thorough understanding of the purpose and intent of the legislation, and in many cases might desire to reorganize existing committees of adjustment or to appoint new committees where none existed. During this period, from the session of 1964 until now, the government has given very careful consideration to the objections which have been submitted from various sources in respect of this legislation. All of these objections had in fact been presented and thoroughly discussed during last year's session of the municipal law committee.

Now I might also say, Mr. Chairman, that during the past year I have also received a considerable number of unsolicited resolutions and submissions approving the new legislation.

Now, many of the objections, I suggest to you, sir, appear to have been the result of a fundamental misunderstanding of the proper functions of planning boards, together with what one might refer to as an inadequate knowledge of the far-reaching effects of the legal decisions to which I have referred and the resulting need for a substantial revision of the existing legislation dealing with this subject.

Last night, sir, I advised the House as to the number of meetings that were being arranged where municipal representatives, committees of adjustment, are and have been invited to attend to discuss with officials of The Department of Municipal Affairs the new procedures. Here is a book which we have published giving all of the pertinent information that we think will be of great help to the committees of adjustment. I am sure that hon. members realize that if we find that there are some serious difficulties in dealing with these matters, we will come back to the Legislature and ask for a further amendment if necessary; or, if not, we will amend the regulations and the rules we have now set down.

I think, under these circumstances, sir, that we should be satisfied to leave this legislation as it is and proceed to work with it until we find that it is deficient in some way or other.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister still has not answered the question which I asked with respect to the need for public hearings in the case of land division—in the case of consent. I can understand his concern that certain areas of land should not be subdivided by consent. Some municipalities, of course, have been doing this to some degree so that the necessity of having official plans placed on that land might be circumvented. This has saved time and energy, and all the rest, and I think, by and large, it has been a good thing. I can see, with this legislation, that very small pieces of land which used to be divided by consent will now have to have subdivision plans on them. Perhaps that may be a good thing in the eyes of the hon. Minister. I think it will slow down the process of development tremendously; because, when we see pieces of land with three or four lots having to have subdivision plans, then of course the slowing-down process becomes extreme and absurd.

As far as conditions are concerned, this body has, within its power, to allow planning boards—as well as the committees of adjustment—to impose conditions. So I think a red herring is being dragged across the trail in this regard; there is no reason why the same result cannot be achieved by leaving this where it has been—in the hands of the planning boards. I suppose the hon. Minister has made up his mind that this is going through, but I feel that it should not go through without a very strong protest in this House, a protest which has already been made by many municipal bodies in this province since the proclamation of the Act.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, in answer to that, I think that you will have to accept my request that we give this a chance. Already we have had one conference in Ottawa; I think it was held a week or so ago; there were some 60 or 70 people present, with officials of the department. They discussed all these rules and regulations—and there are many different types of applications for severance—and I assure you that my staff people will attempt, if at all possible, to make these requirements as simple as possible so that there will be no undue delays. But I think that we have to realize that it is good business for municipal administration to be out in the open; then nobody can say that anybody is getting anything.

Mr. Young: They are out in the open at present.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, that is all right. I am telling you that we recommend that severances be dealt with, and we want them dealt with, out in the open where we think it is desirable that they should be. All those who may have an interest in the particular severance—the municipality, the planning board, and so on and so on—will have an opportunity to be heard and to appeal. There will be none of this business of severances taking place and then no one finding out anything about it for some years later. That has happened in the past, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the hon. Minister's reasons on this, not only today and yesterday when he introduced his estimates, but a year ago when the bill came in. I have listened to the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Yorkview and the arguments put forward by many municipal bodies, many officials in municipal administration, and the only conclusion I can come up with is that there are changes going to take place because the hon. Minister says they are going to take place.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Because I have been advised it is good legislation.

Mr. Singer: I listened very carefully to what the hon. Minister said, and his reasons just run around in a great big circle. Now he reads to us a statement—I will bet he delivered a statement almost identical to the one he delivered at the Park Plaza hotel about a year ago. It would not surprise me if it was exactly the same one. His views have not changed at all since that time.

An hon. member: What was he doing there?

Mr. Singer: There was a conference of planners, I think, at the time.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: No, it is not the same statement, I can assure you of that.

Mr. Singer: I would suspect that might be the very same statement he made at that time.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Let me allay your suspicions and guarantee you that it is not the same statement.

Mr. Singer: Well, it may be a different statement, but it says exactly the same thing. And he made the same point; he made the point about the court's decision. Now he knows, as well as anyone else knows, that if the court decision says there is a municipal practice that is not allowed by the statutes, then this Legislature has the power, if it so desires, to change what the legislative Act says and allow the practice of imposing conditions to be valid and legal and authorized. A very simple amendment to The Planning Act would have allowed this.

The second point about notice: I do not know about notice being given in all municipalities; but I know how notice is given in some municipalities and I know that it is a very elaborate procedure. I wondered for a long time why the hon. Minister had not written into the Act—and it is not there, either in The Planning Act or in The Municipal Act—that when there are hearings dealing with zoning matters, notice is compulsory. There are rules the municipal board has worked out where notice is required to be given, and where a hearing takes place before the municipal board; and there is an argument that there was no notice. I know the municipal board pays very close attention to it, so that any alert municipality, any municipality that is concerned with the affairs of its ratepayers, will establish careful procedures about giving notice to those people who are likely to be affected.

If the hon. Minister is concerned about notice, surely he could say, in The Planning Act or in The Municipal Act or in both Acts, that notice must be given when hearings of this type take place. But the substantial objection, and the hon. Minister has not answered this before, about taking this away from planning boards and giving it to committees of adjustment, is that where there are planning boards, in larger municipalities, they have staffs to advise them. They have planners to advise them. They have experts to advise them. Committees of adjustment are separate and apart and, by and large, do not have staffs; and, by and large, they do not give advice. They will have to get them. Now he is going to revolutionize the whole thing so that municipalities which both have committees of adjustment—busy municipalities, expanding ones—are going to have to have extra planning staff to advise the committee of adjustment, as well as the planning staff to advise the planning board.

You are separating the planning concept into two jurisdictions; and the committee of adjustment, by going contrary to the planning concepts established by the planning board and endorsed by the local council, can completely defeat and destroy what those planning concepts are, by granting these consents quite separate and apart from what is going on in the rest of the municipality.

There is one large municipality in this province before whose committee of adjustment I appeared on one occasion. The chairman of the committee of adjustment is a very able man; his only staff—it is one of the largest municipalities in this province—is a secretary who gives him mimeographed copies of the applications. There is no planning advice made available to him at all; he feels that any application before the committee of adjustment that takes any longer than five minutes is a thoroughgoing waste of time. His object is to get his hearings over as quickly as he can, and I have heard many complaints that the people who apply for these consent applications do not get a proper hearing; nor do the objectors. This is the sort of procedure the hon. Minister is inviting, because the chairman of this committee of adjustment, a very able man, a very fine man, just has neither the patience, nor the time, nor the planning knowledge, nor the planning curiosity, to fit the thinking of the municipal planners into the planning concept in this particular committee of adjustment.

This is what the hon. Minister wants to encourage further and I ask him why? It is obvious that he has his heels dug in and no amount of argument is going to change him at this point, but the question that must be given is: Why the upsetting of procedure which seems to be working in most of the big municipalities, at least in this province? Why is the hon. Minister disturbing a procedure which the mayors and reeves group believe is a proper procedure and which the executive of the Ontario municipal association believes is a proper procedure? What is he trying to prove?

Mr. Chairman, this just does not make any commonsense to me at all, and I wonder why the hon. Minister would not pay a little more attention to some of the myriad of objections he has received. It may work in some municipalities. It may work better in some small municipalities where there are no planning staffs; but if that is what he is aiming at then why does he not make it optional and allow those municipalities, where it might work better, to adopt it if they feel that it will work in a better way? This surely would be a reasonable compromise.

But I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, that we have argued this point for a long time, and argued it very fruitlessly because the hon. Minister is not going to listen to the argument. For what they are worth, I think the arguments form a valuable part of the record, because I am satisfied that, if planning procedures go on, there is going to arise, as a result of this action, a great conflict between certain committees of adjustment and certain planning boards and certain municipal councils. The hon. Minister is now giving power to a body—over which the municipality has no control—to completely upset the whole planning procedure. He does not seem to worry, and he says that he is doing it because notice is not being given.

Now there are ways in which these land divisions can be handled and notice has to be given; there are ways in which conditions can be imposed and made legal. Those excuses are of no moment as far as I can see. I think the facts speak for themselves, and along with the hon. member for Yorkview, I suggest that the hon. Minister and the department are going to rue the day that this portion of the Act is proclaimed.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, before hon. members proceed further to get into specific matters under these estimates, I would like to raise a general question of a technical nature, with regard to—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: May I interrupt the hon. member? Is he discussing this matter of severances?

Mr. Bryden: No, another subject.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, if the hon. member does not mind, I think we have to realize that there is no intention, and this will not have the effect of upsetting the planning functions in the municipalities. The committee of adjustment cannot upset or destroy the planning concept, if appeal provision is open to the planning agency and to the council, and to interested parties.

In many cases, the planning board has not had the time to develop the planning concept, and there are many of these cases of severances which will be referred to our office—they say referred to the Minister, which, of course, means referring it to community planning staffs—and so I think that the procedure will work. We have paid attention to the objections on which hon. members place so much importance, and at the same time we have—through our staff meetings and even by consulting outsiders—we think that we have investigated this whole subject very thoroughly. So I ask you as honourable gentlemen, to leave this matter for the present time and let us work it out. We are quite confident that the public are not going to be delayed in any way, or placed in any greater inconvenience, but we think that this will be a programme that will work out satisfactorily in the days ahead.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for Woodbine would permit, I have a question for the hon. Minister having to do with the amendment to The Planning Act. As he has explained to the House previously, it was because of the requirements of a municipality in Brant county which has been charging a severance fee for some time, that he deemed it necessary to bring in these amendments. I would hasten to say that this was only one reason for the change, and I would like to go on record as saying that I feel that the difficulty in the township of Brantford might have been alleviated by some means other than this, so that the difficulties that have been expressed so well by the hon. member for Downsview would not have come about.

I would like to ask the hon. Minister specifically why there was such a delay from the time of the enactment of this legislation until his decision to proclaim it more than 15 months later.

I would like to say again that this does not mean that I would favour all of the provisions in the Act. But he should be aware of the fact that in the municipality of the township of Brantford there has not been a severance for many months, and because of the delay in this proclamation, meeting after meeting of the council and the planning board has been held in very acrimonious circumstances. There have been charges and counter-charges, usually with the authority saying we are waiting for word from the department. They have assured us on many occasions that the proclamation is but a few weeks away.

They were led from month to month almost 15 months, without, I submit, the reason ever being given properly to them. I feel that after having gone through those meetings, the reeve and the council and the planning board deserve some official explanations for this lengthy delay.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that there was any promise made to the township of Brantford. I met with them myself and I advised them that in due course of time—as a matter of fact, on one occasion, several months ago, I told them that I thought that the proclamation would be May 1. I think—is it Mr. Biggar who is the clerk?

Mr. Nixon: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: He is the gentleman I was speaking to and he was quite satisfied with that date. The reason that we did not proclaim this immediately was because—to be very frank about it—there were quite a number of objections from different parts of the province, promoted by one of the municipal associations, I suggest, in spite of the fact that some of the members of that association were very much opposed to the stand that the association's board of directors took and are in favour of the legislation. So it was necessary for us to develop these procedures, and to make the necessary arrangements to instruct our own staff to begin with, and to arrange to give the municipalities that did not have committees of adjustment, time to name these committees and so on and so forth. These things do not happen just quite like that.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, with great respect may I say that on two occasions I was either present or party to a communication between the people in Brantford township and the hon. Minister, and I very well remember this assurance that the proclamation would come before the end of summer, 1964. They planned on that; they let the people who had asked for severances know about the plan of the government in this, but it was not at the end of the summer, 1964, nor even in November, 1964, nor a few weeks following the end of 1964. It was really a very difficult delay for the council of Brantford township. I just felt that these people, having been subjected to a lot of pressure locally, deserve a complete explanation of why this delay was necessary.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I appreciate that some of these things are unfortunate. Remember that we have a very small staff in our department—we have less than 300 people—and this imposes a great amount of work on the particular branch. I had been told that it was felt that it would be sometime last summer when the proclamation would be issued and unfortunately—I have mentioned before the submissions that were made by certain people that had to be studied—when we get one letter complaining about something, we just cannot drop everything else for that one letter. We receive, on an average, 100 letters a day.

Mr. Nixon: Their objectives were not unreasonable, however.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I appreciate that; it is unfortunate and I am sorry. It is my fault and I accept the responsibility.

Mr. Nixon: That will make them feel better.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: If that will make them feel good, that is OK with me.

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): Mr. Chairman—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The hon. member for Woodbine had the floor.

Mr. Bryden: If this is on the same matter, I have no objection to that if this matter is being cleaned up as it relates to severances.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Chairman, under this heading, community planning I would like to say a word or two to the hon. Minister. We have in this province of Ontario many towns and villages in which the debenture debt has reached the saturation point. Some of these towns and villages have no sewage system and, of course, there is what they believe to be a shortage of water. When these towns and villages decide to go into a sewage system, the municipal board of the hon. Minister's department will only approve on account of the debenture debt a third of a sewage system for a town or village. This is something that is of great concern to these towns and villages.

Of course, the medical officer of health is advocating or agitating for sewage systems. And we have, in these towns and villages, subdivisions being set up and, of course, under the department, the planning branch hesitates to approve of a subdivision on account of the lack of sewage systems. I say that when your municipal board approves of only a third of a sewage system, yet it may be perhaps ten years before it ever comes to this new subdivision, this is certainly going to cause stagnation in our many towns and villages across this province of Ontario.

I think the hon. Minister and his government should give more assistance. I am not opposed to sewage systems and I know all the towns and villages are in favour of them; but, they cannot afford them. But when your department disapproves of a whole sewage system because it believes the town or village cannot afford it; then the community planning branch will not even approve of a subdivision because there is not a sewage system in this town, this is going to cause stagnation in these towns and villages in the rural areas.

It is a hardship, and I think there will have to be more assistance given to these towns and villages if they are going to survive.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, the matter I have to raise at this moment is of a somewhat different nature, relating to the method of presentation of the estimates.

I raised this matter with the hon. Minister last year and I thought the case I put was so reasonable and sensible that there would be a change in the department's method of presenting the estimates. However, I see that they continue with their same old, bad habits.

If one looks through this estimate book from beginning to end one will find that almost every department, except The Department of Municipal Affairs is out of step. Every department breaks down its estimates into an appropriate number of roles in accordance with some logical procedure. The Department of Municipal Affairs has the entire department in one vote, vote 1301, apart from capital disbursements which are of quite a small amount—that is those which are to be voted are quite a small amount; there are some large ones which are statutory, but we cannot pass on them, anyway.

There is also a separate vote for the Ontario municipal board, but it is not part of The Department of Municipal Affairs, so we find under vote 1301 there is the entire operation of The Department of Municipal Affairs, involving a total expenditure of more than $55 million. We go back a couple of pages in the book and we find The Department of Lands and Forests with 11 different votes for its ordinary operations apart from capital disbursements, involving a total of $29 million.

Now, I am aware of the fact that the department, I suppose for informational purposes, shows us a breakdown of its salaries, travelling expenses and maintenance by main office and branches. In the summary page it actually describes that breakdown as an estimated allocation of vote 1301, ordinary expenditures by branches.

I suggested to the hon. Minister last year that this way of doing things actually permits a sort of a hanky-panky that would not be permitted if the estimates were presented in another way. I suggested to the hon. Minister that it would permit him to transfer money from, say, the accounts branch to the law branch. In other words, if he found that he was under in one branch and over in another he could just shift money from one to the other. He could not do this if he had separate votes because the Treasury board would be down on his neck; in fact, the auditor just would not sign the cheques. If a department goes over on one vote it cannot transfer money from another; it has to go and get a Treasury board order, which is as it should be if we are to have proper financial control.

The hon. Minister last year assured me that is not done within the department, that the department treats each of these separate branches, which are presented to us only for information and not as votes, as if they were separate votes and does not transfer money from one to the other.

Well, I naturally accept the word of the hon. Minister. But then if he does that, why not present them as separate votes? It is certainly possible that hanky-panky of the nature I have just described could go on. The supply bill that will come before this House later, if it follows the pattern of previous supply bills, will say merely that the money voted to the government must be expended in accordance with the votes and items set forth in the estimates.

The only items set forth here are No. 1, salaries; No. 2, travelling expenses; No. 3, maintenance. They cover the entire department, they are not broken down by branches at all.

There are, of course, other items relating to special payments and so on. But all the salaries of the department are in one item. Thus if the department wanted to transfer salaries from one branch to another, I do not think that under The Supply Act the auditor could stop it, and I think he should be able to.

At any rate, apart altogether from the financial control elements involved in this procedure, Mr. Chairman, which I think are important, I would suggest to the hon. Minister that if he presented his estimates as a series of votes more or less organized according to the branches that he has listed here, his estimates could be discussed in a much more orderly fashion than is possible under the way that he now presents them. As it stands, under vote 1301 anything whatever relating to The Department of Municipal Affairs is in order, and that covers quite a lot of ground.

If he would break these down and have vote 1301 as the main office, 1302, shall we say, as community planning, and accounts could probably be combined with the main office and so on; then we could deal with the various subjects, for which the hon. Minister is responsible, in a rational way.

I, frankly, cannot see why the hon. Minister resists such a reasonable suggestion in view of the fact that practically every other department of government accepted this type of procedure long ago. I think the only other estimates we could now complain about are those of The Department of Highways. The Department of Highways and The Department of Municipal Affairs, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, are the black sheep of the government as far as rational presentation of the estimates is concerned; and rational presentation of the estimates, of course, is an integral part of adequate financial control. I would urge the hon. Minister to consider this matter again and do something about it for the coming year.

Now if the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs has any comments, I would be glad to hear them, Mr. Chairman.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I remember the comments of the hon. member in connection with the accounting practices of the department when they were made last year. The matter was given consideration. I remember at the end of 1964 we had a staff of 252 people and I am assured by the accounting branch that to do what the hon. member suggested would probably increase our accounting staff by one person. The Treasury board analysts who are staff people in the department of the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan), analyze all of these estimates before they ever go to the Treasury board for approval. They have been satisfied with the method in which these things are kept.

Now, I will admit that we could very easily try to swerve funds from one of the divisions to another division, providing we stayed within the main office vote of 1301. I agree with you, and we will give this another look this year, if you do not mind, try to improve it.

Mr. Bryden: Well, no other department could effect that type of transfer, and I suggest to the hon. Minister, I am not saying he does it, but I suggest to him that it would be a very bad thing if it were done.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: As a matter of fact there is another thing to bear in mind, and that is we have been going through a period of reorganization during which we have been trying to departmentalize. I think, quite frankly, that there were people who were working, for instance in municipal accounting, who perhaps spent part of their time in accounts branch, or some combinations like that.

Mr. Bryden: That I can understand. I believe you have been reorganizing your department.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: We will give it attention again for next year's estimates, we hope we will be able to—

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, just one last word on this point. I do not want to belabour it, but it seems to me that it should not take an extra employee simply to put numbers beside the various breakdowns you have presented instead of having them all under one number.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, we will do our best.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): Mr. Chairman, this department is the most important department in our whole jurisdiction in the fact that it controls and affects the lives of 6,000,000 people more closely than any other department in the House. I agree with my hon. colleague that over the years the hon. Minister has a wonderful record as a dedicated Minister, but I am wondering if at this point if the job is not getting too big for him.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Probably it is.

Mr. Sargent: I congratulate him on the appointment of Mr. Palmer; I think he is a wonderful example. But I think, if he admits he does not have enough staff, that is his fault; and for him to get up in the House and apologize to the hon. member for Brant for things that have happened—as the hon. member for Woodbine says, I agree that this is a very sorry presentation of such a large sum of money. The hon. member for Kent East stated that municipalities had debenture debts reaching almost to the point of insolvency in many cases; we all know this, but this department struggles along. The hon. Minister himself must know that the tax base, insofar as the mess in assessment is concerned, is the base of all our troubles. We have seen many cases in the press, for example the city of Guelph having its tax rate jump to 106 mills. In spite of how much the hon. Minister tells us about the efficiency of his department, there does not seem to be any principle involved—no firm policy on the equalization of assessment.

At this time I would ask you a point—in fact, to bring this to a head, have you any policy on equalized assessment in this province insofar as municipalities are concerned? If they carry out an equalization, will you pay part of the capital cost, will you help them, and will you steer it?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Are you going to sit down and expect an answer, or are you going to stand up?

Mr. Sargent: I am going to find out if you have a policy which affects the lives of so many people. What is your policy on equalized assessment?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the question, I do not think there are very many people around who would be in a position to discuss this kind of a policy. If you want to know something about our policy with respect to improving assessment practices in the province, I would be glad to discuss that with you. Is that what you are asking about?

Mr. Sargent: Well, somebody over there should know what is going on.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That is for sure. But I want to know what you want to know, so I will not spend all afternoon talking about something in which you have no interest.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Minister, you must know that municipalities are going out and paying large capital costs to do equalized assessment within their municipalities.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Oh, that has nothing to do with it. Mr. Chairman, if the hon. gentleman is interested in improving the assessment practices of the municipalities—

Mr. Sargent: No, you should be concerned.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I can tell what we are prepared to do with that. We are sponsoring, and have for some time sponsored, the appointment of county assessment commissioners so that all assessments of all the municipalities in a particular county, or a group of counties, will be under the control of one assessment commissioner. He will provide himself with proper staff; he will have properly qualified assessors on his payroll; and he will then assess all the properties in the county or counties in an equalized manner. The department is quite prepared to assist financially in the cost of operating the assessment commissioner's office, and in this vote we will get to a point where I will tell you how much we are prepared to grant to assist county and district assessment. As a matter of fact, the figure is $335,000 for the coming fiscal year.

On top of that, we have spent a considerable amount of money to re-establish the assessor's course, which is given through Queen's University. We have also agreed that we will pay a subsidy to each assessor who takes the course and who passes the necessary examinations, and that we will refund 60 per cent of the cost of tuition to him. I hope that the municipalities will grant the balance of 40 per cent of the cost of tuition as an inducement to the assessors to take this course and to become more proficient in this work. We hope also, in the training programme which we support, that this will have the effect of bringing more people into the field of assessment as a career. In that way, we are quite confident that this will improve the assessment practices in the province; and it will be a further guarantee to the municipal people, the elected officials, that assessment in the various counties of the province will be equitable. In that way, all real estate will be bearing its fair share of real estate costs.

I think, sir, that is about the best I can give you.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Minister, you must know that in 1951 we had to carry out an equalization in our city. At that time you knew the need for equalization. In 1963 we had another equalization—the capital cost was $40,000—and you have known about this problem for a long time. Nothing is going on in municipalities to my mind to alleviate the matter. I just heard from the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Worton) that they have cut his taxes by eight mills. The tax rate in Guelph today is 125 mills, and here you say you are running an efficient department.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: What do you want me to do, pick up eight mills?

Mr. Sargent: I think you should be doing something about equalization in assessment, Mr. Minister, because this is widespread all over the province. The programme you have had over the years is not doing the job. I would like to ask you this, Mr. Minister: Are any of your grants now based on a mill value?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Our grants are based on our equalized assessment; and when you talk about a mill rate of 125 mills it does not mean anything if the assessment is at ten per cent of value. The true mill rates are probably about 70.

Mr. Sargent: So, in building a picture, we have seen that the way you are operating you have no set policy across the province.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Yes, we have. I have just got through explaining it to you.

Mr. Sargent: Well, if you have a standardization in mill values then everyone would be getting the same return in grants—if you have the grants based on mill basis.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That is why we do it on an equalized basis—in order to equalize the grants—

Mr. Sargent: What is equalized about 125 mills in the city of Guelph?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, this is simply ridiculous. Here is a man who has been a Minister of the department and he says that equalization has nothing to do with the value of a mill.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That is not what I said at all. I said that the statement the hon. member made about 125 mills in a particular municipality does not mean anything unless, and until, the equalization factor is known.

Mr. Sargent: That is the point I am trying to make.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The hon. member is having a hard time at it.

Mr. Sargent: If the hon. Minister were running his department properly there would be a standard basis right across the province, not based on 75 per cent of 1941 values, but based on the mill rate.

I hear, from time to time, that a new manual is coming up; that assessors are being trained on a county basis. What about the cities? What is happening in the cities?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, I think I can only answer the hon. member by suggesting to him that he use his influence, in his city and in his county, to have the county adopt the new assessment manual which is based on today's cost, or approximately so. If he does that, he will get a fair and equitable assessment and I am sure that the rate will not be 125.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, we had an equalization last year; and we had no more faith in the hon. Minister's manual than he had so we called in the best brains in the assessment field that we could find. We paid them $40,000 to carry out an equalization that will stand up in court—and that is the most important part of the hon. Minister's job, to carry out an equalization that will stand up in court; and he is not doing it. And do not let this man kid anyone here; he is not doing his job properly.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Mr. Chairman, in the period around October 28, 1964, the Cabinet of the province made a tour of north-eastern Ontario—I am now addressing my remarks to item number 10 under vote 1301.

The tour started in Sault Ste. Marie and journeyed eastward, for some reason that will never be known to the minds of men. They skirted the riding of Algoma-Manitoulin; they did not make a stop there at all; and they arrived in Sudbury on October 27, in the evening. And, as Sudbury citizens are accustomed to do, they treated these most powerful men in the province with suitable hospitality and got them to bed early for the arduous day ahead, October 28.

At the time, at the high school public auditorium, they were presented with a number of briefs representing the views of various groups and associations of pluralistic bodies of Sudbury and the region, the most important of which was a brief presented by the city of Sudbury. The only dramatic event to occur during the ceremonies was that the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree) lost his temper with the vice-president of the union—they have not quite forgotten that yet and it will be dealt with at some other time.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): What? I have never heard of such a thing in my life.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Can the hon. Minister not remember that date?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I can remember the day, but I do not intend to be taken in by any misstatement by the hon. member for Sudbury, great orator though he may be.

Mr. Sopha: Item 10, of course, deals with the subject to which I have addressed many comments over the years, at least once annually. That has to do with the payments in lieu of assessments made to mining municipalities. Mining municipalities, hon. members will know, comprise some number approaching 60—there are either 56 or 58 or 59 municipalities in this province, not all of them in northern Ontario.

These payments to dormitory municipalities—and there I introduce a new term: A dormitory municipality such as Sudbury is a municipality which houses the workers and provides the work force, created by the large industrial installations, with services, schools, police and fire protection, water, sewers, and everything else a municipality needs. This type of municipality is denied the facility to tax the mining installations for these, by reason of the fact that those installations are beyond its municipal boundaries. This has given rise to many acute problems for a long period of time.

The whole history could not be treated in a single speech without boring the hon. members of this House beyond all their sources of strength and endurance to listen, but some years ago—1957 or 1958, or perhaps a little before—when Leo Landreville was the mayor of Sudbury; he, being a very energetic man of great ability, who had been persuaded to offer himself as the chief magistrate of Sudbury, took the initiative to see whether something could be done to solve this problem and relieve the city of having to rely upon the beneficence and the charity of this government. This beneficence and charity will never get them past the “pearly gates” in themselves, they will have to look to some other merit.

Of course, to do away with the necessity of having to grow bigger to get assistance, in which position they—an invidious position, I might say—had found themselves, to that end, Mr. Landreville persuaded the council to make an approach to the Ontario municipal board. A delegation of the council and other interested citizens, as well as delegates from other municipalities, journeyed to Toronto. I recall that I was part of that delegation, being then, as I am now, solicitor for the town of Coniston. On that occasion, one which I will call the first visit, representations were made to all the senior Cabinet Ministers. I recall that the dairyman from Dunnville, who at that time was Minister of Highways, was seen, as well as the Minister of Municipal Affairs, who at that time was W. K. Warrender. These representations were based upon a plea for information from the department as to what would happen if the city successfully advanced an application for amalgamation with or annexation of the main neighbouring municipalities before the Ontario municipal board.

Somewhere along the line—the history has never been too clear as to exactly what happened—I have the impression that some representations were made to Mr. Landreville to the effect that if an application for annexation and amalgamation were pursued before the Ontario municipal board—and Mr. Lorne Cumming at that time was chairman of that board—if they were pursued, every comfort and assistance would be given by the government in order to bring about an end result whereby the financial problems of the city and their dependence upon the mines—their payments to mining municipalities—might be at an end.

I say that that is an impression I have always been under. So, accordingly, after—I have abridged this a good deal because Mr. Landreville and his council made further representations to the government; then, in the fullness of time, as the Laird of Lindsay used to say, the application was launched. I believe that was in the year 1958 and the hearings lasted over a period of ten months; I was present at all of those hearings, acting for the town of Coniston. The application for amalgamation and annexation, and I do not use those words as terms of art, would have brought into being a municipality which would have comprised all of the townships of Neelon and Garson—which are townships to the north and east of the city of Sudbury—all of the township of McKim, which was the host township, so to speak, of the city of Sudbury, surrounding it on all sides, the town of Copper Cliff to the west which, of course, is the location of the huge industrial installations of the International Nickel Company, as well as the township of Falconbridge which is the host municipality to the installations of Falconbridge Nickel Company. And indeed, as far away as is the town of Coniston, it also was the subject of the application.

The whole point was, I think it fair to say, that had the Landreville scheme succeeded, and had there been brought into creation a municipality comprising all of these municipalities, then all of the large industrial installations—mining installations—would have been located in one giant municipality. However, after ten months of hearing, and after further periods of delay while the municipal board considered its decision—to adopt the phrase I used the other day—“the best-laid schemes o’ mice and men gang aft a-gley.” When the decision of the board was handed down—and I might say at this point that I was interested to see that Mr. Lorne Cumming was no longer chairman of the municipal board; he had been replaced by Mr. J. A. Kennedy.

At the time of the hearings—and the decision was that of Mr. J. A. Kennedy—the city of Sudbury, it was decreed, would comprise all of the township of McKim and the west half of the township of Neelon. That brought into being a more-or-less square municipality which measures, in area, some 54 square miles. But, much to the dismay of the applicants and the city of Sudbury, the city fathers, Copper Cliff on the west was left out, and the large industrial installations of International Nickel Company, as well as the township of Falconbridge to the north east with Falconbridge's works was left out, and the town of Coniston was left out. Not as a result of my efforts, but after ten months Sudbury really did not have much avidity for including Coniston, it was too far away. Coniston is some ten to eleven miles to the east on Highway 17.

Then, having said that, the result really means that here was a new creation of a municipality which really only aggravated the problems that had existed before. The city now got a much larger area, and accordingly a much greater complex responsibility, but it got in the new area no new large industrial assessment. That is to say that the plants and smelters and concentrators, and the mines belonging to the two giant mining corporations were left out of the new city.

Nobody knows the reasons for the decision of the Ontario municipal board. I say, and I think I say fairly on looking back on it and having read those reasons, I could have taken with very little effort all the premises that the board—and I mean no disrespect to them—I could have taken all their premises in their decision and using those premises I could have come to exactly the opposite decision that they came to, and included Copper Cliff and the township of Falconbridge.

But in historical perspective, we must not forget that the history of mining in northern Ontario has been the history of powerful mining corporations surrounding themselves with the cocoon—I think that is a very apt word—the cocoon of a company town. They locate their plants, their concentrators, refineries, smelters, and then they have over the years built a company town, so to speak, around those. And so it is in our area, as well as in other areas.

You might describe Copper Cliff as a company town. You would certainly describe Levack to be such; Lively, also, and Falconbridge, I would think, would fit the description of "company town." The mining companies have used this device of municipal organization so as to relieve them of the inconvenience, the irritation and the annoyance of being bothered in their affairs—in their industrial affairs—by the machinations of municipal councils who have different personnel from year to year. More importantly, they have used this device, I think it fair to say, to delay the day when they must accept their responsibilities to pay municipal taxation, municipal taxation to support that work force that the companies themselves create.

Almost everybody came to Sudbury by reason of the genesis of the exploitation of the large reserves of ore that abound in the Sudbury basin, with the possible exception of the CPR. The CPR was there before the ores were found, as early as the 1880s, perhaps 1882 or 1883. Then the mineral was found, and since that time the city has grown into a gigantic industrial complex and, indeed, in the field of base metal mining, the largest in the world.

This problem that I have outlined, and I hope I have outlined it succinctly enough, has been the bane of the citizens of Sudbury and city councillors and city fathers for a generation now. They have, to sum it all up, they have tried every reasonable effort, they have done everything reasonable to attempt to come to some solution of the problem that emanates from the high cost of municipal services. The high cost of running local government, the high cost that must be borne by individual ratepayers where there is not an industrial base upon which to levy taxation.

The hiatus of the efforts made by the city fathers reached their apex on October 28, 1964, when they presented a very thoughtful, a very well written brief, to the Cabinet of this province on the occasion I have mentioned. I am going to make substantial reference to that brief, because I cannot in my own words outline the difficulties and the problems any better than the authors—there were several authors, I think there were about five—did in this brief.

It is interesting to note that the estimates for this year do not reflect any positive action on the city of Sudbury's brief. They do not reflect the crystallization of any conclusion that the Cabinet has come to with respect to the representations. Indeed, we cannot probe within the Cabinet council chamber to determine what discussion has taken place on the brief, and to my knowledge neither the city of Sudbury nor any of its elected or, indeed, appointed officials have been vouchsafed any decision by this hon. Minister or anyone else in the Cabinet that has emanated from that brief.

It is sad to note that the estimates this year under item 10, $5,697,500, are a reduction in the amount that this Legislature has been accustomed to vote in aid of mining municipalities. In 1961-62, in 1962-63, in 1963-64, the Legislature was asked to vote the sum of $5.75 million as aid to mining municipalities.

There was quite a dramatic change in 1964-65. There was cause for great optimism insofar as the Legislature was asked to vote the sum of $6,350,500. It represented, of course, an increase of some $600,000. One would have hoped, and really I must confess—although it is no confession to me, it is merely a statement of fact—that when the estimates were published in the blue book, immediately upon the receipt of it, I opened to this page to see what the vote for mining municipalities would be. I hoped there would be an increase so as to encourage one to believe that the Cabinet had considered thoughtfully the plea the city of Sudbury made last October, and that we might expect some long sought after relief. However, that hope was dashed, shattered, when I realized that the vote had been reduced, reduced by not a significant amount—I belong to the Macaulay school of mathematics, which means that I cannot count—but I think it is something like $52,500 less than last year. I could stand to be corrected. No, $52,500 less than the three years 1961 to the end of 1964, and $700,000 less than the vote in 1964-65. Then, as I say, we do not know what the Cabinet has done, we have not got any explanation from the hon. Minister as yet, and once again I must approach this problem. In occupying the seat that I do in this Legislature, there is no greater responsibility that is incumbent upon me than to indicate to the people of Sudbury that I am aware of this problem, and that I do not hesitate to make the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs reasonably and moderately and fairly aware, as well as the hon. Treasurer of the province that—he looks up from the newspaper he is reading to indicate that he has an awareness—

Mr. J. H. White (London South): It is the same with the hon. member's leader (Mr. Thompson).

Mr. Sopha:—of the anxieties of the people of Sudbury and their hope that they will not for many years be the objects of charity. Really that is what it is. When you look at it and you boil it down and you take away all the external leaves of the head of cabbage, or you take away all the exterior shoots of the celery stock, and you look at it under the microscope of scrutiny, it is charity that they are being asked to accept from the benevolent government by way of a handout for taxation, for a handout in replacement of taxation that other municipalities have as a source of financing local government.

At this point I want to make reference to the formula under which this grant is paid, item 10 of vote 1301. I say this just in order to underline the significance of what I am trying to say. I am willing to offer a prize of $100—I do not know whether that is within the rules of the House, but I am willing—when I read the formula, I am willing to offer a prize of $100 to any hon. member who can get up and tell me what the formula says, other than the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs or the hon. Provincial Treasurer. Anyone else.

Mr. Singer: The hon. Minister is smiling.

Mr. Sopha: Yes. Now, here is the formula under which it is paid and that is regulation 31 of The Assessment Act, the revised regulation, 1960, and which has been amended in the years 1961 and 1963. First, one needs to start with a definition of a mining employee. A mining employee means any person who is in receipt of or entitled to any salary, wages or other direct compensation for services or labour performed in Ontario at the locations excepted from assessment under subsection 5 of section 35 of the Act and who is:

1. Resident in a mining municipality at the time of the making of the last assessment of the mining municipality; or
2. Resident outside a mining municipality and employed at a mine or mineral work in a mining municipality on the first day of October in any year.

Hon. members will appreciate the significance of No. 2. It refers to the large group of workers who live within the city, make available to themselves all the municipal services and work in Copper Cliff, in Falconbridge, in Coniston, in Garson, in Levack, in Lively, in Creighton, and several other places outside the confines of the city.

Then one must consider the definition of municipal mines assessment, which is an integral part of the formula that I am going to come to eventually.

Municipal mines assessment means 50 per cent of the total of:

1. $1,800 for each mining employee shown in the register of the preceding year as working and residing in the municipality.
2. $900 for each mining employee working in, and residing outside, the municipality on the first day of October, in the preceding year as determined under section 20.
3. Mines profits as calculated under section 3 of The Mining Tax Act and set out by the mine assessor in the notice of assessment referred to in section 11 of The Mining Tax Act.

I am not going to read the rest of that, but I just want to tell hon. members of the House that No. 3, mines profits as calculated, to abridge it under The Mining Tax Act is a fiction. That is a complete and pure fiction. There is no such thing. There is no such calculation made, and has never been made with any degree of technical accuracy.

This mines profit is based upon the amount of ore—to put it very generally—it is based upon the amount of ore at the mine head, the amount of ore that is hoisted. If you ever had a look at the number of mines in the Sudbury area, then this assessor would need a staff of about 200 to calculate the amount of ore that is lifted daily out of the ground and put into the concentrator.

So this is, by agreement, a fictional figure arrived at to satisfy the requirements of section 3. Interestingly enough, when they passed the statute, when this Legislature passed the statute, the people who promoted that statute were not so dumb. I do not know if they have become dumber or smarter, but they were not so dumb at that time because they put secrecy restrictions on the mines assessor which were at least equal to the secrecy surrounding his work, which were at least the equal of anything that Kosygin or his buddy have in the Soviet Union.

Mr. Singer: Even better than the Cabinet.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, even better than Cabinet secrecy. This fellow cannot give you any information at all about what he does. If you want to look at the statute some time you will see enshrined in the statute that secrecy in regard to the information that surrounds his calculations or the amount paid of mines profit. Nobody knows, nobody really knows, other than the hon. Provincial Treasurer and perhaps the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs and a few others, what amount any specific mine in Ontario pays by way of mines profits tax.

Then you see this point, in calculating what is called municipal mines assessment, there are three items. There is the assessment of $1,800—just to review them—for each mining employee shown in the register of the preceding year as working and residing in the municipality; then there is the $900 for each mining employee working and residing outside the municipality; then there is the mines profit.

All right. Now we get to the formula, and here is the computation of the payment:

1. In each year the Minister shall make a payment to each mining municipality being the total of; (a) $45 for each mining employee shown in the register of the preceding year as resident in, and working outside, the municipality and (b) the amount in dollars resulting from applying the adjusted mill rate to the municipal mines assessment of the municipality.

2. Where, in determining the amount of the mining payment in any year, the amount of the mines profits has been estimated and the true amount as calculated under section 3 of The Mining Tax Act when known is greater or less than the estimate, the difference shall be respectively subtracted from, or added to, the amount of the mines profits used in computing the mining payment in the following year.

Now, having read that, I am sure every hon. member of the House understands it completely, just how the payment is calculated.

I have always felt that in exercising its true function, carrying out its responsibilities of acting in the name of organized society, if government can do things simply, if it can achieve a measure of equity and justice and fairness between the state and the citizen simply, then it ought to do so. And, really, the complex and the abstract and the incomprehensible ought to be eschewed; it ought to be cast away if it is possible to do it.

Really, I have never been able to accept the efficacy of this formula, and I know the hon. Minister has some certain measure of personal pride in it. I have heard him say, on public occasions, that he had something to do with the authorship of the formula; but really, if he ever accomplishes anything in the history of this province, I do not think his name will be enshrined in the history books for the reason that he had something to do with the genesis of this formula payment to mining municipalities.

Conversely, I felt myself that the first part, the very first part of the formula, is sufficient—that is the part that deals with what we call the payment of $45 for each mining employee shown on the register as resident in and working out. Really, that individual is the nub of the problem. If you want to focus the spotlight on any one person, it is the miner living in the municipality, being a charge upon the municipality for all of the things he and his family get, and working outside it. In working outside it, he works at industrial installations which are not subject to the payment of municipal tax to support the things given to him, their employee.

He is really a schizophrenic, this person, in a schizophrenic society. We see the schizophrenia which surrounds this individual and our approach to him. For one, he adopts one visage for one purpose; he lives in the city of Sudbury and is identifiable, therefore, as being the object of the granting of municipal services. Yet, in his earning his daily bread, he takes himself outside the city of Sudbury and goes to work in a huge industrial installation beyond the confines. That industrial installation, in turn, does not have to contribute directly to the supply of services to him.

I thought myself, to achieve justice and equity, to achieve a measure of equilibrium between the government of Ontario and the city of Sudbury, and indeed all of the other 58 mining municipalities, that it would be sufficient to make a few calculations. To calculate the amount of municipal tax that the industry might pay if it were assessable, first calculate the needs of the municipality and then determine what payment would equal the amount that the industry would pay to the municipality in lieu of industrial assessment. This, of course, is all done under that formula now. This is all done under the guise of a payment in lieu of industrial assessment to the municipality. And, having calculated that payment, which I would like to call the just payment, then it could be paid in accordance with this first part of the formula alone. Calculate the amount per head, the amount per miner.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Like a bounty?

Mr. Sopha: Sort of like a bounty. And if it was found to be—certainly it is not $45; the $45 is not adequate—if it were found to be $75, or if it were found to be $100, or $125, then, if the government needed a formula, they could say to the city of Sudbury, “Here is the amount; you tell us the number of miners who live in your municipality and work outside it and here is the amount per head we will pay to you in lieu of industrial assessment.”

I do not really see the necessity of this obtuse, abstruse, complex, incomprehensible formula that is to be found in regulation 31 of The Assessment Act. Let us go back to the definition of municipal mines assessment. Really, what has modern-day reality to do with a fixed assessment of $1,800? Who lives in anything that is only assessed at $1,800 nowadays? Very few people in this province who are employed. Certainly very few people who live in the city of Sudbury and work at International Nickel Company, or Falconbridge.

Then, in the second part, it becomes even more absurd: A fixed assessment of $900 for each mining employee working in and residing outside the municipality. Those, of course, it will be seen, are nothing more than figures picked out of the air. They are just abstracted out of the air for the purposes of the formula and have no reference to any reality whatsoever. Only a tiny minority of people in the city of Sudbury have an assessment of only $1,800, or $900, as the formula depicts.

It is of interest to make reference to that formula; but, having had this essay in this Legislature and at the expense of your time, Mr. Chairman, and the hon. members' time, I cannot say that I am any more informed. I do not pretend to understand the formula any better than when I started off in my journey to make reference to the mining municipalities' payment. So let me turn to something that will be comprehended more readily by the hon. members of this House. Let us turn to that meeting of October 28, 1964, when the city of Sudbury put the cards on the table, laid it on the line—to adopt any of the clichés—before the Cabinet assembled at the high school auditorium.

It is interesting to note—they have never been able to understand this, but I regretted that at the fine luncheon the city tendered to the Cabinet and distinguished visitors, I, as a city member, notwithstanding I was not of the same political flavour as the members of the Cabinet—still I belonged to a respectable and very historic political party—was not vouchsafed the privilege of saying a word of welcome to them, or addressing any words to mark the significance of the occasion; not that there were many speeches made, but they allowed me to break bread with them and drink water and tea, nothing stronger than that.

There were two interests being advanced, which I would like to relate. They took the occasion to pin a medal on the city clerk. Well, that is not quite accurate; the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs did not pin a medal on him, he gave him a set of cufflinks with a cross-eyed olive on them—it could become some sort of hallmark of achievement in this province. This was done in the name of the excellent job the city clerk had done in organizing the meeting of these distinguished personages. Then another item of interest was that the hon. Prime Minister of this province (Mr. Robarts) must pay some attention to this business of “George Washington slept here,” and “General Brock slept here,” and so on, because in his brief remarks he promised the owner of the hotel that they would put up a memorial plaque to the effect that the Cabinet had met in his hotel. I have not been around to see if that plaque has been ensconced on the building yet. That will do something to increase his business or drive it away, I am not sure which. But he, himself, the owner of the hotel, is a well-known supporter of this government and indeed a member of the Hagey commission on Medicare.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It is a successful hotel operation.

Mr. Sopha: The vice-president of the union has never forgotten his brush with the hon. Minister of Labour, and is still talking about it. Of course, my hon. friend from York South should speak on behalf of that vice-president of the union, because that union largely supports him.

Mr. MacDonald: He likely can speak for himself.

Mr. Sopha: However, I would like to read the news story first in reference to this brief. Under the heading, there is a picture of the Cabinet, as you can see there, seated at the table. They are not all there. I forget which ones were absent, and it is just as well that I do.

Mr. Bryden: You cannot tell the difference between those present and absent.

Mr. Sopha: Well, there were about 20 of them. They are not all there, but I think the main ones are there.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Who are the main ones, in your estimation?

Mr. Sopha: This hon. Minister, the hon. Provincial Treasurer, the hon. Minister of Mines, and the hon. Minister of Labour right up front. However, the heading over the news story goes as follows: "Sudbury's financial problem presented to visiting Ontario Cabinet Ministers."

It begins:

The city of Sudbury this afternoon was to make the official presentation of its brief to the Ontario Cabinet calling attention of the government to the fact the city faces a financial problem "more serious than that of any other city in Ontario."

The brief was publicly read at the meeting of the Cabinet at Sudbury high school auditorium by Mayor Joe Fabbro, Controller Louis Desmarais, chairman of the special committee preparing the brief, city solicitor James Lunney, city engineer T. L. Hennessy and J. R. Meakes, past president of Sudbury and district chamber of commerce.

And I might interpolate today that J. R. Meakes is also the publisher of this newspaper, and this newspaper—Mr. Meakes would not think ill of me in saying—that this newspaper has consistently, throughout its history supported the policies and the perpetuation of this government and has supported the Conservative Party and I think this newspaper—a very fine newspaper—is I think one of the last newspapers in Canada to continue to support John Diefenbaker, which shows its dedication to the Conservative cause.

Mr. MacDonald: That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. Sopha: My friend from York South very aptly says that is a matter of opinion.

Each reader took a section of the 15-page brief for reading. Mayor Fabbro introduced the brief and read the summing-up at the end. Controller Desmarais read those parts of the brief dealing with its purpose.

I might say, in regard to Controller Desmarais, that he is a very outstanding citizen of our community whom, regretfully, we are going to lose very shortly. He has accepted a business arrangement with a firm of chartered accountants in Montreal and is going to remove his residence from our city to Montreal. He has been, during the past two years or year-and-a-half, the deputy mayor of our city, a very energetic and a very dedicated citizen. He has also, I might add, been a member of the Ontario water resources commission. The participation of a man of Mr. Desmarais' calibre demonstrates the quality of the intelligence that went into the preparation of this brief.

City engineer Hennessy dealt with the topography of the city, and existing soil conditions and population density.

T. L. Hennessy is a man who is widely renowned, even beyond the bounds of this province, in the field of municipal engineering. Indeed, when they formed the society of municipal engineers, T. L. Hennessy was its first president. He is a man who, ever since his graduation from the school of engineering, has been employed by the city of Sudbury, a decade or more. The man is very intimately aware of the peculiar problems with which this community has to deal.

Let me make it clear, Mr. Chairman, that I do not in any way apologize for using the time on the floor of this House to talk about Sudbury problems; because Sudbury, within the economic framework of this province, is a very important community—and not only in the terms of what meets the eye when one goes to Sudbury and sees the industrial installations, but in terms of the contribution to the economy of this province, and indeed this nation.

To put it one way, for every man who is employed in moiling in the ground for the ore there, and engaged in its refinement and its concentration, there are perhaps eight, nine, a dozen, or 15 Canadians employed elsewhere to supply him with the tools of his trade. I have heard every factor of up to fifteen jobs created for every miner who works underground in the industry. After all, let us not forget that over 70 per cent of the nickel of the free world is, and has been for a generation or more, supplied from the Sudbury basin—rather from Canada. I should not lose sight of the fact that there is a large installation in Thompson, Manitoba.

To continue:

Solicitor Lunney read the part of the brief dealing with the legal aspects of amalgamation, while Meakes covered the sections dealing with public buildings, schools, fire and police, roads, library, parks and recreation.

The brief, the text of which is—

Mr. Sopha: No, jails in northern Ontario are paid for entirely by the province.

The brief, the text of which is reprinted on pages 8 and 9, is the culmination of more than a year's work. While few statistics appear in the 15 pages, a mountain of data was gathered before the brief was written and is available to substantiate points made in the brief, and to furnish answers to questions the Cabinet may ask after studying the city document.

Last year's council, under Mayor Bill Ellis recognized the city's serious financial plight. In May, 1963, Con. Jack Hawkins proposed to council that a special small committee should be set up to seek help from the province for the city's many amalgamation problems.

I can report to this House that the activities of that committee were watched with great interest by the citizens of the city of Sudbury. That committee was a small committee of council and it included some people who were not members of council. If that committee had been successful in its approaches—that is the committee which in 1963 made approaches to this hon. Minister and to other hon. members of the government—and successful in its representations, I might not well stand in my place today. In the meantime, literally, had the government given a sympathetic ear to that committee and given significant relief to our city under this item, then the Conservative candidate might well have been elected in 1963 and I defeated.

I say in all sincerity, in all humility, that I would be prepared to make that sacrifice. I would rather see our city—it is like Wolfe after he had conquered Quebec, and I make that comparison with humility—he said: "I would rather have written Gray's 'Elegy' than have taken Quebec."

I would rather that our city get justice from this government by a significant increase in the mining payments than represent that city in this House. I have had this view ever since I was elected in 1959, because one of the reasons that I defeated Monaghan, who was here only one term—I look over to those benches and I see Conservatives, I look at the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Edwards) and he has been here since 1945, and the man beside him, the hon. member for York East (Mr. Beckett) has been here since 1945 or 1948, and the hon. member for Humber (Mr. W. B. Lewis) has been here a long time. But Monaghan was here only one term and he did not get into trouble in anything he did in this House. After Welland Gemmell died and the seat was vacant for a year, Monaghan was elected in 1955 and he sat until 1959. And then—the seat had not been represented by a Liberal since James Cooper was defeated in 1943—I managed to beat Monaghan. And one of the reasons that I beat him was my sense of injustice in this mining payment.

Mr. Troy: Leave, if you do not wish to hear him.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, you can go back to Chatham and look after your hardware business. We are talking about mining payment grants, and I say this in all sincerity that this problem is so current and so much discussed and the citizens are so aware of it, that it means the difference in elections in our community. As John Wintermeyer used to say, "That is the simple truth of it."

In 1963, when the election campaign was on, this committee that I speak of, the committee of council, was making representations to the government. In fact, it was thought that during the election campaign some announcements might be made, but like all committees that preceded it, that committee got the cold shoulder from the government.

I saw some of the correspondence. It was shown to me, and passed back and forth. I say to the hon. Minister that in regard to that correspondence, he might have learned in the number of years that he has been a Minister of the Crown, that he should learn to write his own letters to important people. He should write his own letters, and he should not hesitate to write his signature, "J. Wilfrid Spooner" on them; do not let the underlings, the paid help, the civil servants write—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I would like to know to which correspondence the hon. member is referring.

Mr. Sopha: I saw correspondence in reference to the representations made by what I call the 63 committees.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I do not know anything about it. Send me a copy of it.

Mr. Sopha: All right. Now, Mayor Ellis—I am still reading from the news report:

Mayor Ellis appointed councillor Hawkins and alderman Neil Birney to act with the mayor on the special committee. Together, with city engineer Hennessy and clerk-comptroller P. H. Murphy, the special committee prepared a brief stating the city's case.

Later that summer, a small city delegation headed by Mayor Ellis met with Premier John Robarts on the city's dilemma. While the hearing was sympathetic, there were no promises of immediate relief from the provincial government.

I interject here. Anybody who has been connected with city government could sum up that phrase by saying, "That is the story of my life." As regards that quote, "no promises of immediate relief from the provincial government," there never has been any relief to the pleas of the city of Sudbury. Now it goes on:

About the same time, the mining municipalities of northern Ontario, including Sudbury, presented a brief to The Department of Municipal Affairs requesting that amendments be made in the distribution of mining revenue taxes among the mining municipalities. If the province accepted the major amendments, it would mean substantial additional income to the city from the payments.

However, The Department of Municipal Affairs promised only that the brief would be closely studied. Since then some of the amendments proposed in the brief have been accepted by the government, but no substantial change has been made in the mining revenue payments to municipalities.

When the new council took office at the beginning of this year, one of the first steps taken by Mayor Joe Fabbro was to appoint a special committee to investigate the city's financial position, and to prepare a brief for presentation to the provincial Cabinet.

I interpolate to say that the head of that committee was Controller Desmarais who, my friend, the hon. member for Downsview will recall, has been the repository of confidence of this government in looking into the affairs of municipalities in various parts of the province. So not only did the mayor have confidence in Controller Desmarais—

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): What was the name?

Mr. Sopha: The hon. Minister of Reform Institutions should take the critical look off his face, because what I said is true.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: What is the man's name?

Mr. Sopha: Desmarais. D-E-S-M-A-R-A-I-S. As I was saying, not only did the mayor have confidence in him, but this government has confidence in him. He is a chartered accountant, highly skilled and very well trained, especially in municipal affairs, and it seems to me that his firm of chartered accountants are the auditors for several municipalities in the district of Sudbury, and perhaps some within the district of Nipissing.

It goes on:

Heading this committee was counsellor Louis Desmarais, and the final committee consisted of six members of council, a representative of the labour movement in the city and five prominent city business men. Included on the committee are controllers Grace Hartman, James Cormack and Neil Birney; aldermen Bob Keir, Jack Raftis and Vic Whalen; J. R. Meakes; W. C. Jarrett; R. E. McMullan, George Turner; Ontario Mancini—

I might say that Ontario Mancini is the regional director for the united steel workers of America, who are the bargaining agent at International Nickel Company, and finally:

who is the local lawyer in Sudbury. I continue:

By June this year, the committee, with the help of city hall staff, had gathered a large portion of the material it needed to see how the city stands financially at present compared with similar municipalities in other parts of the province. Key men of the city staff visited five or six other communities of similar size to make comparative studies on the spot. Under the direction of the city engineer, construction costs were studied and compared with those in the city. The assessment commissioner, Aurele Ricard, made a comparative study of similar homes in three municipalities of comparable size.

It was not sufficient to accept assessment figures supplied by other assessment offices because of the lack of a common level of assessment across the province. Local assessors made on-the-spot assessments of similar homes in each of the three communities selected.

The goal that the committee set itself, in the words of the chairman, was to prove that the city has not benefited by amalgamation, but rather that the city is worse off because of it. The final brief outlines the facts:

That there is a financial problem more serious than faced by any other city in the province.

That the problem arises from a combination of circumstances unique in the province.

That the solution of the problem lies beyond the powers of the people of Sudbury and their local government.

It is expected that the Cabinet will meet with a city delegation at an early date to discuss further the city's problem and its possible solution.

I want to refer to the latter portion I read, to the statement that the considered opinion of these people, including the publisher of this newspaper, that not only has the city not been benefited by amalgamation, but, in fact, is financially worse off. Then I want to return to my earlier assertion, and I want to say that my impression that has never been dispelled is that this government—the government of Leslie Frost when he was leader of this government—that my impression has always been that representations were made to Landreville and the other city fathers along the lines that, “if you proceed with your application for amalgamation and annexation then it will go a long way toward the solution of your problems.” In other words, the city might look forward confidently to a decision of the Ontario municipal board that would involve the bringing into the nucleus of the newly formed municipality some or all of the industrial installations.

But, as I pointed out before, that did not come about. In fact, just to re-emphasize what I said, what did come about was the city got a large area and a greater responsibility, but it got nothing in the way of an expanded or increased industrial assessment. More responsibility, less money.

Then, the brief itself to the Cabinet—I do not know where that brief is now, whether it is gathering cobwebs somewhere. But in this brief the heading is very interesting, Mr. Chairman. The heading is, “1964, A Year of Dilemma.” Then it lists those who wrote this brief, and lists these things by way of summation:

The main factors giving rise to Sudbury's uniquely unenviable financial position include:

1. Its foundation upon the mining industry;
2. Geographical location;
3. Topographical conditions;
4. Soil conditions;
5. Population density;
6. Amalgamation with adjacent areas;
7. Social transition.

Let me just refer to a few of these things in greater detail. Now the writers of the brief deal first with the mining industry and they have this to say:

This is certainly the most important single factor operating to make Sudbury what it is today. Historically, Sudbury had its beginning as a mining town. It was the location of the mines which determined the location of the city. It was the existence of the mining industry that determined the course of its early growth and basic economic structure, as well as permeating and informing every aspect of its social and cultural development. Certain serious consequences flow from this foundation:

(a) The mining industry, to a large extent, creates no rateable assessment. Further, the mining industry does not attract rateable secondary industry which might become a source of industrial assessment. The industrial assessment in Sudbury is only 2.36 per cent of the total assessment.

This problem has always been recognized by the provincial government which has had for many years a well thought out system for the distribution of mining tax revenue to mining municipalities. If, however, mining tax revenues received by the city of Sudbury are converted to assessment, the total industrial assessment of the city of Sudbury would still be only 19.9 per cent of the total. At the very outset, therefore, a clear distinction may be drawn between the city of Sudbury and every other industrial city in Ontario. Sudbury does not have the basic sources of revenue possessed by the other cities. The highly developed system of general provincial legislation for operating and financing municipalities which applies to the cities of this province is inappropriate to meet the needs of the city of Sudbury.

On the other hand, the special provisions which apply to mining municipalities are no longer adequate.

(b) There is no mining municipality in Ontario even remotely comparable to the city of Sudbury, with its population of over 80,000 people and the responsibilities that go with this. It is probably safe to say that no comparable community exists in the whole of Canada. Notwithstanding the many developments and refinements in the system of distributing mining tax revenue over the years, mining tax revenue legislation was designed to meet the needs of mining municipalities. Generally speaking, a mining municipality loses its reason for continuing in existence when the mine upon which it depends closes down. The tremendous mineral resources in and around Sudbury indicate that it will continue to be the centre of a gigantic mining complex for generations to come. This assurance of the continued vitality of the economic foundation of the city is a warrant for the expenditure of larger sums for more permanent and more sophisticated municipal service systems than would be appropriate were the future and continued vitality of the community in doubt.

Just on that score, look at the crystallization of the courageous vision of the citizens of our community, supported by the industrial giants, in establishing the university that we have. Already we have spent some seven or eight million dollars in the first phase of the gathering together of the bricks and mortar for that university. A very visionary project, and it is only the first phase. We are going to spend seven or eight million dollars more, and many of those dollars, it should be pointed out, are dollars supplied by the taxpayers of this province.

Sudbury cannot furnish services of an urban standard with its present financial resources.

Then, under the heading of geographic location as being one of the causes of the problem, they make these observations:

1. The mines, as a source of material, do not attract significant secondary or satellite industry.

How true that is. How desperately true that is. And what economic grief we have had to suffer as a result of that, because small secondary industries coming into the community simply cannot compete with the wage level, the wage rates paid by the two mining giants.

2. There is not, and will not in this generation, be a market to attract industry.

Modern industry seeks proximity to its markets. The Sudbury marketing area has a population of 136,000—far too small to attract anything more than local service industry.

3. Sudbury's location disadvantage is peculiar to itself. Each of the other population centres in Ontario, including those in northern Ontario, has grown because of an advantageous location, e.g., its convenience for shipping, trade and commerce. Sudbury has grown, in spite of its location, with the growth of the local mining industry.

4. Isolated as it is, Sudbury's small available labour pool is, in itself, a deterrent to industrial development.

It is, therefore, clear that there has not been and will not be, in the foreseeable future, an influx of industry that might act as an assessment base in Sudbury.

To which all I can add from my observations is the single word, amen. It just has not occurred since the end of World War II that any other industry of any significant size has been established in the Sudbury area, and very pertinent and germane were the comments made by the authors of this brief that at all times we have a very small labour pool. Those who are fit to work are able to work and our industry demands youthful persons to work at it. As the hon. Minister well knows, coming from the community he does, those who fit that category are working at International Nickel or Falconbridge, or they have sought their means of livelihood in wider fields. They have journeyed afar to make their living, and there just is not—and cannot be by the very nature of the industry carried on—a large labour pool which any industry coming in, a foreign industry locating there, could draw upon.

I pass over the part of the brief that deals with soil conditions, except to say that the community is at one and the same time built on the hardest rock in the world—the pre-Cambrian shield through which the services of water and sewer must be put. Part is also built on quicksand. If you can imagine a more vexing combination than that—but that is exactly the truth.

I am no geologist but my knowledge of my own community informs me that these valleys or arroyos, or whatever you call them, which cut into the pre-Cambrian shield, are host to streams. And those streams, over the ages, have deposited large amounts of alluvium in their beds; and that alluvium has turned into quicksand. Some remarkable engineering and architectural feats have been carried out in our community, where architects have built buildings on this base. Indeed the federal government building at one of the main intersections in downtown Sudbury is, I am told, an engineering masterpiece in that it is built on pillars which go into the quicksand underneath. These pillars are so constructed that the building actually moves up and down, floating on this bed of quicksand.

I have told the hon. Provincial Treasurer many a time—and you know, if you repeat things long enough, you might finally strike a light of comprehension—that Norfolk county is, all sand, is built on sand. I was down there in earlier years planting tobacco. It is no problem in his county to put in sewers and water, but if he would have in mind the difficulty and the cost per foot of installing the same services in our community through the hardest rock in the world, it gives a picture of the problems the ratepayers of Sudbury have to face.

Then the brief deals with population density and topography. A lot of people have said that the topography of Sudbury is not the most beautiful in the world but it is home; and I must say that home is where the heart is. If you grow up in the Laurentian shield you get accustomed to those rocks, and they look as beautiful as a seascape might look to somebody else. My eyes first met the light of day at Cobalt—and I would be the last to protest that Cobalt is the most beautiful place in the world, probably it is one of the most ugly places—but you get accustomed to looking at the Laurentian shield, and for the rest of your life it is a landscape of great beauty.

In dealing with amalgamation, that portion of the brief was very extensive. I do not propose to read it because I have reviewed it, perhaps from another point of view; and in furnishing some additional facts, I have made sufficient reference to it.

Here is the way they end up and they achieve the heights of majestic prose, I think, in their summation when they say:

Through hardship and difficulty, strong people built this city of the north. They built this city amid its black rocks, in the midst of blight and desolation that were part of the price they had to pay. In creating the greatest base metal mining complex in the world, they have helped to shape the destiny of the province and this nation. Today they want to share more equitably in the benefits of the prosperous society to which they have made such a great contribution and to which they have so much more to give.

Then, in summation, the problem is enunciated in these words:

A combination of disadvantages, complex in their origin and operation, gives rise to Sudbury's difficulties, and this brief will attempt to outline some of the more critical ones. It is possible, however, to state the problem itself in one short sentence: If you live in Sudbury, you will pay 20.7 per cent more taxes than the average for 29 Ontario cities.

Now let me repeat that:

If you live in Sudbury, you will pay 20.7 per cent more taxes than the average for 29 Ontario cities, yet you will receive less in municipal services.

At the outset [say the presenters of this brief] we wish to assure the government that we recognize that every city in Ontario today faces grave financial difficulties. The objective of this brief, therefore, is to establish that, because of certain special difficulties, but particularly because of a unique combination of disadvantages, Sudbury's financial position, examined in depth, compares unfavourably with that of any other city in Ontario.

The information contained herein is a compression of almost a full year of intensive research carried out by many individuals and groups in the community, including the city council, its staff, and the research facilities at its command. The city can make available a mass of supporting evidence, too voluminous for inclusion herein, for every statement of fact in this submission, and for the conclusion that no other city of Ontario poses so acute a financial dilemma.

To which, I add, there is a challenge; there is a throwing down of the gauntlet. They say two things: We are worse off than any other city of 29 in Ontario; and we can support our contention with evidence of the statements of fact we make in this brief.

One has heard along the grapevine that, so far as the comparison to 29 Ontario cities was concerned, and maybe the hon. Minister will dispel this, when the brief got into the hands of his department, in order to confute, to contradict, to bring some argument to bear against the submissions made in this brief that the hon. Minister's staff, perhaps at the direction of the Minister, said: "Mould in Metropolitan Toronto and see how Sudbury stacks up when looked at in the light of Metropolitan Toronto." Indeed, I do not think any of the municipalities that make up Metropolitan Toronto were included in this 29—some little finagling went on in The Department of Municipal Affairs to change the picture.

My protestation on behalf of my community is that this municipal complex of Metropolitan Toronto is completely unique in the province. This is something entirely different.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): You are right in speaking to the hon. member for Grey North.

Mr. Sopha: This metropolitan area really—look, I am not going to be deterred by foolishness—is in itself in the nature of an experiment. It is unreasonable and unfair to compare a community of 80,000, such as we are, to the metropolitan complex system of government. So the statement on the 29 cities selected for the purposes of comparison stands; and, after a year of research, the city of Sudbury is able to say to the Cabinet, as they did say: "If you live in Sudbury, you will pay 20.7 per cent more taxes, and you will receive a good many less services."

Sudbury today, therefore, faces the enormous task of filling needs as quickly as possible with less money than has been available in the past five years. Those projects, of course, are the commonplaces of any municipality: The need for schools, fire and police protection, roads, libraries, parks and recreation.

And in regard to parks and recreation, let me say this. By George, I am going to say it. I have wanted to say it for a long time, and I am going to tell you something. There is so much wealth produced in the Sudbury basin. The amount of wealth produced is so fantastic. Over the years, since nickel was first mined there before World War I, the amount of wealth that has been produced is so fabulous that if one person possessed all that wealth he would be as rich as the mythological Croesus; he would have the Midas touch in him. Thus it must follow, logically and morally, that that community should be one of the most beautiful in the province of Ontario. It should be. It should have parks and recreational facilities. It should have fine highways and it should have everything else that denotes a community of great wealth such as we are.

And yet there are those who come among us, and they say, look at this ugly scar on the landscape. Indeed, I heard the mayor of Sudbury, in welcoming the mayors and reeves, in his words of welcome before the hon. Minister came to insult them as he did, the mayor said to them he apologized for the ugliness of our community.

Why should he ever have to do that? I sat there and listened to an apology for its ugliness.

We have heard about people who have been moved to that community by their firms and employers. Their wives have followed them, and before even contemplating the removal of their young to the community the wife has said to the husband: I will not live here. I will not live here; and she has removed herself back to southern Ontario.

I say that morally that community, producing the wealth that it does, should be one of the most beautiful in the province.

However, I stand here as a man, sir, who wants to do something for northern Ontario. When we come to your estimates this year we are going to find out what you in your tenure as a Minister of the Crown have done for northern Ontario, what you have done.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): I am just listening to hear what you have done in your area.

Mr. Sopha: What you have done? We are going to have a review of your stewardship this year, such as you have never had before.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I am going to have to be able to listen and advise you as to what you are not doing for your area.

Mr. Sopha: We are going to have a review of your stewardship when your estimates come. You will not be able to sit in your seat and natter and mutter into your beard. You will have to get up like a man and talk.

Mr. MacDonald: It is only another 25 minutes to 6 o'clock, you should be able to fill it.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: When the time comes we will advise you what you are not doing for your area.

Mr. Sopha: Yes. Well, if I do, it is my business.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: That is what you think.

Mr. Sopha: Now, in regard to parks and recreation. It is interesting to note that on expenditures the only table they included in the brief—and I am going to make reference to it—the only table they included was a parks and recreation expenditures comparison. They took the following cities to make the comparison for recreational facilities, and perhaps it is a very apt one because the man who has to engage in the very arduous and physically difficult business of mining ought to expect as a reward at the end of his day of labour that he have adequate recreational facilities to fill in his free hours.

They took these cities of the province to make a comparison: Brantford, Burlington, Etobicoke, Hamilton, Kitchener, London, Oshawa, Ottawa, Peterborough, Sarnia, Scarborough, Toronto, Toronto township and Kitchener. They set out the population in the first column, and then they set out the capital outlay and determined the per capita outlay on parks and recreation expenditures; and that is the only column to which I would wish to refer.

Brantford, with a population of 55,624, led the way with an expenditure of $12.04 per capita.

Pardon me, that is not quite correct. Toronto township with 73,000 population had an expenditure of $12.24 and Brantford was second with $12.04. They ranged all the way down but the lowest of any one in those that I have recited—including Brantford, Hamilton, Kitchener, Oshawa, London, Peterborough, Sarnia, all the major cities of the province—the very lowest is Sudbury at $3.78; compared to Brantford $12.04 and Kitchener with 80,650 population, which almost equals that of Sudbury, $7.03, and so on.

So that, notwithstanding the unpleasant, the snide and the ill-meant, malicious remarks of the hon. member for York South that I was trying to run out the clock at 20 minutes to the hour—

Mr. Bryden: He said you were capable of doing it.

Mr. Sopha: I see that he has departed from the House having made the remark. He is like a hit-and-run artist, makes it and then he—

Mr. MacDonald: Sir?

Mr. Sopha: Oh, there he is. He is not in his seat.

I do not intend to say anything more on the subject. I would hope that in the fullness of time that we would hear—I hope that I have accomplished this, believe me, it will be an achievement if I have merely accomplished this as a result of the efforts that I have made—the hon. Minister will reply in the House.

Whether the press carries it or not I will report back in the city of Sudbury the answer to the question: What happened to the brief that the city presented to the Cabinet on October 28, 1964? What consideration has been given to it? What are the intentions of the government in respect to whether it intends to answer the plea for financial assistance to the municipality?

And you may take as read every ancillary question of a corollary nature that appertains to those that I have recited!

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, that was a very interesting discourse by the hon. member for Sudbury. I appreciate his remarks in addition to the material contained in the brief of the city of Sudbury which of course was, as he said, presented to the Cabinet last October. I must say it has received a great deal of consideration not only by The Department of Municipal Affairs and myself but by the government generally.

I note that the hon. member for Sudbury has certain impressions. I must say that I know nothing about impressions that he may have gained from his association with the former mayor of Sudbury, now one of the honoured justices in the province, and anything that he has said relating to any conversations between that particular person and the former Prime Minister of this province is a matter that is not of any concern to me nor of which I have any knowledge.

Insofar as the brief of the city of Sudbury is concerned, it is basically correct. What it attempts to prove is, of course, quite correct in that the city of Sudbury, because of its location, is on a pile of rock and a pile of quicksand. Anyone looking at the community today would certainly agree that the CPR should never have landed where it did land in that particular area. It was not the location of the mines that decided the location of the city of Sudbury, it was the CPR.

Now, that being the case, I admit that they have some special problems. We in this department, in our way, try to do something to alleviate those problems.

With all due respect to the former mayor of Sudbury, who had such very close affinity with certain governmental people here to whom the hon. member for Sudbury has referred, I think that in all sincerity and all fairness we should say that it was not the mayor of Sudbury who developed the system of assisting mining municipalities or municipalities where employees of mines resided. It was the members of the northeastern Ontario mining municipalities association, which at that particular time I do not think the city of Sudbury felt inclined to support financially or otherwise.

However, it was in the early 1950s that that group, with which I was associated, developed what is now known as mining revenue payments. The city of Sudbury has gained some valuable financial assistance through the years. Until amalgamation took place some years ago, the city of Sudbury had no mining operations within its borders. So that when mining revenue payments were instituted it was advantageous to the city. As the hon. member has so ably said and explained, funds were made available on the basis of the residence of the miners, and not necessarily the place where they worked.

I think that in all fairness, we must also collect a few items which appear in the brief of the city of Sudbury, and of which mention has been made by the hon. member. The brief indicates that if you live in Sudbury you will pay 20 per cent more taxes—20.7 was the figure quoted—on the average than 29 other cities. The people who developed this particular percentage were very smart accountants. As a matter of fact, it might be suggested that if there were clients looking for smart accountants they should endeavour to find out who these people were, because this figure was arrived at by equalizing the assessment and computing an average mill rate for these 29 other cities. That is hardly the correct way of doing it, and it is taking advantage of figures when you produce a figure of that kind.

It is also noted that the comparison in respect of taxes levied was for the year 1962. I believe that that is quite all right; but the committee started to work in 1963 and could very well have brought their figures up to 1963. And I think the figures for 1963 or 1964 are perhaps a little more favourable than the figures for 1962.

However, Mr. Chairman, that is a matter for which I do not have the figures at the present time.

When you examine the per capita tax levied in Sudbury, against all cities in Ontario, excluding Toronto, there is not very much difference; but I want to explain that there is a reason why there should be a difference, and there is a reason why Sudbury finds itself in the financial position it is in. If you are only examining figures, you will find that the per capita levy for all cities in Ontario, excluding Toronto, was $123.14, whereas in Sudbury it is less than that—it is $100.30, or approximately $23 less per capita. This means that the per capita levy of Sudbury was 18.55 per cent less than all the cities in Ontario excluding Toronto. That does not mean to say that the taxpayer in Sudbury was not paying enough taxes, because he has other costs incidental to living in that area, as do people in other communities in the north country, and with that I agree.

The hon. member has talked about the industrial assessment in Sudbury. In the brief it is mentioned that it is only 2.36 per cent of the total assessment, and that is correct. But I think that it must be borne in mind that one should not only consider industrial assessment, but also the commercial and business assessment, as being an assessment that produces revenue to the municipality—and does not necessarily involve it in as much cost as is incidental to residential assessment. So, when one examines that, one gets a clearer picture and a clearer delineation of the amount of assessment attributable to residential properties and other properties in the community.

One of the great problems facing Sudbury, and other northern Ontario towns—and I suppose you could say the same thing for other towns in the province of Ontario located on the type of soil on which Sudbury is built—is the rock pile and the quicksand; because here is something we obtained from the Ontario water resources commission as to the cost of excavating and installing sewer lines. In Sudbury, the low cost per foot to supply and install an eight-inch sewer is $5.22 a foot, but the high is $32.58. When you go to a municipality like Etobicoke, the low is $6.10 and the high is $6.78. A six-inch water main in Sudbury costs them $4.85 a foot to $19.32, and in Etobicoke the low is $5 and the high is $9.72. So of course they have problems; particularly since the amalgamation and annexation has taken place; the city has done a reasonably good job in trying to provide municipal services to the area which was annexed.

There is not much foresight in hindsight. I would think that, at the time the municipal board passed the order setting up the new municipality, if the municipal officials of those days were not satisfied they had the right of appeal to the Cabinet; but I do not think that such an appeal was entered into. However, that is long past and there is no need to discuss that.

Mr. Sopha: Does the hon. Minister know of any single instance where the Cabinet ever gave any relief in an appeal against the municipal board? Can the hon. Minister think of any single one?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, I have not been there long enough to answer that, but I think there have been cases where rehearings have been ordered—which would be comparable to asking the board to give the subject another examination.

The matter of the brief has been examined by departmental officials. Because of the fact that the government was concerned with the whole problem of municipal costs and taxes generally, both at the provincial and municipal level, we are awaiting, before taking further action in connection with the brief, the report of the Smith committee on taxation. The committee, at the present time, is examining into this whole relationship of the financial support of the province vis-à-vis its municipalities. I think it would be unfair on my part to go to the city of Sudbury and say, "This is what we will do," or "This is what I would recommend the government should do to assist you." There may very well be a whole new procedure of dividing the tax dollar the hon. Provincial Treasurer gets and which he, this year, is going to split in two and give 47 cents to the municipalities and their boards and commissions and keep 53 cents for provincial endeavours. It may be that that tax dollar is going to have to be divided in a different way.

I want to assure the hon. member for Sudbury that we, and he in turn, can assure the city officials and the city council that we have examined their brief and are holding it in a vacuum at the moment because of the fact that we are awaiting a report which may have a very great effect on the financial support of the municipalities of the province by the provincial government.

Mr. Sopha: Does the hon. Minister recall that the hon. Prime Minister said something at the meeting? I did not get to the meeting at the library, but does the hon. Minister recall—I am asking through you, Mr. Chairman—that the hon. Prime Minister said something to the city fathers to the effect that he would appoint a special committee of Cabinet to study—

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, might I speak to this? I have been asked this on several occasions. Apparently the idea was circulated, in one form or another, that I had said I would appoint a special committee of the Cabinet to deal with this matter. I did not say that. If the inference was taken from my remarks, it was not intended.

The fact is that the brief was received by the entire Cabinet. What I said was, that the brief would be divided and referred to each Minister who was affected by any matter appearing in the brief. This is quite a usual way of handling a brief of that type; you just simply break it up and despatch the portion of it that affects a certain department to that department; then this is brought back together and considered again by the Cabinet as a whole.

On several occasions I have been asked—and apparently the idea did get around that I had said that I would appoint a special Cabinet committee, but that really is not the usual way in which we handle these matters.

Mr. Sopha: I want to say to the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs that I am going to dub this year of his existence: "The year of suspended animation," because I have heard so many times from his lips that he said that he is waiting for the Smith committee to report on almost everything. It is a strange thing indeed, I must say, when we have had a select committee of this House sitting for three or four years—four years the hon. member for Downsview tells me—dealing with municipal problems; and I think I am correct in saying that the terms of reference of that select committee include the financial aspects of problems of municipalities. Then, in addition to that, you have had this Smith committee. If I did not know one existed, I would think that was a fictitious name, like a fellow registering at a hotel, "John Smith." But that gives rise to the comment—and I think it a fair one—that this is the year of suspended animation. It is used as a crutch and an excuse for everything.

Let us hope that that committee, the Smith committee, reports before the estimates of another year, before another parliamentary session, so that the hon. Minister has ripped out from under him that crutch of saying "Let's wait for the Smith committee." Let us fervently pray that it does a better job than the Hagey commission.

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton): Mr. Chairman, I have a brief question of the hon. Minister. There was an article which appeared in the Hamilton newspaper on Monday under the heading, "Copps plans march for equal grants." I would like to read very briefly, if I may:

Hamilton will make a protest march on Queen's Park demanding a fair share of provincial financial help for this area. Mayor Vic Copps today said Hamilton will seek support of Burlington and Wentworth county municipalities in a request for money to help keep local taxes down. The mayor was commenting after Queen's Park announced an additional grant of $1,788,000 for Metro Toronto to help hold down the civic rate. "We shall overcome," the mayor added.

In Burlington over the weekend, Mayor Owen Mullin offered the same criticism as Mayor Copps.

Mr. Chairman, I realize these statements were made at the time it was revealed in both municipalities that there may be substantial increases in their mill rates. I was wondering if the hon. Minister could offer some explanation to clear this particular matter up?

Mr. MacDonald: Sounds like a set-up.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Let me assure the hon. member for York South that it is no set-up.

An hon. member: He imputes bad motives to us quite frequently.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I think that what the Mayor of Hamilton was referring to was the difference in the unconditional per capita grants that are paid to a city the size of Hamilton, and the same type of grants paid to the metropolitan corporation. Now, if we examine the schedule contained in Bill No. 111, 1964, An Act to amend The Municipal Unconditional Grants Act, we have set out why these grants vary. The purpose of the municipal unconditional grants are to assist each municipality, the taxpayers of which, through municipal taxes, contribute towards the cost of the administration of justice in a county so much per capita; to assist each municipality in the province of Ontario in the provision of welfare and social services, including indigent and unemployment relief, hospitalization and institutional care costs and other services for its inhabitants by way of unconditional grants, another figure per capita.

Then, part 3 of this bill:

In recognition of the larger per capita expenditures that municipalities with larger populations are required to make in the provision of welfare and social services, including indigent and unemployment relief, hospitalization and institutional care costs and other services for their inhabitants, the following per capita payment to municipalities having a population of over 2,000 persons in addition to those set out in part 1 and part 2 by way of unconditional grants so much, $2.50 per capita in the case of metropolitan municipalities and cities having a population of over 750,000 people.

As far as I can see, the point of difference or the point of argument is that the mayor of Hamilton, who is the mayor of a community with a population of, I think, 275,670 according to our book, is entitled to a grant of a certain amount per capital, and in the case of Metropolitan Toronto the grant is somewhat more. I think that after reading and studying the reason—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Hamilton is more than some other municipalities.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Of course, Hamilton's grant is more than some other municipalities that are getting less, and this is one way of distributing these particular funds. That, as far as I can guess, is the argument that the mayor of Hamilton is so strong about.

Mr. Singer: There are a couple of items, and I think perhaps I can dispose of one before it reaches 6 of the clock. There is a second local government study tour being sponsored by the Ontario municipal association, scheduled to take place during the summer of this year. In the literature that is sent out in this regard, there is the advice that approximately 80 persons can be accommodated on this tour. In addition to representation from various municipal bodies, it is anticipated that the representatives of provincial departments concerned with local government will be included. This is the second tour of this type that has been sponsored, and having spoken to representatives of municipal governments who were on the first tour, they found it to be of substantial value.

It is particularly interesting at this time to note the suggestion that there will be certain representatives of departments of the provincial government. I think this is a good thing. These tours are of substantial importance, at least to the members of this Legislature, as well as to the members of local governments. It is very interesting that members of local governments should go and see what is going on in other jurisdictions, and perhaps catch a few new ideas about how to run their municipalities.

But the important place really where these ideas can be carried into action is right here in this chamber, in the form of new legislation. It occurs to me, Mr. Chairman, that this province could well make an investment, a worthwhile investment under item No. 2 in this vote 1301, which is travelling expenses, and send an all-party committee from the Legislature on the tour. I think that there could be great benefit to the people of the province if a representative group of the Legislature were sent on this tour, and I think that the benefits that would accrue to the province would be very substantial in bringing back new ideas that might, in the immediate future, or in the years to come, be translated into good legislation.

I hope that the hon. Minister will seriously take this suggestion under advisement.

It being 6 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

On vote 1301:

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Chairman, before we tidy up this vote there are a few explanations I would like to give, much as I would appreciate being relieved of the added responsibility.

However, I think the first comment I have to make is in connection with a rather interesting comment which was passed by the hon. member for Downsview (Mr. Singer) when we adjourned at 6 o'clock, and that was in connection with the Ontario municipal association European tour in 1965.

At the moment we have no intention of having departmental representatives participate in this tour this year. We did have someone on the tour two years ago and I would say that we were satisfied with the report which was presented by this member of the staff. But it was felt that we would not want to be sending too many people on tours of this kind from the same department and so we have not made any provision for sending anyone in an official capacity from The Department of Municipal Affairs.

Now, I think that the hon. member for Downsview in his comments made the suggestion that there should be members from the Legislature on this tour, and that may have some value. I have not, of course, had any time to analyze his suggestion. There has been a considerable amount of expense involved in a number of investigations and commissions and select committees and so on, that have been charged to this department in recent years and in the current fiscal year. So I would think that we would like to have a rest from those expenditures, feeling that it might be possible to make better use of the funds in some other way; such as co-operating with municipalities and perhaps members of planning boards and people in that field of administration on a broader basis than we have been able to do in the past.

However, I welcome the suggestion made by the hon. member and I would say that I will give it consideration. I will also mention it to the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) and to the hon. members of the government in due course.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to give some information in connection with a number of items that are listed, beginning with vote 1301 item No. 4, which is commissions and investigations, because this is quite an increase in the allocation of funds this coming fiscal year as against the current year. As a matter of fact the increase in the budget is some $200,000.

Part of these funds will be used to continue the revision of the assessors course at Queen's university in co-operation with the institute of municipal assessors. We now have underway, as hon. members know, a regional study involving the municipalities in the county of Carleton and the cities of Ottawa and Eastview. This work will be completed this year, and so we have an allocation of funds there for that purpose.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview). How much is that going to cost; is there any projection?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, the allocation of funds for the next fiscal year is $25,500. We have spent somewhere between $30,000 and $40,000 so far, so it will probably go about $60,000 or $70,000.

Now, then, we also have in the budget an item of expenditure for the Royal commission on Metropolitan Toronto which is headed by Mr. Goldenberg. That is to be completed this year.

We have nine other projects involving studies of various parts of the province that I think are of great interest to the hon. members of this House. I would like to take the opportunity to mention these briefly so that we will know that The Department of Municipal Affairs is not asleep all the time, it is only the Minister who is asleep some of the time.

I place these before the House in the order of priority which has been established by our department heads. The first one involves Peel county. That is a very important county in the southern part of the province, contiguous to Metropolitan Toronto.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Who represents that riding?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Off hand I just do not remember who is the able representative for that riding, but he does such a good job that he never seems to get into any trouble.

However, here is the reason for this regional study and what we intend to do. The changes and proposed changes that have been made to us by representations from municipal people in the county itself, the county council, affecting the other municipalities of the county; the northern area of the county with its different problems to cope with; these at times conflicting elements indicate to us the need for an examination of the possible changes and proposals which have been placed before us from time to time. We hope that our studies would maintain the idea that Peel county council as such would remain as an effective organization for guiding future developments of that county.

Then, of course, there is the pressure exerted by the Metropolitan Toronto area and its expansion which has some effect upon the continued development of Peel county.

The number two area, I have already made mention of it, is the Waterloo area, and this recommendation comes about as a result of proposals which were contained within the Waterloo area report completed by the department, with some modifications based on recommendations which have come to us from some of the municipalities in that area. We want to establish a joint planning area including the county of Waterloo and the cities of Galt, Kitchener and Waterloo. This would be a planning organization that would permit the planning board for this area to make significant recommendations bearing upon area government and administration. We think that is a desirable area to work in.

I have already made mention of the Lakehead area. That is priority number three. The cities of Fort William and Port Arthur have been very interested in this. Now they have received the support of the heads of the three township municipalities surrounding the two cities, and the study would be geared towards resolving some of the municipal relationships in the area. Mention has been made by one of the hon. members that the city of Port Arthur, or Fort William—I do not remember which—would not go into an agreement with its neighbour to sell water to it unless the neighbour did certain things.

That is only one problem existing in that area, and I think that the study that we wish to undertake here will bring into the open some of these problems and some of the remedies that may be apparent. The study will assist not just the municipal councils but the very residents of these municipalities to supply themselves with more efficient municipal administration. That, and better planning for future growth and development.

The number four in priority is the Niagara peninsula study. In a recent report, Dr. Mayo of the University of Western Ontario, recommended this study to us; the study will be based on his report, and it will include a study of the administration of the two counties of Lincoln and Welland. We hope to obtain information from that which will be a guide to those two counties and to the municipalities in that area of the province.

Number five is the Brantford-Brant county study. This is similar to the Waterloo area. The city of Brantford and Brant county have, during recent months, endorsed the establishment of a planning organization for the municipalities that composes the county and the city of Brantford. There is a growing concern, also, about intermunicipal relationships that could lead to proposals affecting the present boundaries and municipal services provided throughout the city-county area. That is, we think, an important part of the province and we are going to undertake a study there.

Number six is the study projected in the city of Hamilton area. This is an area involving some ten municipalities and there, again, we have the support of a majority of the municipal councils who wish to see themselves, and ourselves, involved in the study proposals and we are going to undertake that this year.

Number seven in priority is the London-Middlesex area. A major annexation by the city of London took place less than four years ago. It appears that, from a planning point of view, the present efforts of the Middlesex planning board have not kept up with the problems of growth and change in the area. In the light of the possibility of further applications for annexation and the implications of the construction of the pipe line from Lake Huron—which is undertaken now by the Ontario water resources commission—it would appear to us that an extensive study of the whole problem of administration in the area of London and its surrounding municipipalities is important, and is required at this time.

The number eight study is called "The area of Muskoka." During the last year a number of discussions have been held at the Muskoka district council meeting, and with the executive of the council, about the problems resulting from the absence of area jurisdiction and planning in Muskoka. At the last district council meeting, which was held in November, it was agreed that a committee of municipal representatives should be set up to work with representatives of those provincial departments serving the area, for the purpose of holding a conference on resort area problems in the summer of 1965.

While this conference may both clarify and produce answers to a number of local concerns, there is no doubt that a more detailed examination, a more extensive examination of the problems of growth and change in Muskoka, will be recognized. We think that by holding a conference of these municipal people this summer, some of the problems will become apparent to a greater number. We think that this examination will provide alternative functions to our study in this area, because it is different in its economy, as well as its topography, to other parts of the province.

Number nine in priority is a study in Ontario county. The industrialization of the shoreline municipalities in Ontario county is creating special problems which involve Metropolitan Toronto, the townships surrounding the city of Oshawa, and the towns of Ajax and Whitby. At present there is a regional planning association operating on an ad hoc basis, without legislative status or a large enough budget to maintain an effective planning programme. Here again, as in Peel county, there is a division of land uses: Rural resorts in the north and urban sprawl and concentration in the south. A study anticipating the future of the municipalities involved would complement the present effort to deal with boundary changes and with the extensions of municipal service. Then, Mr. Chairman, there is the possibility that there may be other areas of the province which will require studies of a similar nature.

One of the problems we have, in undertaking these studies, is to get the people to do the job. And I say this to you: If I come back next year and say, "I am sorry, I only got half the job done," let me assure you it will just be because we have not been able to find the people to undertake the work.

I explained to hon. members last night what we are trying to do in the training of planners in our own department; but, of course, that is not going to produce results immediately, so we have to depend on outsiders who are in this field of community planning, who are working on subdivision plans for developers, and so on and so forth. Of course, we have to be careful to get the services of people who are equipped to undertake work of this kind and, at the same time, people who are not biased in respect to one or other mode of operation, so that we would end up by having the same kind of a report everywhere we went.

However, those are some of the things we are trying to do in the department. I give you that information, Mr. Chairman, so that you will know that we are working at these things as much as we possibly can.

The next item, if I may make a few remarks about it—

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I think this is a good programme the hon. Minister has announced. It is the sort of thing I tried to get across for some five years, when I was the main critic of this department, and it is the sort of thinking I have tried to convey to some of my colleagues on the select committee. I was going to ask the hon. Minister, but he anticipated the question: Are there people available to do these studies? He has some doubts about this, and I share those doubts, because top men are needed and I do not know how many of them there are in the province who will undertake these nine jobs. And as many as he has listed, I think any of us could list another 20 jobs which deserve equal attention.

There are a couple of points that disturb me about these studies. These studies are most necessary as a starting point; there is no question about it. I am not sure whether the hon. Minister was using "planning" and "administration" as interchangeable words, or as alternate words. These studies are not going to be of any use if they are going to be limited only to planning; because I am certain that by now the hon. Minister agrees, if he did not before, that there is no point in trying to do area planning unless there is area administration. And unless this planning is done on a regional basis, together with regional administration, it just is not going to work.

Then the $64 question comes: Once these studies are in, is it part of the government policy, is the hon. Minister prepared to say, that in the Peel county area and the portion of Peel county which will be under study, and in the Kitchener-Galt area and the Lakehead area and the Niagara area, is there some promise that there will be government action, because I think it is equally obvious that the process of reorganization is not going to bubble up from the bottom. If it is going to come at all, it has to come from the top down; it has to come from the government, from The Department of Municipal Affairs.

There can be no better example of this than in Metropolitan Toronto, where for 30 or 40 years they discussed the possibility of municipalities getting together. They discussed the possibility of building or extending Eglinton Avenue; and it was not until the first year of the existence of Metropolitan Toronto, which was imposed by government direction, that Eglinton Avenue was built. The problem there was that it ran through four municipalities; and unless the direction comes from the top down, you are not going to get the sort of area planning or area administration that is going to accomplish these things.

I think it is most important that, along with these, the hon. Minister state—and I think he should state now, since he has embarked upon this, and it is the first time that the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs, since I have been in the House, has at least outlined a programme that he would like to achieve in the next 12 months along these lines—that he is prepared to say, as part of government policy: "Once these reports are in we will put our departmental people to work with a view to bringing in legislation"—and within the immediate foreseeable future we will have a Kitchener-Galt bill or a Peel county bill, or a Niagara peninsula bill, which will set these things right, presuming that the study leads us in the right direction.

This is a most important piece of the continuing effort; because just another study report to put on the shelf and consider in five or ten years—the same as has been done with the Niagara peninsula—is just a waste of time and money and effort.

A couple of years ago, Mr. Chairman, I spoke at some length upon the planning studies and the various types of studies done in the Niagara peninsula, and I think I enumerated about 15 or 18 of them—and they are around the hon. Minister's office somewhere. If this programme he is outlining is just another series of reports which are going to sit in some pigeon-hole and gather dust over the years, then there is no real point to it. But if the hon. Minister is serious about the effort he is proposing, then I would hope that he would be prepared to say tonight, when these studies come in, that the government will be prepared to take the necessary legislation to implement them. If that sort of statement came along, I think many people in Ontario would feel happy that at long last, in the field of municipal affairs, we were beginning to move somewhere.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): The hon. member for Downsview has raised a very pertinent point here regarding implementation of these studies. I would suggest to the hon. Minister there are some other studies that might be undertaken and these might have some bearing on civic design.

We are coming to the place on this continent and in this province where we are just a bit ashamed of the kind of civic design which we are building into our municipalities; where we get, along our main streets and on our concession roads in our suburbs particularly, the kind of hodge-podge development which has no relationship to any kind of rational development. We have a service station and a hot-dog stand and a store; and while zoning does help a little bit here, it does not do the job that has to be done.

Then added to that the terrible vista of overhead wires which we should have gotten rid of long ago on this continent, just as Europe has been getting rid of them for the last half century. Up and down our streets in our town and cities we see this maze of overhead wires. We ought to be investigating ways and means of getting rid of them. At least we should start now in the newer subdivisions to set up standards so that the wires go underground and the services are buried. This way we can have a better appearing street and a better appearing municipality.

I would hope that the hon. Minister over this next 12 months, if it is not included in his estimates, will think in terms of realistic investigation and study to give real leadership to the municipalities as to how better civic design might be achieved. This is vitally important for the future of this country.

The other thing that I would like to say, or perhaps ask, following up the hon. member for Downsview, is what the hon. Minister is thinking of in terms of training. Now I know there are certain schools at Queen's and to some extent here at the University of Toronto where planners are being trained, where people are being taught in the whole technique of planning and running municipalities. But to what extent is this adequate?

Perhaps the hon. Minister can enlighten us on this, and he might also tell us what plans are underway over the next period of time, the next five years and the next ten years, to enlarge these facilities in a systematic way so that at the earliest possible moment we can turn out the kind of planners and the kind of civil servants who are needed in this developing age.

Perhaps the hon. Minister could answer these and then I have some further observations I want to make a little later on.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, dealing first with the comments with the hon. member for Downsview, I would say that we are going to proceed with as many of these studies that we can possibly get organized this year. As I announced some time ago, with the retirement of Dr. L. R. Cumming as deputy Minister, I have authority in the form of an order-in-council approving his employment as a full-time consultant and adviser to the Minister generally on matters of policy and to assist the Minister and the government in the development of programmes and policies, whether relating to municipal affairs generally throughout the province or those which may be designed to meet particular situations.

Intensive consideration of reports and recommendations of the Royal commission on Metropolitan Toronto, the Ontario committee on taxation, the Ottawa-Eastview-Carleton county local government review, the select committee on The Municipal Act and related Acts and similar consideration of the recommendations resulting from other special studies and reviews which may be authorized is contemplated.

Now Dr. Cumming is charged with the responsibility of studying these proposals and I want to assure the House, sir, that when we have these matters in our hands we will give them all due consideration.

It sometimes happens, as a matter of fact it may happen many times, that study groups or individuals may and do make recommendations that are not acceptable. I am not going to be bound by accepting any recommendation in a report that I as the responsible Minister of the department and a member of the Cabinet am not prepared to accept. We must have that freedom and liberty of movement.

In connection with the subject matter that the hon. member for Yorkview mentioned, the matter of civic design, I must admit that we are behind other areas or other countries in this matter of the attention that has been given to the design of buildings in this country. Now mind you, it is probably easy to criticize and when we consider the economic circumstances under which many of the towns and communities of our country were built, perhaps in those days they built as well as they could under the circumstances.

Mr. Young: It is still happening.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: It is still happening, yes. I was getting to that. I have great fear of planning designs that go in straight lines. I like to see a crescent once in a while or some little change in the size of the lot, so that there is some difference from one to another. Unfortunately, some of our builders have built the same kind of a wartime house, street after street of them. We can only hope that as our universities produce architects who are able to influence builders to put a few fancy things into buildings, that those situations will improve in the days ahead. I realize, as everyone else does, that there has been some very irrational development in many parts of the country.

Now of course we go to Europe and find that the people there have a little different outlook on matters involving design of buildings. Instead of tearing down and demolishing buildings as they are doing here in Toronto and many other places, of course, they preserve those buildings. I was in a city hall in a city in Germany some years ago that has been standing for 950 years. And my, are those people ever proud of that building; and it is a beautiful building. It is not a large building, it is probably half the size of this room, but it has served the purpose and is still serving the purpose.

Mr. Singer: That is what we want to look at on this trip.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That is what you want to look at? Well, I will send you a picture of it and save a lot of money; for this year anyway, if you do not mind.

In connection with this very matter, our community planning branch is continually paying more attention to this question of civic design and the design of subdivision plans. I think if we were to compare the new development or the developments of recent years with those of ten or fifteen years ago, we would find we have shown some originality in the approval of some of these schemes.

In connection with training of civic employees, I do not think we have to restrict it to community planners only. In Canada at the present time I am advised that there are five planning schools. There is Laval, McGill, Toronto, Manitoba and the University of British Columbia. Unfortunately there has not been and there is not as much interest in that field of education as there should be in this country. These five universities unfortunately are producing only about 50 graduates each year, and that is not enough to meet the demand of the country.

Mr. Singer: They are all graduate schools, are they not?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I believe so.

Mr. Young: Are there undergraduates?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I cannot tell the hon. member that, because I was just given a note by one of my staff people here tonight.

What we are going to try to do in the department is to provide a training programme of a year or two years. We are not quite sure how long it will take to produce—not engineers or not people comparable to the graduates of these universities in this field, but people who will have grade 12 or grade 13 and who will come into the office and work in the various parts of the administration of the community planning branch. They will also work in planning board operations in the local municipality in order to get a sort of internship into community planning as we see it and as the municipalities see it. We would hope that in a period of two years, we will be able to give these people sufficient training so that they will understand the planning functions and be able to discuss planning matters with the graduate planner and with architects, with developers, with municipal councillors, with members of planning boards and so on. We think that in that way we will be able to build up our own staff, and that really is the great problem.

Now we have the same problem with—

Mr. Young: May I ask the hon. Minister about the numbers—this was mentioned last night and I think it is a good approach to a problem. The graduates from grade 13 may be at a lower academic level than they should be. But rather than go into college, they might work in here if they come. But how many people will be involved in this kind of training, because there certainly will be a tremendous demand as the hon. Minister knows, over the next few years, particularly if we get regional government over the province.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: This year, the best we can do is to try to bring six or eight into the branch.

Mr. Young: That is in each year?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: We are starting to run a school, and my staff people are highly qualified and all that. But I am not quite sure as to how this will work exactly. They have conducted a lot of studies in that field, they have discussed it with the people in the field of education at varsity and so on, but they are just a little concerned as to how much they can impose upon themselves not to disrupt the whole operation of the department, because the people who are going to do the teaching are the top officials in the community planning branch.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): I hope the staff of the hon. Minister does not have to go to OCE.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: No, I do not know anything about OCE. What happens down there?

Mr. MacDonald: That is where one learns to teach.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Oh, I see. Well, I hope not. I think that they will be able to get by with the knowledge they have now.

I have already spoken about what we have tried to do in connection with assisting the training of assessors. We are doing the same with clerks and treasurers through the cooperation of their association and our department finance branch; we are re-examining the course of study that is provided through Queen's University to clerks and treasurers, and we hope to improve it over a period of time.

Now, if I may, Mr. Chairman, go to number five, which is the—

Mr. Singer: Before the hon. Minister leaves that, I just wonder if I can make a few comments. These matriculants—if they call them that now, I do not know, the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) keeps changing the terms—are they just going to be competent technicians really? They are not going to be much more than that. But it occurs to me that the hon. Minister should sit down with his colleague, the hon. Minister of Education, and try to influence him to direct the department, or his university advisory committee, to study the need, and it is a real need—I do not think they are going to have to study it very long—for graduate planning. The importance of establishing courses—I do not know, I am subject to correction on this and perhaps the deputy could advise the hon. Minister—but I do not think there are any undergraduate planning courses. They are all graduate courses. You have to have your BA first.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: They are all graduate courses.

Mr. Singer: They are all graduate courses, and I would think that the advisory committee on university affairs could well turn their attention to this. There is a great field for bright young people to get into, and we are worried. Where are we sending our young people? What are they going to do?

We need them, and we are going to need them for the foreseeable future. This is more and more important as we go on, and there is nothing that makes it more obvious now than the hon. Minister telling us tonight he would like to do nine studies in the next twelve months, but he is not at all sure that he can find the people to do them. I quite agree with him. I do not think he is going to be able to find the people to do nine studies.

If he can handle three or four of them and handle three or four of them well, it will be quite an achievement. But somewhere along the line I think government has a duty and a responsibility to produce or encourage the universities to set up undergraduate courses to start producing young people who will be the planners of the future. I do not know how many planners could be used immediately, but I would guess it would run into several hundred, if they were available, if there were bright, young, Ontario students coming out of our universities who were properly trained. I do not think any one of them would have difficulty in finding top-notch jobs, top paying jobs, in exciting careers. I would certainly urge the hon. Minister to get after his colleague, the hon. Minister of Education, and see if the advisory committee on university affairs can not do something about this immediately.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister mentioned nine areas of study and I paid particular attention and noticed that he did not mention the Windsor area at all. Is there a reason why not?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I am sure the hon. member is well aware that this whole question is in the hands of the Ontario municipal board. There was a hearing held recently in connection with matters involving the municipal administration in Windsor, and so I felt it was not necessary to mention Windsor tonight.

Mr. Newman: This is what I wanted to get out of the hon. Minister. Is the hon. Minister prepared at this time to make any recommendations concerning the—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The Minister does not happen to be a member of the Ontario municipal board.

Mr. Newman: Can we discuss the annexation problem at this time or under the Ontario municipal board?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I think it had better be discussed under the municipal board.

Mr. Newman: I have another problem to bring up, and that is concerning the grants to mining municipalities.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: If the hon. member does not mind, perhaps I could lead the organization for a while instead of skipping all over the country as we did this afternoon. The hon. member for Yorkview had something that he wished to ask and I would be glad to hear his question.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, in connection with the studies, there is one further matter about which I would like to ask the hon. Minister, and that is what has been going on in the department lately regarding the five per cent land for municipal purposes. As the hon. Minister knows, this is becoming a vexing problem in areas which are now going into the air. Five per cent perhaps was enough for parks and municipal purposes during the days of urban sprawl, when we built the strawberry boxes end on end out into the country. When five per cent land was taken, if it was taken in the proper places, where children could play, it was adequate for the purpose. But today as we are building more and more apartment complexes and people are being more and more constricted into smaller and smaller spaces, then this five per cent land is completely unrealistic because there just is not enough of it.

I know in some municipalities an attempt is being made to get green space between the buildings, and to get a standard which is high enough so that a lot of green space is within the complex of buildings itself. In other municipalities, some of the standards have gone by the boards and in an attempt to get assessment, high density is allowed and the ratio of floor space to ground space goes up and up. In these circumstances it seems to me there is a duty upon the hon. Minister and upon his department to give some real leadership before this problem becomes too vexed and out of hand. The standard which has been adopted is something like 2.5 acres per thousand of population, plus of course added green space for family use. I do not think we need to go into the figures here tonight.

The hon. Minister knows those figures and I think the time is here where in some areas in Ontario we are facing this problem in a desperate measure. As the population increases, as it is increasing and will increase in the days to come, then this problem becomes one which we just have to face.

Has the hon. Minister underway any investigation or any plan by which this problem can be solved?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, this question is not only of the five per cent land, but there are other questions of a similar or relevant nature. For instance, the size of building lots, or dwelling building lots and other matters that are related to this, are under study at the present time and have been for some time. I know that some of the people in my department are having a look at this very situation that you mention because we are well aware of it. There are some complications that arise in providing open space and so on and so forth, when you consider some of the areas that are in need of open space are the older areas of the various municipalities, and we cannot do too much about that.

I am just reminded of the page in my book where this information is given. For instance, we have an item in our budget this year, under "Provision to assist in planning functions"—item 17. So that there again you are away ahead of me. This amount is required for consultants and possible research into a number of things and subjects related to what you have mentioned, including canal subdivisions. I suppose a resident of Metro would hardly know what we are talking about but there are areas of the province where there is proposed development along canals and on parts of marinas and so on.

Mr. Young: Like Florida!

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Yes. We have not got the answers for that, and neither has anyone else.

Another area that is going to be studied is the effect of noise from arterial highways and railways on urban conditions—minimum lot sizes and things of that kind. That is all mentioned in our vote 17, and that work will be undertaken by the staff people with the help of some consultants. I think that gives you some indication that we are not unaware of this situation.

If I may go on to the next item, number 5—"development grants in unorganized territory." You will remember, Mr. Chairman, and hon. members of the House, that as of January 1, 1964, the two municipalities of Kapuskasing and Val Albert were amalgamated, and annexed to what was an area known as Brunetville and another area of unorganized territories. There is in this vote of $150,000, an item of $90,000 which is to provide financial assistance to the new municipality. Then there are other items, making up the difference of $60,000, to cover other areas in the north country which will require some assistance in the way of development grants. There is a community just outside the boundaries of the town of Hearst. There is the town site of Moosonee, where we have spent a considerable amount of money over the last few years—and again this year we have an item in our budget of $25,000 for improvements. Last year we spent about $20,000, and the year before about $22,000, to improve the streets and the drainage in Moosonee. We have an item of $25,000 in the budget this year.

Then the Timagami area, because of the development of an iron mine near the town of Timagami, is another area where we will perhaps be faced with some studies and development expenditures to meet the problems of this little hamlet in regard to the development of the iron ore property. So we have this item of $150,000. Last year this was included under number 17—part of it was—so this is a new vote this year.

The grant to the community planning association of Canada, Ontario branch, is the usual grant to that organization, which co-operates and works very closely with us in planning matters. The grants to municipal associations are the usual things: Item 8 is the share of bounty for the destruction of foxes; number 9 is the item relating to the payment to municipalities for properties owned and occupied by the Ontario government offices and, also, payment in lieu of taxes for Crown-owned and tenant-occupied properties. That is paid to a large number of municipalities throughout the province.

The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville wished to ask a question about payments to mining municipalities. That is item 10, so this is the time.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, before I ask that question: The hon. Minister went over these various other votes so quickly that I did not have a chance to ask him under investigations, and that was item 4. Is the department undertaking any type of study as to the effects on municipal taxation of the granting of, say, up to a $2,000 exemption from the assessment to senior citizens?

I notice that the state of Michigan is now seriously considering helping senior citizens. They are proposing legislation to exempt, from payment of property taxes, the first $2,500 of assessment on an equalized value. Are there any studies being undertaken by the department here on a problem like this?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I am pleased to say that this is one of the matters which I have personally studied; not that I was prompted to it by anything being done in Michigan or anywhere else. But it is a very involved situation and, oftentimes, matters of this kind of a subsidy end up by subsidizing the people who are really not in need of a subsidy, so it has some complications. However, I have prepared a report which I am going to file with the government one of these days, and I will have to be guided by the recommendations that I receive from the government in this connection. But it is not a matter about which I am unaware.

Mr. Newman: Thank you, Mr. Minister. In the state of Michigan they plan on doing that on an extremely broad basis; or the studies, rather, are on an extremely broad basis. They would give up to an $87 average tax exemption to approximately 180,000 homeowners. Be that as it may, we will get to item No. 10, and that is "grants or payments to mining municipalities."

Just outside the city of Windsor we have a town called Ojibway with a total population of six. In looking over the municipal directory I find that it is the smallest town in the province of Ontario. Yet, on the same token, you have a grant to the municipality, a mining grant, of $40,725.16. With a population of six, if you were to spread that around, it would be approximately $7,000 apiece. Would the hon. Minister explain how he arrived at a grant of this amount to a mining municipality when the population is only six?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Actually, we do not arrive at a grant at all. The use of the word "grant" there is really not correct because this amount is based on the profits of the mine, which is a salt mine, located within that municipality.

We must bear in mind that this municipality, as part of the county organization, has to bear its share of county costs; and the county cost would not in any way relate to the cost of municipal services for six people. So that whether—

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Gold toilets!

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Gold dust.

An hon. member: "Goldfinger."

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Oh, "Goldfinger." Well, they say that that car the fellow had in that movie cost $35,000; there would just be about enough to buy it and put some ammunition in those machine guns.

However, the amount here is the amount certified to us by the mines assessor, who is an employee of The Department of Mines, and it is based on profits of the mining company in that municipality. If you would like, I would be glad to get you the auditor's report, or a copy of it, for the town of Ojibway, to see where the money did go.

Mr. Newman: If you do have it in a publication, I would like you to refer to the publication; if you do not, I would appreciate the report. They have here a mayor, a clerk, an assessment commissioner, an engineer, a roads superintendent—none of the four people lives actually in the town or is among the total population of six. If these people lived in the town you would have only two others.

Another question on this, Mr. Chairman, is that their assessment for 1964 was $1 million taxable. Now exempt is $400,000. Is that ratio, one to the other, not high?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: It is very high and I think upon examination we would find that the $400,000 exempt is probably the mining property. That is not taxable under The Assessment Act but is taxable under The Mining Tax Act.

Mr. Newman: Thank you.

Mr. Singer: Item No. 8 I think was kind of skipped by—that is the bounty on foxes.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Yes.

Mr. Singer: I saw that one, and a few questions occurred to me. I was very interested that this Minister has $12,000 to pay as share of bounties for the destruction of foxes. I was wondering why the fox bounties are distributed by this department and the wolf bounties by the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts). It occurred to me that perhaps after great study it has been determined that the foxes live in the municipalities and the wolves live in the forests. I thought there must be some logic in this, but—

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): It represents a difference of approach of the two Ministers.

Mr. Singer: I am sure the hon. Minister will be able to tell us his urban wildlife policy and why he should pick particularly on foxes. Of the $12,000 in bounties, is this solely a provincial share or is there a municipal share that goes along with it?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: There is a municipal share and the reason that it is paid out of this department is that the—

Mr. Singer: I have just a couple more here.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Yes, if I may perhaps just give the hon. member the answer to that now. The municipality has to pass a bylaw providing that it will pay at least $4 on every fox that is turned in to the municipality; and they pay our $2 and send us a bill at the end of the year. It runs about $12,000 a year. It is a municipal function.

Mr. Singer: Yes. Then delving into this question a little further, I discovered that in 1963-64 there were some $10,068 paid to the counties; and Hastings county seemed to rank away up at the top, $2,420 went to Hastings county. The next highest payment went to Renfrew county, they only got $890.

I was wondering if the hon. Minister had any idea why there was a great plague of foxes in Hastings county and why they did not have too many of them in Renfrew or some of the other counties.

Actually we would like to know what the hon. Minister's wildlife policy is and how he proceeds along the lines of preparing this particular estimate.

Mr. MacDonald: No personal questions.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: There are probably better hunters in Hastings county than there are in Renfrew county, and I would suggest that there are probably more chickens in Hastings that attract foxes than there are in Renfrew.

Mr. Singer: But what about the wildlife policy?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That is the extent of my wildlife operations at the present time.

Mr. Bryden: That is the extent to which you talk about it.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, I would like to get away from this wildlife and back to the matter of grants paid to mining municipalities.

After the great outburst of oratory this afternoon on the part of the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha), I was reminded of an item in the brief of the united steelworkers to the mining committee last fall. I wish he were here because I would like to remind him of it.

It points out certain facts, purported to be facts at least and likely are facts, that northern Ontario, where most of the province's mines are located, is very much like a colony of the south. These were sentiments echoed by the hon. member this afternoon:

Old Cobalters are fond of saying that the wealth that once made Cobalt the world's richest silver mining camp is now in the head office at Bay and King streets or the smart homes of Bayview Avenue. Wherever it is, there is no sign of it in Cobalt.

Like most colonial countries, northern Ontario has been a source of raw material for the mother country. It is characterized by one-industry towns, towns whose main commercial links are not with one another but with Toronto.

Northern Ontario is underdeveloped. We feel it requires the same remedies applied in underdeveloped nations, including economic diversification where possible and at least a bigger share of the wealth it produces.

One of the facts we have to recognize in dealing with the mining communities is that while there is some justification for the policy that has been carried on over many years, part of that justification has disappeared. Certainly the mining industry is not over-taxed today or in any kind of delicate health. The largest part of the industry stands on a firm financial base and the senior companies are expanding their share of the total of exploration activities. And the brief says this:

The mining companies themselves are diversifying both in investments and corporate structure. The tendencies now are towards vertical integration wherever possible and practicable. The vertically integrated company, through ownership or part ownership of areas refining, fabricating, research and sales organizations, at home and overseas, becomes more than a simple mining concern. Typical examples are Preston, Inco, Hollinger and Noranda.

And so companies are able to stabilize their earnings by horizontal expansion, acquiring holdings in other mining concerns which are exploring different minerals. This provides protection against downward price movement for any one metal. Senior companies with expensive and well-organized exploration programmes map out new ore bodies as quickly as they exhaust others. And even more quickly in most cases.

So the old philosophy of the exhaustion of ore reserves and the necessity of handling many of these communities on the old basis no longer exists.

Each year the senior companies become more like manufacturing giants in that they cease to depend on the depleting resources of a single mine. They have the added advantage of large tax concessions and the fact that their products are basic materials not subject to the whims of fashion or the threat of obsolescence.

With these facts in mind we have to recognize what the hon. member for Sudbury said, that the people who work and who live in the mining community have the right to all the amenities of urban living that we take for granted in other areas. So it is that we ought to look into the situation again and realize that the methods that we have been using may be obsolete and need to be replaced.

What has developed in the mining community is, in fact, a system which limits the obligations and responsibilities of a mine and the provincial government, and therefore places no limitations on the burden that the individual taxpayers may be required to bear, either in the form of high taxes or reduced services.

I know that certain adjustments take place as urban demands increase. We heard this afternoon about the problem in Sudbury. The hon. Minister told us how the installation of water pipes and the installation of sewer pipes cost very much more through the terrain in Sudbury than through the terrain in Etobicoke. But the fact is that the terrain in Etobicoke, while it is much cheaper to dig through, does not contain the valuable metals that the terrain in Sudbury bears.

It seems to be a logical thing that when you push tunnels through the ground in the streets of Sudbury and put in those tunnels certain pipes, that what we take out of the tunnels down into International Nickel should, in effect, help to pay for what we put into those street tunnels—the water pipes and the sewer pipes, and the other services.

So we face the fact that a company like International Nickel, which has been paying clear profits in American funds down in New York—as Gordon Sinclair is so happy to remind us constantly—at $100 million a year over the last few years—

Mr. MacDonald: It was $135 million profit after taxes this year!

Mr. Young: It was $105 million this year?

Mr. MacDonald: It was $135 million!

Mr. Young: It has been around the $100 million level for some years and now it is much higher than that.

There is no reason why out of that profit, which comes from the terrain of Sudbury, far more should not go back into that terrain to instal services and to make life much better for the people who have to dig that metal out of the ground.

Mr. Singer: The hon. member for Sudbury said that for an hour and a half this afternoon.

Mr. Young: He said it, but I am reiterating it. I say it again, and perhaps impress on this government that some changes ought to be taking place.

Now for some years, as the hon. member said this afternoon, there has been an attempt to get some sort of amalgamation. But that amalgamation has been frustrated; I presume by the power of certain interests within that area, interests that are very comfortable at the present time under present circumstances.

We recognize that the metal under the ground in Sudbury and in other mining areas is a provincial asset and some of the income from those mines should certainly go to help pay certain provincial responsibilities. But far more of it should go to help make life more liveable for the people in those areas. Some sort of reorganization seems indicated, so that we bring those municipalities together—the municipalities in which the mines and the smelters and all these works are located, along with the municipalities where the people live—into regional governments.

Again we come back to the problem of setting up rational governments on a regional basis. When that is done, then these great wealth producers in those regional governments should bear their fair share of municipal taxation.

At the present time, through the grants, an attempt is made to achieve something of this nature. But there is no doubt that the whole history of the north shows, all too clearly, that one thing is needed and that is for this department and for this government to bring pressure to bear so that these things can happen.

It is all right for these municipalities to come down and make representations to the government. But behind the scenes powerful interests are able to frustrate the will of the people in those areas, or at least the majority of the people. So it seems to me that it is up to this government to set out the policies, to delineate the kind of regional government that should be set up and the kind of responsibilities that these wealth producers should assume for those people who produce their wealth, as well as for the province at large. Then this government should take steps to see that these plans are implemented and that they are not frustrated by the interests that are today frustrating them.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, I have given an answer to the hon. member for Sudbury, and if I were to give an answer to the hon. member for Yorkview I would give him the same answer. Let me assure you that I am very much impressed with the representations that both hon. members have made, and with those of the united steelworkers and the city of Sudbury, and all these—

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): And the one the newspaper made as well.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: And the one the newspaper made as well.

Mr. MacDonald: When are you going to be impressed—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, I am dealing with item number 11, if the hon. member does not mind, which is "Payments toward the cost of county and district assessors and assessment commissioners." The amount of $335,000 in the estimate this year is a considerable increase over the estimate last year to indicate the interest that we have in promoting better assessment practices and better assessors in the province of Ontario. I have increased this budget this year by $245,000 which is almost four times what it was during the current fiscal year. I recommend this to you, and mention it specifically and especially to indicate that we are really trying to do a job in improving the assessment methods and practices in this province.

The next items are pretty well statutory items, sir—

Mr. Bukator: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question on item No. 11? I was going through the public accounts, page N-36, 1964, and I find that the amount of $1,500 is being paid to county assessors to encourage them—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I have changed all that!

Mr. Bukator: I have 1963 and 1964. This is 1963 here; I am looking at public accounts 1964.

An hon. member: Those are expenditures for 1963.

Mr. Singer: The fiscal year ending March 31, 1964—

Mr. Bukator: I realize that. As a matter of fact I could have read the fiscal year ending March 31, but the point I am trying to make is that many counties have received $1,500 for their county assessors, except one; and that is Lincoln county. They picked up $9,137. I am wondering—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The difference is between the county assessor and the county assessment commissioner. The county assessment commissioner is in charge of all the assessments for all the municipalities in the county, whereas the assessor is an advisor, Mr. Chairman.

In the case of a county assessor we only pay a grant of $1,500. We do not think that is very good. We want the assessment under a county assessment commissioner, and there we have three kinds of financial assistance: A share of the salaries, cost of supplies and office equipment; and we also will subsidize the expenditures for the use of data processing equipment.

We think that with the type of data processing equipment which is available today the municipalities in the county should get very good value from using data processing equipment. It could be used not only for purposes of preparing assessment rolls and assessment notices and so on, it could also be used for other municipal purposes such as the preparation of the tax demands and other statistical information which could be made readily available by using data processing equipment. The item has been increased considerably over last year.

Mr. Bukator: I would like to pursue this a bit further. When you have a county assessor, as you put it, is he not supervisor over the assessors in the municipalities in that county?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: He is available for advice to the local assessor.

Mr. Bukator: The assessment commissioner that you speak of in Lincoln county, just what does he do that warrants additional grants that the county assessor does not do?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: He is in charge of all the assessment of all the municipalities in the county. He has one assessment department for all the municipalities in the county. We are trying to promote that in order that the ratepayers get a more equitable assessment and that there will be better trained people in the field of municipal assessment. There will be guaranteed, as it were, career employment. We assist them financially to a greater extent in order to promote assessment in that way.

Mr. Bukator: Is all the administration done from the city out of which this man works instead of the municipalities as they do now? Is this a new departure, too?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: No, the assessment commissioner may have his office anywhere. He could have his office in Toronto. It does not necessarily have to be in the county, although it is desirable that it should be, of course. He has a staff and he is in charge of all the staff of assessors working within that county. He indicates where his staff are to work, which municipality they go to work in next week, or the week after, whatever it is.

Mr. Bukator: I realize that.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: It works very satisfactorily.

Mr. Bukator: It is most interesting, because really I have never heard of this before; so you see I am behind in some areas, too. But is this the only one you have in the province doing this?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: No, there is provision here for nine counties which now have their assessment under a commissioner. Bruce county—may I name them?

Mr. Singer: Do you have nine now?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Yes; Bruce county, Waterloo, Renfrew, Hastings, Kent, Lincoln, York, Prince Edward, then the district of Cochrane. We have quite a considerable number of counties on the verge of coming into this and you may be interested in the list of these counties: Peterborough, Victoria, Essex, Simcoe, Lambton, Peel, Stormont, Glengarry, district of Kenora, district of Sudbury, Muskoka; and so we have made provision in our budget. The county of Ontario, I understand, is studying it but they have not got to a point where—

An hon. member: It is on the verge.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: It is on the verge, is it? It is that close? Well, we hope that will occur also.

Mr. Singer: The hon. Minister's key phrase is: "What we want is county assessment commissioners."

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That is right and in two years—

Mr. Singer: Why are you not brave enough to take the step and do it, instead of coaxing it along and perhaps eventually getting a better system? There is no doubt in anybody's mind that it is—

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): You do not understand—

Mr. Singer: Oh, nonsense! How about a little bravery? How about a little initiative? They are coming like the rest of the things are coming, because you drag your feet and dig your heels in and it is awfully hard to make progress.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. Minister of Health is teetering; he has confessed it himself.

Now we are back to assessment, Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might ask the hon. Minister a question or raise with him a point that rather intrigued me?

In the Sault Ste. Marie Star for March 1, when the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests travelled through that area, there is a story from Serpent River indicating—I am quoting:

Reassessment of lands in the area along Highway 17 east, between Walford and Algoma Mills, will begin at once, Hon. A. Kelso Roberts, Minister of Ontario Department of Lands and Forests, said here Saturday night.

And later it says that the areas affected include the communities of Walford, Spanish, Cutler, Serpent River, Spragge, and Algoma Mills, and a particular reference to Elliot Lake. The comment was that the assessment in these areas, in Elliot Lake particularly, was on the basis of a boom economy; now the economy had slipped into a depressed condition, the assessments were too high, and therefore the tax burden was too high.

I was a bit curious, Mr. Chairman, about why the hon. Minister had to go through—particularly the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests—unorganized territory, why he had to go through and make an announcement of reassessing in this way. Would there not be automatic reassessment in an area like this which had become a depressed area, so that levels would be brought down to something closer to real values?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the hon. member's question, I think we are dealing with two different authorities. The municipality of Elliot Lake is an incorporated municipality and it has its own assessment department. I know there have been some arguments in connection with the assessment made in 1964 and I think that those things are being straightened out. Really, it does not matter very much whether you assess property in an individual municipality in terms of dollars and cents or bags of potatoes, as long as it is equitable between one taxpayer and another.

In the case of the areas along Highway 17—you mention Spanish and a number of others, Walford, and so on.

Mr. MacDonald: Spragge, Serpent River, Algoma Mills, Cutler.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I do not think there is any municipal organization in those hamlets, so The Department of Lands and Forests would be assessing under The Provincial Land Tax Act. There, of course, the assessor, or The Department of Lands and Forests, assesses only once every three years. I think that probably what the hon. Minister had said was brought to his attention was that perhaps some of the assessments made by his department are too high, considering today's values. Then, of course, his territory is all the unorganized territories in Ontario; so my contention as to equity would not apply equally in the case of these hamlets along Highway 17. I think that is the answer to your question, sir.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, no one has mentioned yet, in the mining areas—the area of Wawa. I think the symbol there is probably a good example of what is happening to our mining towns.

A brief was presented to the mining committee regarding the payment of grants to municipalities. As you very well know, the Algoma Ore Properties Limited are there; and this brief from the municipalities was presented by the reeve of Michipicoten township. Since briefs have been read here, and other documents have been also, I am claiming the privilege of submitting this one:

The corporation of the township of Michipicoten wishes to file a brief protesting the illogical and unfair means by which the government of Ontario obtains its revenue from mining tax in northern Ontario and, returning part of that tax revenue to the municipalities by the way of grants—

First, let me say this brief was presented to the select committee on mining. Again I am not on that committee, but I have this brief:

—is or should be concerned with the economic growth of our province and more particularly the development of northern Ontario. It is common knowledge that northern Ontario is rich in mineral wealth and resources and that to develop these resources requires capital together with a pioneering spirit and imagination. It would appear that in the community of Wawa we have a prime example of the development of mining communities and the opening up of the mining resources of the north. It is a community of approximately 4,800 people, whose welfare is dependent on the mining and the processing of iron ore. The majority of the people living in Wawa are directly engaged in mining, with the exception of a few supplying the necessary services to maintain the town.

Now Wawa is sustained by the Algoma Ore Properties Limited, a mining company which is a division of one of the great giants of the steel industry of Canada, Algoma Steel Corporation.

This mine has on its property a sinter plant for the processing of iron ore extracted from its mine. This plant, and any properties connected therewith, is non-assessable by the corporation of the township of Michipicoten. Having been in Wawa, there is a railway which runs along, not very far, but it goes to three different mines—or they are considered as three different operations. Instead, the Ontario government, under The Mining Tax Act, claims for its purse the revenue through taxation which legally should be a part of the municipality's assessment.

To illustrate this point, the township received, during the year 1964, mining grants totalling $130,000. This represents the assessment of approximately $1.9 million, whereas the assessment should be in the vicinity of $8 million to $10 million, which in turn would give an added revenue of between $560,000 and $600,000. This point may be further illustrated if we show a comparable set of figures for towns in the immediate vicinity, and the assessment arrived therefrom. And it mentions these towns, shows the population and assessment:

Michipicoten township, 4,800—assessment, $4,845,000; Marathon, which is farther west, has 2,724—assessment is $7,713,000; Terrace Bay, 1,946 people—assessment, $5,716,000; Red Rock, 1,861 persons—its assessment, $8,130,000; Kapuskasing, its population 11,000—and its assessment, $15 million; Iroquois Falls, 1,694 people, and $7,662 assessment.

In all those places that I have mentioned, outside of Michipicoten, the major industry is pulp and paper and the municipalities are able, and have the right, to assess and derive added income from these industries because they are pulp and paper and not mining industries.

So in conclusion the reeve representing his township points out as a result of these pitiful mining grants from the provincial government, the residents of the township of Michipicoten are faced with an added taxation burden to develop their towns, build their schools and supply adequate services such as streets and roads. "It would seem," said the reeve, "to be more equitable to the municipalities for the government to eliminate the mining tax altogether and permit the municipalities to assess these industries and derive added income."

To supplement this brief, I was talking to one of the superintendents of the Great Lakes Power that services Sault Ste. Marie, who pay a very heavy tax and also for every gallon of water they use—they have four plants along the Montreal River—and for all the water they take out they have to pay at each one of these plants. While I do not think their properties have the assessment that could compare with the mining properties of Algoma Ore, nevertheless they pay a very, very heavy tax.

I repeat, "It would seem to be more equitable to the municipalities for the government to eliminate the mining tax and permit the municipalities to assess these industries and thus derive added income."

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, that suggestion was studied years ago and it just has not any application here at all.

Mr. Troy: Has it not?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Because here is what happens. Now I will take Timmins, an area which I know rather well—

Mr. Troy: You should.

Hon. Mr. Spooner:—and there is a mining operation that has been going on for several years; it is located 18 or 20 miles west of the town. No one lives there; the people who work on that mining property, which is located in unorganized territory, live in the town of Timmins. Now through the system that we have developed of paying mining revenue payments, the town of Timmins is receiving grants for the miners who are working at that particular property.

If you wanted to compare the situation with another municipality comparable in size and amount of assessment with Wawa, I would suggest that probably the town of New Liskeard is about as comparable as any I can think of offhand. It so happens that the assessment in the town of New Liskeard is just about the same as the assessment in the municipality of Wawa, which is the township of Michipicoten, plus the $130,000 of mining revenue payments which the municipality gets converted into assessment—a little better than $6 million assessment. The population is the same within 50 people.

The town of New Liskeard has the same population, the same assessment and it has no mines within a considerable distance. It is surrounded by a very fine agricultural area. The town of New Liskeard ratepayers do not assess the farm lands, that is their local industry; it is not located within the boundaries of their municipality, but if they have miners working in the mines in Cobalt—and Cobalt is going through quite a period of rejuvenation, because of the increase in the price of silver some years ago—the miners living in the community of New Liskeard are entitled to receive mining revenue payments.

The advantage to the system that we now have—and I am not arguing that it is sufficient money because I know that everybody wants to pay less taxes than we pay and we want to get more money from the province or some other tax collector than we want to collect from our own people—I am not saying that the amount of money that we pay per miner and so on in mining revenue payments is the end to end all. I am not saying that at all, I gave an explanation this afternoon of what the government's thinking was in respect to this matter and I think that will have to stand. But this suggestion that the municipalities should assess the mining industry was examined very closely, let me assure you, years ago.

I have been involved with this myself almost for years, and I must say that the system that we have developed through mining revenue payments is the most logical, and the most useful to the municipalities that are providing the municipal services to the men who work in the mines, wherever the mines are located.

Mr. D. A. Paterson (Essex South): Mr. Chairman, I would like to get back to the point of assessors. May I ask the hon. Minister, is there a compulsory retirement age for county commissioners of assessment?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: At the present time there is no compulsory retirement age unless it is governed by the county council, and in many cases municipalities do have pension bylaws and pension plans that require retirement at a certain age. Of course, under the municipal employees' retirement system there is a retirement age, so I would think that, by and large, you could accept it that there is a compulsory retirement age.

Mr. Paterson: Might I ask under the nine counties that do have a county commissioner; would all be using the new provincial manual on assessment?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I could not guarantee that at the present time they are all using the new assessment manual, but it certainly is our intention that they shall, in due course of time. Remember when an assessment commissioner begins to work there are other things that must be done, not the figures, but the assessment practices, to bring the assessment practices into a modern and efficient routine; and I think that we have to give these people time to get the office work properly set up and then to do the field work and the reassessment and that may take anywhere from two to five years in almost any county.

Mr. Paterson: Does the hon. Minister have any indication on how the other counties, that are on the verge of coming in, are accepting the new manual? Are various municipalities putting it in?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: No, I cannot tell you that offhand but we certainly want to see that for all assessments in the province eventually, and within the very near future—using a few years as being the very near future—they would be using the new assessment manual and the guide.

Mr. Paterson: Fine!

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): Mr. Chairman, under item 12 of this vote, The Drainage Act, an Act which has done an excellent job in this province. I wonder, Mr. Chairman, could an Indian council on a reservation make use of this Act?

I ask this because in my riding we have the Moravian Indian reservation and I might say a lot of that land is certainly in need of drainage. The other night, quite a few hon. members had a great deal to say about the Indians being the first Canadians. I have been approached many times by different Indians and if they could make use of this Act it would certainly assist them and it would help to supplement their income. I, myself, think that if the Indians could make use of this Act, it would certainly improve conditions on these reservations or on this particular reservation in my area.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, Mr. Chairman, in answer to the hon. member's question regarding the use of The Drainage Act for services in Indian reservations, I presume that what he is talking about is an Indian reservation established as a reservation and not part of a municipality?

Mr. Spence: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: At the present time, as I understand it—and I do not have a copy of The Drainage Act available but will check it—the grants would not be available. So if the hon. member has some areas where he could get a request that these grants should be made available to Indian bands or Indian councils or reservations, I certainly would be very pleased to give the matter consideration. It has not been brought to my attention before; I was unaware of the situation.

Where other instances have come about, where our legislation did not provide grants for Indian bands let alone Indian reservations, we did something. We amended our legislation to provide that those people would be treated in exactly the same way as any other residents of the province. You may know that there is a bill on the order paper now, an amendment to The Confederation Centennial Act, to correct this situation. So if the hon. member would bring this particular matter to my attention I would be glad to look at it.

Mr. Spence: I appreciate the remarks of the hon. Minister, Mr. Chairman, and I will contact the Indian council and see if it would start action.

Mr. Troy: The hon. Minister some time ago announced that there would be some towns, and a large number of townships including Temagami in a controlled area. I noticed advertisements recently naming the townships. Then again, when the Adams mine was being developed, I understood the miners, those who work there, would have to live in areas already established. Has the department reached any stage of negotiations with the people of Temagami regarding the possibility that it may be able to take advantage of the Dofasco mine or rather the Sherman mine when it is in production? Or are the miners going to New Liskeard, and those other towns which are already established and have the services?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, Mr. Chairman, in answer to that particular question, some time ago, realizing that there was to be a very important mineral development in the Temagami area, it was thought desirable, in order to prevent the building of shack towns in that general area, that the Minister of Municipal Affairs impose a subdivision control order. That was done, and the order has been advertised as widely as required by the Act.

At the present time, there are several communities, three or four that I could mention, organized municipalities, five perhaps, within commuting distance of this mining property. I refer to the town of Latchford, the town of Cobalt, the township of Coleman, the township of Bucke, the town of Haileybury, the town of New Liskeard, and there are several other townships in that area also.

The tri-towns—Cobalt, Haileybury, New Liskeard—have been established for many years and have many municipal services available. Within the boundaries of those communities, there is available, I am told, land for the building of homes. No doubt a great number of the men who will be working at this new property near Temagami will be residents of that general local area. So I think, at the moment, because of the fact that Temagami is not incorporated, has no municipal services, and until recently showed very little evidence of having any interest in municipal organization, that it is desirable that there should be a subdivision control order on this whole area so that no shack towns will be built.

Temagami residents have recently circulated a petition to the Ontario municipal board for incorporation of the area of the village of Temagami as an improvement district. In due course of time the municipal board will hold a hearing and determine whether or not there should be some form of municipal organization for that general area. That, if granted, would appear to be the beginning of the improvement of the amenities, if I may call it that, of the Temagami area. I am quite convinced that, unless there is municipal organization, there is no possibility of development taking place in an orderly fashion; so, for that reason, this order is going to stay until such time as we are able to determine whether or not the area will be prepared to accept the responsibilities of municipal government and all of those other responsibilities inherent in the formation of a municipal corporation.

It will be some time, of course, before this mining property is in production. It is necessary for the Ontario Northland Railway to build a railway spur line into the mining property and I think there is plenty of time for all of these things to take place gradually, these events which will bring the greatest benefit to the communities in the general area of the tri-towns: Latchford, Temagami, and so on.

Mr. Troy: I thank the hon. Minister and I agree it is very wise not to allow shack towns. We have too many of them up there in our northern area. But, since Nipissing is already in the federal riding of Nipissing, the electoral riding, and since, if this redistribution bill goes through, Temagami will be in the electoral riding of Nipissing, naturally the member for Nipissing has to be concerned, a little more concerned even than before, with that area. And just as the hon. Minister has great concern, he wants to see to it, if at all possible, that with the mineral wealth in the Porcupine area and the Timmins area as many as possible of the people in that area have an opportunity of increasing their income. So you cannot blame the people of Temagami for being concerned, too.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I did not blame anybody.

Mr. Troy: I know the hon. Minister did not.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Do not suggest that I am blaming anyone.

Mr. Troy: I know the hon. Minister did not.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, do not use that term.

Mr. Troy: I am not saying that, but you can understand, being an understanding gentleman, that they are concerned.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, then, by the same token they must understand that I have certain responsibilities and that I have no alternative. But the hon. member can rest assured that we will, so far as our department is concerned, attempt to be of the greatest service we possibly can.

Mr. Chairman, we are at No. 15, I believe—no, No. 14—well, 13: The Municipal Unconditional Grants Act, $27.2 million is the statutory payment to the municipalities and the only thing that can be argued there is that it is not enough. I cannot argue with the hon. member on that score.

The next item, Mr. Chairman, is "Payments under the municipal winter works incentive programme." I gave quite a lengthy report last night as to the programme this year.

Mr. Young: What is the terminal date of the programme this year?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The terminal date is April 30. Under certain circumstances, the federal government can extend that one more month, in certain areas. I have just been informed by my adviser that the federal government do not intend to do it.

Mr. Young: It has been extended at various times and I wondered if any action had been taken this year on that.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I am advised by my deputy Minister that the federal government has announced that it does not intend to take any action.

The next item is "Provision for Canada's Centennial"; I gave you some information last night, Mr. Chairman, and now I have a more recent report from my office. This is a report for the week ending Thursday, March 18, which is just a week ago, indicating that we have received, in the department so far, a total of 504 applications for projects commemorating Canada's Centennial. We have a Cabinet sub-committee which studies these projects after they have been examined by the staff people. This committee is headed by the hon. Minister of Tourism and Information (Mr. Auld).

Our committee has, so far, approved 160 projects. After approval here in our office, they are sent on to Ottawa because we require their approval; and there is a slight delay there. Ottawa has approved 120 of the 160 projects we have approved.

The estimated cost of these projects is something reaching $28 million, so we think that with the number of projects coming into our office, from time to time, there will be a sufficient number of memorials and centennial celebrations to properly mark our 100th birthday when it arrives.

"Municipal schools" is a usual item: and I have already discussed with you "Provision to assist in planning functions"—that is item number 17.

The next item is "Redevelopment grants in aid of acquisition and clearance of redevelopment areas, as may be approved by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council"—$3,008,000.

Mr. Newman: That is up $2.5 million, is it not?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Yes, it is up a lot because of the change in the legislation which I recommended, which was passed by the Legislature in the 1964 session, and which was passed in anticipation of an amendment to The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and The National Housing Act in Ottawa—which came about sometime in June or July of last year. That was increased, from a budget of $500,000 in the present fiscal year, to $3,008,000 for the coming fiscal year.

Redevelopment projects under way at the present time—and I may as well list them: There is Toronto's Moss Park; there are two stages in the Windsor project; Ottawa's Preston Street; Toronto's Alexandra Park; Hamilton's North End; Kingston's Rideau Heights; Midland's Olive Street; Sudbury's Borgia Street; Sault Ste. Marie's waterfront. They account for an appropriation of $2,208,000.

We have a provincial contribution to Hamilton's downtown York Street—that is an urban renewal project. And we have another 14 areas where we have, in total, appropriated $100,000—I do not think that I have the list of the 14 areas here, no, I do not happen to have it—but that is for the study of urban renewal projects. It is the sort of pre-engineering work that is necessary in order to arrive at what will be a development so that we can then proceed to have it approved by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council and also by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation people. I have here the available list of applications pending for urban renewal projects. There are: Nickel Basin, Sudbury; Sault Ste. Marie; Cornwall; Eastview; London; Ottawa; Peterborough; Kitchener; Niagara Falls; Galt; Guelph; Mountjoy township; and Toronto — a total cost of $100,000.

We have another item here to deal with a number of other projects which we think may become active this year. These projects are: Queen Street, Toronto, across from the city hall; Market Square in Peterborough; Victoria hospital in London, and so on. We have appropriated $700,000 there.

On the first list of ten projects which I have listed, signed agreements exist, and those projects are under way. In the second group we have agreements signed by the municipalities, and the Treasury board has approved them. The last group of $700,000 are contemplated projects. The Ontario municipal board has approved the Kingston and Sault Ste. Marie projects and there are now draft proposals and submissions to the Treasury board to follow soon for Midland and Sudbury. I think that this year we will see much more activity in the field of urban renewal than we have seen for a long time, because of the fact that the method of financing has been greatly improved over what it was a year ago.

Mr. Bukator: What is the percentage approved by the major government?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: It is 25 per cent municipal, 25 per cent provincial and 50 per cent federal—or to CMHC. Then there are different methods of financing the projects themselves. In some cases the financing I think runs as high as 90 per cent.

Mr. Young: Mr Chairman, I am wondering why, if the hon. Minister has any reason to give to the House, the urban renewal end of it, the land clearing and this sort of thing, is in one department and the actual building of the structure is in the other department?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The actual building is all part of the agreement between ourselves and the municipalities.

Mr. Young: Does The Department of Economics and Development not take over at this point?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Not necessarily, unless they have a project involving the Ontario Housing Corporation in the housing end of it.

Mr. Young: Then, as far as The Department of Municipal Affairs is concerned, the project is carried right through?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Yes.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, there is no time limit on these redevelopment projects, is there?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: No. Mind you, we do not want to get into an agreement with a municipality that is going to take forever and forever because of the cost of administration.

We try to stage it. For instance, in Windsor, we are in stages one and two this year. Some of the projects in Toronto which have been under way for some time are in stages also.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, there is no provision under this vote, is there, for rehabilitation and conservation of properties?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That is all part of the new legislation. An urban renewal project today is concerned with rehabilitation of existing buildings as well as the demolishing and clearing of land for new structures. It is also concerned with the conservation of buildings. With the projects into which we are going now, we want bylaws that will provide maintenance of dwellings.

A year ago we passed legislation under The Planning Act to provide authority to the municipalities to pass bylaws regarding the maintenance of dwellings and their rehabilitation.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, if I may follow up on this: Are there grants available for the rehabilitation or conservation—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: This is all part of the projects.

Mr. Newman: All part of the projects?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Oh, yes.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, could I ask the hon. Minister this through you? The part of section 18 which had me puzzled here says, "Redevelopment grants in aid of acquisition and clearance of redevelopment areas." That is as far as this wording goes. "Acquisition and clearing of the lands"—now then how does the cost of building follow this clearing of the lands?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That is finance then. The cost of buildings is financed through loans through the Central Mortgage and Housing.

Mr. Young: Then there is no cost at all so far as the province is concerned at this point?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: No.

Mr. Young: Yes, that is clear in my mind.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, if I may, I would like to clear this up for my own benefit. If an area is designated as a redevelopment area, or a conservation area, or a rehabilitation area; how does the individual property owner get assistance to meet minimum housing standard bylaws which may be in effect in the community? How can he bring his property up to that minimum standard if he does not have the financial wherewithal?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, that can all be part of the project. It is only upon study that it is determined that this particular property can be rehabilitated and conserved and made to fit in with the whole urban renewal project. Then the project which is under the municipality, with the help of the province and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, has funds available to rehabilitate this property and this owner then is put in the position of having to repay or buy back his property.

We have published quite an interesting publication. As a matter of fact, I received an order today from the community planning association of Canada for 150 copies of our latest booklet on this very subject. If you would like to have a copy of it—

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, this still does not seem to clarify it for me. Apparently I just cannot understand the thing. But I would like to bring to your attention just what has happened in my own community concerning this, and the concern there.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: With all due respect, if I may interrupt you, it may be that what you are discussing now is something that was the situation last year, which of course is now all changed.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, in that case, I will only read the resolution. It is a very short paragraph.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Where does it come from?

Mr. Newman: It is from the city of Windsor and it is dated January 25, 1965. If this is incorrect, then I would like the hon. Minister to correct me on this.

In order to ensure desirable results in conservation and rehabilitation areas the federal and provincial governments be requested to consider ways of providing financial assistance either through grants or long-term, low-interest-rate loans, to property owners who are subjects of minimum standards of housing orders issued by a municipality being actively engaged in an approved urban renewal programme involving conservation and designated rehabilitation areas.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I think, without going into all the implications of an answer for that particular question, that if you were to obtain a copy of our booklet entitled, Urban Renewal in Ontario, you would get the answer for your problem.

Mr. Newman: The answer is included?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I am quite sure you will find it there.

Mr. Newman: May I have sufficient copies sent over to me, then I can send one to each member of council back home.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I do not think that is necessary. I think you will find that each member of council already has that. Certainly the municipality has them.

Mr. Newman: I doubt it very much because this is just a recent resolution by the community.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: How many copies do you want?

Mr. Newman: Eleven.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Eleven copies. You will get them tomorrow.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, there is one more matter I want to bring before the hon. Minister, not related to this particular subject. It is a matter that emanated from the association of mayors and reeves. The hon. Minister has received the resolution and I will read it in full:

Whereas the standard of firefighting equipment in municipalities has advanced whereby practically all municipalities now have an efficient firefighting service maintained at public expense; and whereas collective bargaining has been proposed by a municipality to protect the interests of all municipalities in negotiating wage agreements with employees by providing a central source from which assistance can be obtained by the municipalities; and whereas certain standards must be maintained in the municipalities at the direction of the Ontario fire marshal requiring a higher standard of fire protection; and whereas it appears that a more efficient fire department is not reflected in the substantial reduction of fire insurance rates, especially on municipal properties; and whereas it is the opinion of the council that savings might be effective if fire insurance coverage for all municipally owned buildings could be arranged through a central agency for the entire province for all municipalities having a population between 5,000 and 100,000; and whereas it is possible that a saving in premium might result if all municipal insurance was handled by a central agency; and whereas this central agency should be under the control of member municipalities, be it resolved that the province of Ontario be requested to conduct a survey to determine the feasibility of municipalities obtaining full insurance coverage through a central agency to effect a lowering of all insurance premiums.

This is the amended form that was adopted by the convention and I bring it to the hon. Minister's attention. I presume he has already received this and perhaps has had some thoughts upon it. The figures that are given—populations between 5,000 and 100,000—I think perhaps may be a bit unrealistic. It should go higher than that. My experience has been, in the council on which I sat, that the very threat of self-insurance by that municipality resulted in a substantial lowering of fire insurance and other insurance rates to the municipality. This kind of discussion is a healthy thing, I think.

As far as this resolution is concerned, it declares that the central agency should be under the control of the member municipalities:

Whether this government would go as far as thinking in terms of setting up a co-operative insurance company for all the municipalities across the province, is doubtful. But it may be that the government might go to the extent of exploring the possibility of a combination of insurance companies, which might handle all insurance centrally and thereby effect rather substantial reductions in rates. Certainly the experience of Great Britain and other countries with co-operative insurance in this field has been very good, and it seems to me that this is something that the government could well undertake and give some guidance to the municipalities as the mayors and reeves have asked. I wonder if the hon. Minister would comment on that?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, I am well aware of the resolution. I have met with the executive of the association of mayors and reeves. We have discussed this matter. I have no facilities to conduct a survey such as has been suggested by the resolution. I suggested to the association that this was one of the services that it could well provide to its membership and that it was quite within its authority to conduct such a survey and to discuss this matter with insurance people who would be in a better position to advise the association.

I am only an agent for an insurance company; I do not know how they operate. I think the association was satisfied with that suggestion, because I have not heard from it to the contrary. At the time we met, we had a very pleasant afternoon, discussing the many resolutions that were proposed.

The only trouble I ever got into with one of these associations was when I saw some of the resolutions before some of the delegates saw them at their annual convention. There was great to-do about that. I almost got quartered—I guess that would be the right word to use. However, I got along all right with them after that.

Mr. Young: We heard some words about you—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Yes.

Mr. Young: This government should give leadership.

An hon. member: Where is the self-initiative?

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, before we leave this first vote, I have to confess that as we were skipping round and round I missed the merry-go-round on a couple of points that should come in on the first vote.

May we come back to this question of relief for old-age pensioners and taxes? Could I begin by asking the hon. Minister a question? Does he anticipate that the Smith committee will be considering this and perhaps making some recommendation in connection with it?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I am not sure. I am not in a position to say yes, but I think it is one of the areas the committee may properly examine, because of the involvement of so many citizens who today are in receipt of pensions. In addition we will have the Canada Pension Plan coming into effect before too long. I think the committee may very well have to look at it.

Mr. MacDonald: It is no secret, I am sure, to the hon. Minister that this is an issue that keeps bobbing up all the time, particularly I think in the urban areas, though I suspect it is true all across the province. Usually it is in terms of relief from education taxes, a plea on the part of senior citizens that "we have done our bit in this connection." You can guess the rest of the arguments because they are all rather obvious and quite valid. I was rather interested the other night when I was speaking to a ratepayers' association in my own riding to discover that York township had presented a brief in this connection to the Smith committee and, indeed, that the township had given some consideration to an actual procedure for achieving it. This was a step further than I had run into anywhere else. The suggestion was that any old-age pensioner living in a home that he owned, and with his pension as the chief means of existence, should be able to make representations to the court of revision. The court of revision could, upon examination of the financial circumstances of this family, free the homeowner of the education tax.

My question to the hon. Minister is: Could this be done with the approval of just the township, or would it have to be authorized at a provincial level if the township wanted to go ahead with it?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: At the present time there is legislation now available in which a refund or abatement of taxes in whole or in part can be approved by the court of revision of the local municipality under certain conditions. The terminology used in the Act is not very good because it says taxes may be written off or reduced, or words like that, on account of extreme poverty or sickness. Well, I hope that we might get a recommendation from the special committee studying The Municipal Act and The Assessment Act whereby these words might be changed. It says, among a lot of other reasons for cancellation of taxes:

An application to the court of revision for the cancellation, reduction or refund of taxes levied in the year in respect of which the application is made may be made by any person who is unable to pay taxes because of sickness or extreme poverty.

I think the words "extreme poverty" in this day and age does not sound very good; perhaps that could be amended.

Mr. MacDonald: Is the hon. Minister saying, in effect, that this does give the power now if they—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Oh, yes. And it need not be approved by the municipal council.

Mr. MacDonald: What section of the Act is that?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Section 131 of The Assessment Act. I do not remember the subsection, but the section is 131.

Mr. MacDonald: The other small point that I wanted to raise with the hon. Minister is—a number of municipalities have drawn this problem to my attention—the rather vexing situation of sidewalks being destroyed by trucks during the period of building of apartments. In some instances, municipalities have, when the building permit is given, fixed a certain assessment on a footage basis to meet the cost of the repairing of the sidewalks afterwards. But I have discovered in some instances that this does not meet the total cost and now they are repairing the sidewalks—sometimes under the winter works project—at a general cost to the taxpayers.

Are there any overall regulations? Or, once again, does this rest exclusively in the jurisdiction of the municipality itself?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The contractors certainly have a liability and any municipality replacing sidewalks that have been broken by a contractor and replacing them at public expense should examine the situation, because they should go after the contractor.

Mr. MacDonald: I could introduce the hon. Minister to a few who are in that category.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, I think some of the ratepayers should get in touch with the public works department and just tell that they are not prepared to pay the cost of replacing sidewalks that have been damaged, in the same way in which a citizen damaging some other public property is liable for its repair and replacement.

Mr. MacDonald: I agree.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The same applies there. I think that there may be some improvement that could be made in the attention given to this by the building inspector for the municipality under the building bylaws and certainly the authority is there. It is as plain as day that no citizen, whether he be a building contractor or someone else, has any right to go out and damage public property and not be held responsible for it. A few of them should be sued—see what happens then.

Mr. MacDonald: I shall direct the words of the hon. Minister to some who are interested.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Please do.

Vote 1301 agreed to.

On vote 1302:

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The next item, Mr. Chairman, 1302, deals with the appropriation of funds for the Ontario municipal board.

The board is now composed of a chairman, three vice-chairmen and eight members. They have a complement of 53 persons.

I have heard some complaints about delays in the operations of the board. I must say that I have not, upon investigation, been able to find that delays did take place and that they were the responsibility of the board. I have found this in every instance that has come to my attention. Many of these I have investigated because I have noticed an article in a newspaper where someone was complaining that a certain municipal project had been delayed by the municipal board. Now, if you wish, I have here in my files two actual instances that were investigated and I can quote days and times. I am sure that the board was not responsible for any delays.

I am also assured by the chairman of the municipal board that there is sufficient staff in the board to perform the responsibilities with which the board is charged. This year we have made provision for more and better office accommodation for the board. The Department of Public Works is presently altering a part of the building at 145 Queen Street West, where the board's offices have been located for many years, and that way will provide the board with better facilities for hearing rooms and private offices.

So I would say the board is performing many important functions in the province and it is performing them as expeditiously as possible.

Now we must remember that part of the board's work comes at a flood time; it seems rather strange, but everyone who has a sub-division plan to be approved or zoning by-law amendments sought all want to have it done by April 1, or some other date in the year. The result is that the board tries to sort out its work so that it has a constant amount of work going through for the 12 months of the year. I think that is desirable. It would be very expensive to provide sufficient staff and board members to meet the high peaks of the demands and there would be no work for this larger staff for the lows.

An examination of the cost figures over the years indicates that in 1950 the board's expenditures were some $75,000 and this coming year it is estimated that it will reach the figure which is in the budget here—$438,000.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, in dealing with the municipal board there are two questions I want to direct to the hon. Minister.

Has there been, or is there contemplated that there will be, any study done to re-examine the board's role in a general sort of a way? In connection with the amendment to The Expropriation Procedures Act before the House quite recently, in some of my remarks at that time I suggested that the board was finding itself in a very difficult position when it has to act as arbitrator, having other jobs that it has to do in connection with its role under The Municipal Act and under The Planning Act. There are many other functions that do not seem to me to belong properly within the scope of the board's responsibility. The board has been, over the years, the repository for almost every job that nobody else wants to do. It would seem to me that since the hon. Minister appears to be of a mind to advance municipal procedures in the province, and that since he has apparently commenced on a number of fields of study, that a very good field of study could be the duties and responsibilities of the board.

I will just start with that one.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, I must say, sir, that the board has, over a period of years, accepted many responsibilities, but I think that we should also remember that many responsibilities have been taken away from the board as conditions changed over the years. This board and its predecessor have been active, of course, for many years in this province. It started out originally as the old railway board which decided where railways were going to be constructed. Of course, that function has been eliminated many years ago.

In recent years we have enlarged the board and we have improved the salaries to board members in order to attract full-time people.

Mr. Singer: In order to fill the vacancies.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: And I think that a reasonably good job has been done there. There are some functions now in our Municipal Act and related Acts which I feel, like you do, are not of such importance that they have to be referred to the board. Of course the board has always fulfilled a very important function; it has been an appeal area and that, in government administration, I think, is a very important one.

I think we have to be careful in taking away the rights that citizens have under certain legislation. Though it may not be used very often, they still have that right of appeal to go to the municipal board instead of having to go to the courts. I think we have to be reasonable in that. There is an amendment now before the House, for instance, in connection with The Drainage Act, which will relieve the board of that responsibility. I am not sure whether it is an amendment to The Drainage Act or an order-in-council—it is an order-in-council. We had formerly used the services of the Ontario municipal board as arbitrators under The Drainage Act; I have changed that and made a recommendation—if it has not already been approved, it will be approved, I think, tomorrow at the Cabinet meeting—appointing a judge as the sole arbitrator under The Drainage Act.

As I said before, when we get into the studies of the revisions of the various Acts with which we are concerned, that is one of the things we are going to look at.

Mr. Singer: I was not suggesting at all that the opportunity for appeal be taken away; but I am suggesting that the board has far too many responsibilities and some of them place the board in conflict with itself, particularly the responsibility of adjudicating upon expropriation matters. I think it is obvious, without elaborating on it, that the board can find itself in conflict with itself on many occasions when it has to act in expropriation matters. This gets into the field we discussed under the amendments to The Expropriation Procedures Act, and the recommendations of the select committee that there should be a body within this province that is the final arbitrator on expropriation matters. Similarly, I would think that the board could get itself into real difficulty insofar as appeals on assessments are concerned.

There has been a case before the board just recently, the Sherway matter, which has gone on for just as long as any matter has ever been before the board. I think that this is a matter the hon. Minister should consider very carefully. I have no idea what the board's judgment is going to be, nor do I want to argue on one side or the other. The argument that seems to have been presented has been an economic argument.

It seems to me, from what I have read in the press reports, that the concern of those opposing the decision of the Etobicoke council in this case was that there was going to be too much competition against established business in other municipalities. I have great cause to wonder as to whether or not this should be a responsibility of the Ontario municipal board in a zoning matter. Should the board be called upon to make economic decisions? Because, as I say, as I read in the news reports on the matter, this seemed to be the whole tenor of the argument. Is it feasible, economically, that a large shopping centre should be located in a certain spot in the municipality of Etobicoke?

It may be argued, and I am certain that the arguments were presented, that part of planning is economics; but I just wondered if that is the kind of decision an appointed body, such as the Ontario municipal board, should make. Maybe the government should make that. It may be that the government, having made that kind of decision, should be prepared to bring it before the Legislature. But I have very grave doubts in my mind as to whether or not the board is carrying out its proper function in sitting in judgment in an argument of this kind. I think this is something that deserves very serious consideration by the hon. Minister and by the government.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Chairman, I understand the principle to which the hon. member refers. I think we are going to have to wait. This matter is before the municipal board now. I think we are going to have to wait and see what its judgment is and then those who represent that part of Metropolitan Toronto will be able, and will speak to it—not from some other area.

Mr. Singer: With great respect to the hon. Minister of Labour, if he listened to what I said—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I have listened to you. The principle of an economic basis—

Mr. Singer: I was not arguing about what the decision would be, I was presenting a point in relation to what the responsibility of the board should be. Here is a hearing that has gone on for as long as any hearing apparently has ever gone on before the board. There were 15 to 18 different counsel there, and the board is a busy board, they have a lot of work to do. The argument, as I read it reported in the press, related to economic factors.

My question directed to the hon. Minister, and I think it is a very valid one, is: Should the time of the board be taken up with that kind of an argument? Is that properly their decision? I am not suggesting that they come down on one side or the other. That is their business. But should that properly be something on which this board should adjudicate? This is a very serious matter. I think it deserves very careful consideration, because I have grave doubts in my mind that this does in fact relate to the kind of responsibility which was originally envisaged when the board took on these planning duties.

There is one other point I want to make in connection with the board. The board is a court of appeal and is the court of last resort to which the average citizen can go when he is concerned about planning decisions. Many citizens choose to appear, or are unable to appear in any other way than, personally. They are unable to hire counsel; they are not able to afford it; and very often they are faced with very formidable opposition. Some of the people who make these applications are in the financial position to hire counsel, to hire experts, and so on. So it is very awkward for a citizen who comes before the board to adequately present his case. Nevertheless, it is a court of last resort and, in the many times I have been before that board, the board gives every consideration to an individual who comes before it, listens carefully to his ideas, and helps him.

But one suggestion has come forward which I think bears considerable merit; that is the suggestion that arrangements could and should be made to hold some of these board sittings in the evening. It is difficult enough for the average citizen, who is on his own and wants to go to the board to present his case, to prepare any sort of an argument; but it is very difficult for those citizens who are engaged in a job and who find it impossible to get time off from their positions—to spend a day, or two days, or three days, whatever the time it takes before the board—during the daytime and have to lose that much from their salaries. I wonder if the hon. Minister could take, under very careful consideration, the suggestion that under such circumstances the board could arrange, from time to time, for evening sittings.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That is a matter to which I have given consideration. I have discussed it also with the chairman of the board and, on some occasions when there was a request, the board has held meetings late in the afternoon.

I think that we have to be reasonable in these things. The members of the board are professional people in large part. Anyway the suggestion of the hon. member is a worthy one and I must say that we have already given consideration to it. I know that the chairman of the board is in receipt of Hansard and he will be aware of the suggestions that the hon. member has made this evening.

Mr. Singer: It would perhaps have a little stronger effect if the hon. Minister sort of suggested to him it might be a good idea.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: He has already agreed to that.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence (St. George): Does the hon. member appear before the board as counsel?

Mr. Singer: Yes. The hon. Minister of Labour used to appear before the transport board.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Never, not in my practice.

Mr. Singer: The hon. Minister was there when he was a private member.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That is absolutely a falsehood. I never appeared before any transport board except once in Ottawa 15 years ago; my practice was before the transport board in Ottawa, not the provincial board. I only made, in my own practice, one appearance before the transport board.

Mr. Singer: Well, I said you were there and you now say you were there.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Long before I was a member at a sitting in Ottawa.

I think the hon. member might want to retract his inference and his statement.

Mr. Singer: If I was wrong, I retract it.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That is fine. Let us not have it happen again.

Mr. Young: If this argument is now settled, Mr. Chairman, perhaps I can make an observation.

Last evening I brought before the House, and the hon. Minister, the Gordon report of 1959 in which certain recommendations were made, one of which has been implemented. The other one is to the effect that the Ontario municipal board would be, in effect, a board which would hear appeals referred to it by the Minister, but that the Minister should have the final decision in this respect.

Now I do not know whether the government is hoping that this report will be forgotten, or whether it has good reasons for not implementing it. It seems to me—this makes sense—that policy in planning matters should be in the hands of the Minister, not in the hands of a board. When there is a dispute between subdivider and citizens, it is referred to the Minister. If he wants to have a public hearing and feels it should be done, then he should refer it to the board for a hearing. Then the board simply makes recommendations back to the Minister who makes the final decision.

I wonder if the hon. Minister would comment on the Gordon report and this recommendation in this regard?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, I doubt that Mr. Gordon was apprised of all the positions that are inherent in his recommendation, because in dealing with the matters at the level of The Department of Municipal Affairs and at the level of the Ontario municipal board, there are certain functions which are performed by the Minister. Certain other functions, because of their nature, are referred to the board. And then there is the right of appeal beyond the board—if on a question of law, to a certain court, and if on a question of determination or disagreement with the board's decision, there is an appeal to the Cabinet, of which the Minister of Municipal Affairs is a member.

Now this subject, this recommendation in the Gordon report that the hon. member discusses now, is one of the things that has been studied. It has been thought desirable that instead of the Minister of Municipal Affairs being the court of appeal beyond the Ontario municipal board, it is better as we have it now, that the appeal is to the Cabinet. In that way we think there are reasonably good methods of dealing with these problems that do go beyond the board.

Mr. Young: Could I ask the hon. Minister if there have been instances when the Cabinet has reversed the decision of the Ontario municipal board?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: There have been many rehearings. I do not know, offhand, and my deputy, who is comparatively new in the position, is not aware of any cases where the Cabinet has reversed the decision of the board. But there have been instances where a rehearing was ordered by the Cabinet and there were some changes made in the final order.

Mr. Young: One further question. Could I ask the hon. Minister, regarding the charges that are made by the board, whether those charges cover the costs of the board's operation, or to what extent do they cover costs?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: The board revenue is estimated this year to be about $325,000 and the total cost of operating the board is estimated at $438,000, so there is not enough. It is not too bad—it pays about 75 per cent.

Mr. Young: Well, it seems to me that this is perhaps a reasonable proportion, because courts are not expected to cover the cost; I do not suppose the OMB should be, either.

Now there is one question that has arisen from time to time, and I am not sure of the answer; I would appreciate hearing what the hon. Minister has to say about it. The Ontario water resources commission will often order certain works to be done or suggest that certain works be done. When the application is made for the implementation of those works, can the OMB at that point overrule the Ontario water resources commission and simply say that this municipality does not have the financial resources to carry out the works?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That is correct. There are municipalities in need of municipal services and they go to the Ontario water resources commission. The engineers prepare a plan of what would be the ultimate and, in a number of cases, there is no doubt that when the municipality goes to the board, the board just says: "It is just impossible for you to raise this kind of money in one fell swoop. You would be better to either reduce your plans or stage the project over a period of years in order to maintain a reasonable balance as to the cost that the taxpayers would have to pay in their tax fields." As to the law to which board has the final say, I am not prepared to argue. But I do know that in cases such as the hon. member mentions, that the municipal board has had to say to the municipality: "You had better re-examine your suggested project because it is just a bit too fat for your pocketbook."

Mr. Young: It seems to me in cases like this, Mr. Chairman, that some arrangement should be worked out through the department so that the necessary works are carried out, because I presume that the Ontario water resources commission does not make recommendations like this unless they are pretty well necessary. I can understand the financial problems here, but surely in the interest of the health of the people and the good interests of the province, something should be worked out so that assistance could be rendered in instances of this kind.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, there are facilities available at various times. There are grants, for instance, available through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation on account of the cost of sewage and water facilities. There is financing available through the Ontario water resources commission or through the municipal improvement corporation. There are grants available under the winter works assistance programme. Quite a number of projects were approved under the municipal works assistance programme for the special loans from Ottawa, made available through The Department of Municipal Affairs. I think there are other arrangements where there is a sort of a holiday for repayment of the capital, or for making payments on the capital in the early years of the operation of the project. That has taken place in a number of projects constructed by the water resources commission for a number of municipalities.

So there are a number of areas in which government assistance is available. But I think that the municipal board rightly examines the financial implications of the municipality and its needs over a period of time. In the past several years the board has been anxious to know more about the future capital requirements of the municipalities which appear before it for approval of borrowings and in something like 250 or 300 municipalities in this province, the board has a five-year forecast of their capital requirements. That has made quite an improvement in dealing with these matters at the board level. Oftentimes it has been possible for the board to approve a project on very short notice, because the five-year plan had been examined thoroughly a year or so ago. I had occasion, some time ago, to know of one instance where the application came in in the morning and the approval went out that same night because the board was well aware of the project. It had been planned for some time and was part of the five-year forecast for capital expenditure.

The Ontario water resources commission does not always plan a project for either water or sewer installations in a municipality. The municipality will hire a consulting engineer and, of course, his job is to sell as big a project as he possibly can. I am sure that the hon. member is well aware of that. When that project goes to the municipal board they say: "This is just too expensive for you; you have to cut it down somewhere. Instead of putting in gold-lined eight-inch pipe, you will have to be satisfied with a cast-iron pipe that is only four inches." So there is some help available there.

Mr. Young: I would gather from the reply of the hon. Minister that the actual cases where the OMB overrules the recommendation of the Ontario water resources commission would be very, very few.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Very few.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few comments concerning the problem that involves my municipality and the suburban areas. The feeling in the local area is that the government's role in this amalgamation and annexation hearing — or maybe the Ontario municipal board's role — is strictly farcical. It has been delay after delay after delay. The preliminary to any of the hearings was the comment of the Ontario municipal board that this was going to be as simple as possible; there was going to be a minimal expenditure of funds; the case would be dealt with on its merits. "We will use plain, ordinary common sense," was the common expression at the time. The hearings were held. There were more than 1.2 million words recorded. The Ontario municipal board—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Just as in this House.

Mr. Newman: The Ontario municipal board—I do not know whether the hon. Minister of Labour was trying to be funny or not—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I have a right to speak; there is nothing wrong with that.

Mr. Singer: Only one at a time; that is the rule of the House.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. member wants to add to the million words tonight.

Mr. Bukator: Naturally. By the way, what is the hon. Minister doing about the newspaper strike?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Now we all know how stupid the debate is getting—

Mr. Newman: The Ontario municipal board came down with its interim report and the report certainly is most unusual. It said: Amalgamate services. The Ontario municipal board advises the same area boundaries merge sewage, industry promotion and public utilities commissions.

On November 19, 1962, as a result of that report, these headlines appeared: "Ontario Municipal Report—Patrick sees Fragmentation"; "Interim Report Jolts City; Look on Official Faces Reflects Shock." In the Now column, John Lindblad said:

Bluntly we say that the Ontario municipal board goofed and goofed so badly that it has opened itself to legitimate speculation on why such a report was ever made. Had the board not felt Windsor and its areas were ready for annexation, it should have rejected outright the application. It did not do this. It seemed more guided by the hope that it did not wish to offend when it gave a little something here and there which in total spelled m-e-s-s.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): Who is that expert?

Mr. Newman: A very good friend of the hon. gentlemen sitting over there.

Mr. MacDonald: He is another mistaken Tory.

Mr. Newman: This is John Lindblad, the writer of the Now column in the Windsor Daily Star. On December 18, 1962:

DECISION OF OMB DISAPPOINTS JUDGE

Judge Bruce J. S. MacDonald, chairman of the newly formed Ontario police commission, expressed disappointment Monday on the Ontario municipal board's decision on annexation.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: If the hon. member has the Miami Herald there, will he find out who won the—

Mr. Bukator: I agree with the hon. Minister of Labour; the debate is getting nonsensical.

Mr. Troy: You are as funny as a crutch.

Mr. Newman: The hon. Minister of Reform Institutions can do all the laughing he wishes. It will not disturb me at all because I have this to give to you and whether it is going to take me seven minutes to give it or 17 minutes matters not to me at all. The quieter

hon. members are, the sooner I will get this over with and the sooner the hon. Minister can give me a reply.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Newman: If hon. members wish to interject, it is all right with me; it does not matter.

On January 12, 1963, an editorial in the Windsor Daily Star reads as follows:

ENTIRE AREA INVOLVED

It is becoming obvious the Ontario government is reluctant to introduce legislation to oppose the Ontario municipal board's recommendations on Windsor. This is not just because they are utterly unacceptable to Windsor; it is also because they do not offer a sound system of municipal administration.

On January 13, 1963, a Now column by John Lindblad said:

So why does the Ontario government continue to stall? Politics and personalities seem to be the answer. Politics, in a nutshell, seems to be that the Ontario government brains trust does not worry too much about this area. The uncompleted section of Highway 401 in this area is as good a witness as any.

After these comments in the press, more hearings were held. The interim report was discarded; the government said, "We do not wish to interfere with the Ontario municipal report." The government discarded the report; it must have interfered, or the board would have put the interim report into effect.

More hearings were held and here is the cost to the city of Windsor alone for this annexation:

In 1959 they started their first study; it cost the municipality $2,000; in 1960, a survey cost $3,251.30; in 1961, another submission cost $7,243.20. The year of the hearings with the Ontario municipal board, 1962, cost $84,131.30; in 1963, $1,840; in 1964, $10,668.58, and budgeted for this year is another $10,000. This has cost the city of Windsor itself $119,134.38.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Did they get that from The Department of Municipal Affairs?

Mr. Bukator: How are the diamonds coming, George, have you found any lately?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I have some stuff on them.

Mr. Newman: Is the hon. Minister of Mines all through with his interjections, Mr. Chairman? Do I have his permission to continue?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I have been trying to get a word in since 6 o'clock.

Mr. Newman: If the hon. Minister had been in the House he would have had a chance to get a word in since 6 o'clock. May I continue, Mr. Chairman?

The cost, as I have mentioned, to the city of Windsor was $119,000. The other municipalities that made representation to the Ontario municipal board spent more than this amount. Here we have a total of more than $250,000 involving eight municipalities. The original intent of the Ontario municipal board was that there would be very little or a minimal expenditure of funds, the case was going to be dealt with on its merits, we were going to just use ordinary commonsense.

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Who hired the lawyer?

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, the problem is getting extremely acute today. The municipal board continues to hold hearings. After it completes one, it always finds some reason to have a second. After the second hearing, it finds a reason for a third or fourth. This leaves the residents of the area with one thought in mind only, and that is a stall on the part of this government.

The residents do come along and request that the hon. Minister or the Ontario municipal board come down with a report for or against annexation. They are solely interested in a final report. The $119,000 spent by the city, and at least a similar amount spent by the surrounding areas, is a luxury that the area cannot afford at all. We are now in the stage of a real upswing. Windsor is now on the go. Windsor is now on the grow. Windsor is limited in the extent to which it can grow. The surrounding areas have a shortage of service area. There is need for planning for services, for streets, for schools, for transportation. We quite often talk about the Iron Curtain, the Bamboo Curtain, and other curtains similar to that. We in the province of Ontario have found a third curtain, and that is the municipal board curtain.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: You certainly made a forward step when you got a new member.

Mr. Newman: Would the hon. Minister of Mines care to repeat the last remark? It might be a substantial contribution.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Yes. Look what happened since you got the new member. You have really gone ahead.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Newman: I am pleased to see the new hon. member in here. He won on a fair and square election. Surely he is entitled to his seat in the House?

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, if the hon. Minister of Mines has rested all day so that he comes in here refreshed, some of the rest of us would like to get these estimates over so we could go home and have a rest too.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: Well, I am hoping that you will. I will go any time.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I would suggest, if I may put it bluntly, that if you would just be quiet we might just do so.

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: I will try it.

Mr. J. F. Edwards (Perth): You are working together now, are you?

Mr. MacDonald: I am not working together with anyone other than to get the business done.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, there is need for planning in the area, for services, streets, schools, transportation. The suburban municipalities will find it most difficult to cope with this problem as the present situation exists. There is need for an answer, one way or another. It is common talk back home that the board's mind has already been made up. It was made up long ago. It is made up to recommend the fact that the town of Riverside and the town of Ojibway will be the only two municipalities allowed to be taken over by the city of Windsor. The reason is that the comments back home are strictly political.

Years ago the city of Windsor had an opportunity to annex Ojibway but it was thought it was better to wait and have the whole problem solved; that is why at the time it refused to take over—I should not say refused—it delayed in its request to annex the town of Ojibway. Mr. Minister, it is the desire of the area that you cut this red tape, that you ask the municipal board to get down to action, to get this report submitted as quickly as possible, so that the areas will not remain in the dark. They are interested in action today, action now, action as soon as possible, so that the problem of the Windsor and suburban areas can be settled one way or the other, once and for all.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the hon. member's question, and the request in his statement that he wanted action, I am assured that the Ontario municipal board has completed its hearings. It has asked that written submissions be provided for the board by April 1; and I would presume that as soon as the board has the opportunity to examine the written material that is presented to it, it will make a decision. I would hope that will settle the matters in Windsor once and for all.

Vote 1302 agreed to.

On vote 1303:

Mr. Young: On 1303, Mr. Chairman, there is a question I would like to ask the hon. Minister. I suppose it may be a little early for him to answer it, but he may have some indication. At the time when The Municipal Works Assistance Act was passed, I expressed the fear that this might be an alternative source of capital funds rather than a source of funds which would result in further employment. In other words, the intention was that the municipality should carry on its usual borrowing, carry on its usual programme of work, and that this should be a source of funds whereby it could advance work by several years and thereby increase its indebtedness and add to the employment roster. I wonder if the hon. Minister has any comments or whether it is too soon for him to give us any results in this regard?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, now, it was very clearly understood, I think, by everyone in Canada generally, that the funds were provided by the federal government with the distinct purpose in mind of creating employment; and in our information, which we sent to the municipalities and the boards and commissions in the province, we indicated that very clearly. Applications for loans had to be supported by resolutions passed by the council in which these facts were set out in the resolution. Then our own staff people have checked the projects themselves; and, in the ordinary course of events, the accounts are audited. I am quite convinced—because actually we had difficulty in putting out the money because it had to go on programmes which were not going to be constructed in the ordinary course of events—that projects were accelerated in order to provide employment.

The last report I have here, and this is as of the business on March 18, says we had received and processed a total of 661 applications, involving projects to a total value of 122 million dollars in round figures; and we have, under consideration, a number of projects which will take up pretty well the rest of our $137 million-some-odd-hundred-thousand which was allocated to Ontario.

I think that I can safely answer the hon. member's question by saying that these funds were used for the purpose of providing employment and were in accordance with the federal Act and our provincial Act.

Mr. Young: Then the Ontario municipal board, in this case, was a bit lenient in allowing the debenture debt to rise more than normally would be the case?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I cannot answer that question, because I do not know; but the board has the authority to deal with this in the same way as any other borrowing. That was set out very clearly, also, in our instructions to the municipalities and the boards.

Mr. Troy: I just have a short question I want to ask the hon. Minister of Mines—he has been waiting for it since eight o'clock, so I will not be very long.

An hon. member: Is he under the desk?

Mr. Troy: Oh, he has gone.

But, sir, is this number one the department or the branch under which you investigate, for example, the townsite of Temagami?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, no; that has already been approved; the matter of funds for the investigation of the township of Temagami was approved two or three hours ago.

Mr. Troy: But, I mean, it is under this?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: No, it is not in this vote. It is not in the capital disbursements, 1303-item 1. This is a different vote and different funds.

Mr. Troy: Fine, thank you.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, the city of Windsor put in a request for $540,000 to assist in the construction of a storm sewer in the west end and I understand that they were only allowed to loan $100,000. Is there a reason?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Was that recently?

Mr. Newman: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, to begin with, we allocated the funds at the rate of 20 per cent of the amount of the 1962 tax levy for municipal purposes or school purposes. We then found that we had sufficient funds available that we could approve a loan of up to two-thirds of the cost of an approved project where the amount of our original allocation had not been sufficient to meet two-thirds of the cost of the project. After that, we had about $6 million or $8 million left, so we sent out a circular letter to all those who had presented projects advising them that if they had another project that could qualify we would have a loan of $100,000. So Windsor had a project of $500,000-some-odd and we allocated $100,000 for them on the second project.

Mr. Newman: This was their share of the—

Hon. Mr. Spooner: This was their share of it and everybody else got their share.

Mr. Newman: Thank you.

Vote 1303 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: That concludes the estimates of The Department of Municipal Affairs.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves that the committee of supply rise and report it has come to certain resolutions and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will proceed with the estimates of The Department of Labour and I do not think we would need to announce any other items for the agenda tomorrow. But I would remind the hon. members of the House of tomorrow evening, which will be the press gallery dinner.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 11.10 o'clock, p.m.

Introduction of bills.

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Economics and Development) begs leave to present to the House the Ontario research foundation annual report for 1963.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary and Minister of Citizenship) begs leave to present to the House the report of the Minister, Ontario Department of Transport, 1963-1964.

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett), notice of which has been given.

The question is as follows: Would the hon. Minister inform the House as to how much water had been released from the Fanshawe dam into the Thames River during and immediately prior to the flooding in Kent and Essex counties?

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question of the hon. member, may I say that the flood in March of this year in the basin of the lower Thames River was caused by a large ice jam deposited on the sand bar in Lake St. Clair across the mouth of the Thames River. This deposit occurred at the time of severe rain and resulting runoff in February.

The flooding that occurred during the early days of March was caused by a second severe rainstorm, which started in the midwestern United States and crossed the counties of Kent and Essex. Therefore, rainfall and the resulting runoff in the valley of the lower Thames occurred some hours preceding rainfall and runoff above the Fanshawe dam at London in the reaches of the upper Thames.

Hydraulic engineers indicate that the flooding in the lower Thames regions was not occasioned by the release of water at the Fanshawe dam, since the time required for water to travel from Fanshawe to the mouth of the lower Thames is three days. I might also point out that only a very small portion of the county of Essex lies within the drainage basin of the lower Thames River.

For the information of the hon. member, I am sending him specific data giving the mean flow of water in cubic feet per second and the volume in acre feet discharged from the Fanshawe dam for each day between March 4 and March 14 this year. For comparative purposes, I am providing similar information for nine days during the spring runoff in 1963.

Mr. Spence: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister has not actually answered my question. I wondered how much water had been released from the Fanshawe dam into the River Thames during and immediately prior to the flooding in Kent and Essex counties.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Speaker, I am just sending the hon. member that information. It is in cubic feet, and until it is compared with figures of other years, it would not mean much. I think that after the hon. member looks at that data, he will have the answer he is seeking.

Mr. A. J. Reaume (Essex North): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether, if it were not for the ice at the mouth of the Thames, this flood actually would have happened. Can the hon. Minister inform me?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I was told by the engineers that it was caused by the ice at the mouth of the river, but it must be remembered that at the same time we had a very heavy rainfall, then four inches of snow and freezing weather, which might have helped the flooding situation.

Mr. Reaume: I wonder, then, if we might not have a look at the matter of the upper Thames and the lower Thames valley authorities, so I think it would be well—and I am getting the information, I understand—to know the duties and the obligations and the terms of reference of both, because if these things occur again there is going to be more harm done and more damage. I just want to make this one statement if I could—it is in the form of a question, yet it is a statement. It appears, sir, that if the lower Thames and the upper Thames valley authorities were on their toes and watched these things, these floods probably would not occur.

Mr. Spence: I wonder if the hon. Minister would answer a supplementary question: What is the water capacity of the Fanshawe dam?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I do not have that information with me, but I will be very happy to get it for the hon. member.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Grey South): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister should surely be in a position to say how close to being full the Fanshawe dam was, just prior to or after the flooding of Essex and Kent counties. Was the dam full; how many feet was it below being full, or what was the situation? That is what we ask.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: I am sorry, as I said before, that I have not that information with me. That was not the question which was asked. But I would be very happy to get it for any of the hon. members, if this is the information they require.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): I have a question to ask the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Haskett) and it is not a statement with a question mark at the end of it.

Does the hon. Minister's department still issue garage owners' licences that entitle the licensee to buy, sell and restore cars, and if so, what obligation is there on the person receiving this licence to secure the other licence required under The Used Car Dealers Act?

Hon. I. Haskett (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, under section 31 of The Highway Traffic Act, The Department of Transport issues licences to a person who (a) stores motor vehicles, (b) deals in new motor vehicles, (c) conducts a garage business, (d) conducts a parking station or lot, (e) conducts a used car lot, or (f) wrecks or dismantles vehicles. Such a person requires a separate licence for each separate premises used by him for the purpose of any such business.

In regard to the second part of the question, The Used Car Dealers Act is under the purview of The Department of the Attorney General. Section 3 (1) of The Used Car Dealers Act reads as follows:

No person shall carry on business as a used car dealer unless he is registered under this Act. No person shall act as a salesman of or on behalf of a used car dealer unless he is registered as a salesman of such dealer and such dealer is registered as a used car dealer under this Act.

Mr. MacDonald: There are two departments in the picture.

Mr. E. G. Freeman (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts).

Would the hon. Minister explain to the House the reason for his department's refusal to grant timber limits to existing and prospective new woods industry in the Sioux Lookout area?

Hon. A. K. Roberts (Minister of Lands and Forests): Mr. Speaker, I know of no refusal to grant timber licences or timber supplies to existing Sioux Lookout industries. As a matter of fact, within the immediate past, Lac Seul Land and Lumber Company has obtained considerable areas to meet the requirements of its expanding modern sawmill at Hudson, ten miles from Sioux Lookout, at which plant a number of people who live in the town of Sioux Lookout are employed; I believe as many as 60. In the past, there has been expectation, not only locally, but in our department, that a pulp and paper mill would be established in the vicinity of Sioux Lookout. However, after most exhaustive feasibility and economic studies by the entities contemplating the mill, this has not been the case. There has, however, been considerable expansion at the Lakehead in the pulp and paper industry, and supplies to meet such expansion have, in part, been provided for in the Sioux Lookout area. This, in turn, has resulted in, and should continue to result in, considerable opportunity for local employment. Curiously enough, there seems to be a shortage of labour right across northwestern Ontario at the present time, which I am sure the hon. member for Fort William is pleased about in that it means full employment. With regard to prospective new industry, the department is always ready and willing to do business with bona fide customers to the extent of the availability of wood.

Mr. Freeman: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. Minister of Lands and Forests if he has in his possession a copy of the Daily Bulletin, of Sioux Lookout, dated Monday, March 22. Does he have a copy of the paper?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I have not got it with me, but I have seen it.

Mr. Freeman: He is in possession of a copy?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Yes.

Mr. Freeman: I would hope that it is well read by him.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Well, I know what the local desire is and we would be glad to help if we can, but I think what is going on is probably in the best interests of everybody concerned.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The eighteenth order, House in committee of supply; Mr. W. E. Sandercock in the chair.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with the estimates of The Department of Labour, the hon. members of the House will understand the importance of certain supplementary estimates which should be dealt with by the House at this time. Therefore, the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) will proceed with the supplementary estimates first.

Clerk of the House: Supplementary estimates of ordinary expenditure of the province for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1965.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS AND DEVELOPMENT

On vote 413:

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, can we have an explanation? I am a bit curious as to why, in as progressive a department as this, we have such a large supplementary estimate. Why would this expenditure not have been anticipated?

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Economics and Development): The Chairman is right on his toes this afternoon and he beat me to it.

Mr. MacDonald: I just did not want to lose out.

Hon. Mr. Randall: No, I did not want the hon. member to miss it, either.

Mr. Chairman, the Ontario research foundation, as most of the hon. members know, plans to relocate on a 100-acre site at Sheridan Park, outside of Toronto, and it is anticipated that the old premises will be vacated by September 1, 1966. The architects and engineers who have been retained have prepared all the drawings and will be supervising the construction. The drawings, we hope, will be completed by April 1, 1965 and contractors will be invited to submit tenders.

The Ontario research foundation has acquired this 100-acre site for its new location in Sheridan Park in the township of Toronto at a cost of $540,000 for the land. The building programme will be carried out at a cost not exceeding $5,595,000.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): Why Toronto?

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): It is in Peel.

Hon. Mr. Randall: The total cost will, therefore, be $6,135,000 for the land and the building. The funds for this development will be provided as follows: $5,135,000 by the province of Ontario, and $1 million to be raised by industry. The province has agreed to provide the money in the following manner: $1.5 million will be payable from capital account of The Department of Public Works in exchange for deeds to the property now occupied on Queen's Park Crescent and at 121 St. Joseph Street. An amount of $750,000 has already been paid over to the foundation by The Department of Public Works and an amount of $115,000 was granted by The Department of Economics and Development during the fiscal year 1963-64 for the express purpose of carrying out the design work. The balance therefore owing to the foundation is as follows: The total amount approved by the Treasury board is $5,135,000; the amount paid by Public Works on account of the Queen's Park site was $750,000; the amount paid by The Department of Economics and Development for design was $115,000. That is a total of $865,000 and the balance owing is $4,270,000. The amount of $4,270,000 is to be paid over to the foundation as follows: The Department of Public Works, $750,000, and the remainder, in the supplementary estimates of 1964-65, of $3,520,000, totalling the $4,270,000 we spoke of. I might add that a pilot survey to determine the ability to raise $1 million from industry was carried out by Brakely and Company Limited. They advise that only $800,000 could be raised for this purpose, and representation is now being made to the federal government to extend The Income Tax Act provision of 150 per cent reduction for research facilities to industry, making a capital grant for research purposes. It is believed that if this concession is made, industry will certainly contribute to a greater extent.

Now if there are any further questions on that, Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to answer them, I think that covers the amount of money required in supplementary estimates.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, is the province going ahead with this whether it gets the $1 million from industry or not?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Yes, we are going ahead because, as I have mentioned, they do not believe there will be any difficulty in raising $800,000. But their target is $1 million and, as the earnings of the corporation have proven over the years, if they have a few hundred thousand dollars' indebtedness we feel quite sure they can handle that.

Mr. Singer: That is $200,000. Is that the idea?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Well, it will be a $100 million project when we get finished. We expect it will employ 6,000 scientists and engineers. It will have an annual payroll of $40 million and I think what it will do is provide a service to small industry which is not available from any other organization in Canada of this type.

Mr. Singer: Do we have any assurance that this is all the money that this hon. Minister is going to want for this project? He is asking for $3.5 million in supplementary estimates. The province's contribution is much more than that. There is probably another $200,000, and maybe there is going to be some more.

Hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Chairman, I might point out to the hon. member that the board of the research foundation has given us a firm commitment that this is the extent of our participation in the project, and that the board will raise the money or borrow it. It has some resources it can use as security, so that the research foundation will be run as an absolutely independent organization once it has the buildings provided as set out.

Mr. Singer: Is this the end of the province's commitment—this and perhaps $200,000 more?

Hon. Mr. Allan: No, not perhaps $200,000. This is the end.

Mr. Singer: Then the hon. Provincial Treasurer's statements do not tie in with the statements of the hon. Minister, because the hon. Minister said that another $1 million is needed and that the Brakely people advise that only $800,000 can be raised, so $200,000 has to come from somewhere.

Hon. Mr. Allan: That is the responsibility of the foundation, which it has accepted.

Mr. Singer: Which it has accepted? The government is not going to be concerned with this $200,000?

Hon. Mr. Allan: This is our part of the—

Mr. Singer: And there will be no additional requests a year from now, either in the formal estimates or in the supplementary estimates? I just wanted to get that on the record, sir.

Vote 413 agreed to.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY AND RESOURCES MANAGEMENT

On vote 610:

Mr. A. Johnston (Parry Sound): Mr. Chairman, I have an explanation of the amount in the supplementary estimates. There is an item of approximately $345,000 covering a wage increase that was granted to all non-operating employees this year. The balance of the item covers the deficit on the Moosonee line of approximately $500,000. This is the first time that the ONR has had any subsidy from the Ontario government for this development branch.

Vote 610 agreed to.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH

On vote 715:

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Chairman, there are several items on this vote that call for some explanation.

Item 1: The Ontario heart foundation has a grant. This money is used by the foundation entirely and explicitly for research. It was hoped that this would have been included in our regular estimates but the application did not come in on time, therefore it is appearing here in the supplementary estimates.

Item 2: The special grant to public hospitals, under the authority of The Public Hospitals Act, is $3,615,000, to cover the $75 per bed grant which has been given to hospitals in past years, and which we keep on hoping one day will be possible for us to bring to an end. For this reason it is still in supplementary estimates.

Items 3, 4, and 5, must remain in supplementary estimates because they are liable to change from year to year and may not be necessary. They are given in some measure on a basis of need and use, and they represent a grant of $150 per bed. It may be remembered by those who were in the House before 1959 that these institutions then were included under The Public Hospitals Act, but with the coming into operation of the cost-sharing programme between the federal government and our own, these were not recognized as hospitals. However, because of the good work being done by them, this government decided to continue the support and it is in the amount of $150 per bed.

Items 6 and 7 are of rather unusual interest this year, because they are appearing for the first time. They bring into operation the plan announced by the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) last October 29, that this government would support, with special grants of moneys, areas of hospitals which are used especially, and required particularly and peculiarly, for the teaching function of medical schools. Wellesley hospital, which gets a grant of $2.5 million is well underway. Construction is going on and it will be the first hospital to receive a grant under this Act.

The other grants involve six hospitals, three of which are almost ready to receive their grants: Hotel Dieu in Kingston, $565,000; St. Joseph's hospital in London, $560,000; Toronto general hospital, Toronto, $335,000. The next three projects are not as far advanced, but they will be ready for their grants very shortly. Women's College hospital, Toronto, will get $600,000. I may point out that this is only the first part of a total grant that will be coming to this hospital, when its large expansion programme is completed. Kingston general hospital, Kingston, will get $500,000; the same applies to this hospital. A large programme of rebuilding is going to take place in this hospital. The Ontario cancer institute will get $500,000. This accounts for the $3,050,000, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, may I ask something about the Ontario heart foundation? I understand a number of large foundations in the United States were giving money or grants for medical research in Canada, and they stopped doing this last year. Is this in any way connected with why the hon. Minister is giving $150 per bed under these estimates now?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: No, Mr. Chairman, I would advise the hon. leader of the Opposition that this is a grant that has been given annually for, I believe, the last ten years. Last year I gave an undertaking to the House that I would expect that this was now established and would go into my regular estimates. As I said, the application for it did not come in time for this. This is no different than it has been for some time—although we did cut it by $50,000 for two years; the hon. member's friends made so much noise about it, we put it back up again.

Mr. Thompson: I appreciate the characteristic generosity of the hon. Minister, but I am wondering just how characteristically generous he is in research. Do you get grants from the United States for heart research?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, I could not answer that question off the top of my head. I believe the heart foundations do get grants. The heart foundation of Canada is an independent organization. They make application for grants from various organizations and various foundations. I believe that, at least heretofore, some of them have come from the United States and I also believe that certain of our people here in Ontario have been commissioned, as it were, to do research projects for U.S. bodies, because of the quality and character of the research being undertaken here, just as may happen in many other centres. Apparently there is no expectation of any great damage to their work, because this is the grant for which they made application this year and it is the same, I repeat, as in former years.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, while we are on this item, may I say to the hon. Minister that one of the things that will be of particular interest to us, is knowing how many grants there are, and how much is given for research in medical science, in comparison with what we did get from the United States. We would like to know the proportion of money we put in, because my impression from talking with individual research people is that it sounds like a large amount, but it is in many ways a rather picayune amount.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister whether the moneys voted to him in the regular estimates last year were sufficient to cover hospital construction grants made during the course of the year? I believe the hon. Minister did change the basis of payment of hospital grants. I am not exactly sure what the date was—it may have been in time for his estimates—but did he receive enough money for all the grants that were requested and found to be legitimate during the course of the year?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Chairman, I think this question would more properly come under the estimates but, just from memory, I suggest to the hon. member that we did have enough for the provincial grant. There is a deficit of the federal money, but we had enough money. If he will recall, our changed system of grants came in before the fiscal year change. I just cannot remember the details at the present; I will have them when my estimates come up but, as far as I can think at the present time, we did have enough money for provincial grants under the moneys allocated to us last year; but there was a deficit, I repeat, in the federal moneys.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I heard the hon. Minister's explanation with regard to repetition of items 3, 4 and 5 in the supplementary estimates each year, but I did not quite understand. May I ask the hon. Minister a question?

Did these various institutions—the lodge and the convalescent camps, and so on—operate on a calendar year; and if, at the end of the year it was found that they had a deficit, is some of that deficit met in the supplementary estimates?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: No, Mr. Chairman. They are all on a seasonal basis—they are all summer camps. If they operate, we allow them $160 per bed to meet capital needs. If they want to repair, or remodel, or add to, or change equipment, this money can be used for those purposes. Some of them do not operate to full capacity; some of them do not operate at all. For instance, one has been cut off; and if we find that they are building up fairly substantial reserve funds we can cut our grant because we do not think that they should be making money on this.

One of them—I forget its name—that was on regularly until last year, has been dropped for a time because they have a fairly substantial reserve on hand now. When that comes down then they will come back into the field.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to belabour this point but surely, if this is the kind of thing that is being done, this can be included in regular estimates rather than on supplementary estimates. It is not a case of an emergency situation; it is not a case of a deficit; it is a case of taking a look at their reserves and, if they are getting too large, not granting them for this year. There is no emergency element in that at all. It seems to me it can be done more appropriately, at the regular estimates.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: It is quite possible, Mr. Chairman, that this could have been; but once again we do not always have the financial statements at the times when our regular estimates are being prepared. But I agree with the hon. member that there is really no reason why this could not be included in our regular estimates, if we had the information.

Vote 715 agreed to.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WELFARE

On vote 1811:

Hon. Mr. Allan: Mr. Chairman, this vote has nothing to do with the operation of The Department of Public Welfare. It is a matter that has been considered with a view to assisting the municipalities in their financial arrangements.

You will remember that, either last year or two years ago, we began paying a portion of the school grant for which the various boards had qualified for the following year to assist the municipalities in their finances. This is exactly what we are doing here. This amount of $1,640,000 is approximately one-third of the amount of the grant due the municipalities for their operations during the year 1964; and it is with the hope of assisting them in their financing arrangements that this has been included this year in the supplementary estimates.

Vote 1811 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: This completes these supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1965.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Chairman, to put my total proposal today into proper historical perspective, I would have to tell you that if I had come forward with it in this House 100 years ago, I would have caused quite an upheaval. In other words, what I am asking for on behalf of The Department of Labour is an increase in its appropriation which comes fairly close to equalling the total annual budget of the provincial government in the period right after Confederation.

In spite of this rather awesome comparison, I do not tremble today, Mr. Chairman, because of two reassuring facts: The first is that even the hon. members of the Opposition have come along to the point where they recognize that today is a different age with different problems and different solutions; the second is that I have every confidence in you, Mr. Chairman, as a quiet and competent keeper of the peace in this august assembly.

It might be interesting to look at the development of the department's total spending over the past few years. In the fiscal year which ended on March 31, 1962, the total expenditure of the department was $3.3 million. In succeeding years it has been: 1962-63, $3.8 million; 1963-64, $4.4 million; 1964-65, $5.1 million.

For the coming year, we are planning a total outlay of $6.7 million, almost one-third more than the expenditure in the fiscal year now closing. In sum, the budget of The Department of Labour will have more than doubled within four years.

Because of its particular functions, The Department of Labour deals with and for people through people. Thus, its personnel will have been expanded on a similar basis by the end of the next fiscal year. The striking growth in both the budget and staff of the department is one measure of this government's recognition of, and response to, the challenges and problems of the 1960s. It is an external measure of the department's rapidly expanding capacity to deal speedily and knowledgeably with matters affecting the safety, training, rights and economic well-being of Ontario's work force. How the department is channelling and directing its own resources, its programmes, funds and staff, to reap a maximum advantage for the people of Ontario is, of course, the purpose of my remarks today.

Now, with respect to economic background, it would undoubtedly be helpful to the House if I set out briefly the background against which my department's activities have been carried out during the past year and are being planned for the coming year and beyond.

As every hon. member recognizes, this province is in the midst of a period of economic expansion, the longest growth period since World War II, which has been underway for four years. Ontario's own output in 1964 rose by some $1.5 billion over 1963, or by 8.5 per cent in current dollars, and close to 6.7 per cent in constant dollars. Such factors as major growth in export trade, significantly increased capital investment and strong consumer demand, particularly for durable goods, have played the major role in this expansion. They supported high levels of production in manufacturing and other industries which generated a most favourable climate for placing new entrants in the labour market.

Employment in Ontario increased by approximately 90,000, while the labour force itself increased by 80,000 workers and stood at more than 2.5 million at the end of the year. Unemployment in Ontario in 1964 as a whole was pushed downward to 3.3 per cent of the labour force, the lowest figure since 1956, while the unemployment ratio for all Canada was 4.8 per cent. In the month of February, 1964, unemployment stood at 4.7 per cent of the labour force. In January of 1965, it was 3.9 per cent and then it fell to 3.7 per cent in February. The unemployment rate in other economic regions across Canada, in February, ranged from four per cent on the prairies to 13 per cent in the Atlantic region. For Canada as a whole it was 5.8 per cent.

It is inevitable, under these circumstances, that some shortages of skilled workers should appear. Problem areas occurred in metalworking, automobile repair, clothing manufacturing, forest operations, and highly skilled construction trades.

Present indications are almost overwhelming that the expansion of the economy will continue through and during 1965, sustained by increasing income, a high rate of family formation, replacement demand and capital investment—particularly with respect to primary iron and steel, chemicals, pulp and paper, mining, motor vehicles, power generators and construction generally. Government expenditures will provide a stabilizing influence.

During 1965, the labour force will increase at a greater rate than in 1964, although it seems probable now that we will continue to have a favourable balance between employment supply and demand throughout the year. If unemployment is to be held to a minimum of three per cent of the labour force, the Economic Council of Canada estimates that there must be a net addition of 1.5 million jobs in Canada between 1963 and 1970. This is twice the actual rate of employment increase from 1956 to 1963. We can conclude from this that growth frustrations in the next few years will not be caused by an overall shortage of workers but rather by a lack of required skills and labour force mobility.

On the subject of technological and economic change, Mr. Chairman, may I consider first the concept of change in our present society. The idea of change has penetrated our collective psychology to the extent that, whether or not we actually perceive it happening, we are all convinced that we live in a world of constant change. Obviously this can be both good and bad.

History suggests that a change from one political, social or economic era to another is often quite undramatic and, in fact, may be barely perceptible at the time. We look back in black and white and label the 1920s an age of high and wide prosperity, shattered overnight by a drop into the "great depression." This is a somewhat exaggerated picture, for the late 1920s were a period of very high unemployment which rose quickly, but gradually, to unprecedented levels in the early 1930s.

Today, it would be foolish to underrate the possible speed or quality of technological change. But it would be equally unwise to overrate the extent to which it is now affecting our economy. In other words, we are dealing to a great degree with possibilities and we cannot be certain about the actual outcome of current trends. What we must do is keep very close track of what is happening today and try to project the perspective of what may happen in the future. Erected on this foundation, our programmes must provide basics which will be valid under a variety of alternative possibilities and must also be open-ended so that specifics can be added quickly and easily when the direction of economic or technological development becomes clearer.

In any discussion of technological change, the term "automation" comes to the fore. Mr. Chairman, no word, in my opinion, is subject to such flagrant abuse as "automation."

This is largely because there is no generally acceptable definition for it. As one university professor has said, "Few words have been so twisted to suit a multitude of purposes and phobias." There are some who use it as a vehicle to spread mistrust and fear—the haunting fear of the unknown.

Let me read you several recent headlines which will serve to illustrate my point: "Automation warning—4,000 a week to lose jobs in two years"; "Machines could kill Canada"; "800,000 jobs lost to automation in last 15 years"; "Automation—the terrible beast." I have yet to be shown any sound factual basis for any of these blind forecasts of doom and economic chaos. This game of one-upmanship can only serve to seriously mislead the layman and the public generally. The danger is that fear may so overbalance thoughtful action that we leave ourselves no time for seeking solutions.

I believe that we must take a more enlightened approach to automation, as the word is used, and technological change in an atmosphere free of generalizations and emotional outbursts. We must build and maintain a climate of confidence and co-operation within which solutions to problems can be achieved.

The government is giving leadership to this end. But our leadership alone is not enough. The people of the province, through their industries, trade unions, social agencies, churches and so forth, must participate in this effort.

There are many things government is doing and will do. There are many things only the trade unions themselves or industry can do. Built-in institutional rigidities or rigidities of outlook can make adjustment difficult or impossible. They must be eliminated and this calls for self-examination.

As far as one can see now, how will the problems of adjustment be met? First of all, sir, through clear vision of what is happening now and what may develop in the future—through research designed to show how, why, when and where our society may be affected. Much can and will be done at the bargaining table, of course. Education and training will play a major role. And finally, the stimulation and maintenance of a high level of economic activity and development will continue to create employment.

My department's role in assisting both employers and employees to adjust to technological change falls into three principal categories. 1. Fostering and sponsoring the development of labour force skills that match current and future job requirements. 2. Pro-protecting employees against potential economic hazards stemming from changes in technology and in employment patterns. 3. Facilitating the efforts of employers, unions and employees to adjust to changed conditions through collective bargaining and other means of employer-employee communication.

Naturally, the challenges and problems associated with technological change are not restricted by geographical boundaries; effective solutions will require a concerted effort by every level of government. More than 12 months ago the federal Department of Labour unveiled plans for the establishment of a manpower consultative service aimed at helping management and labour adjust to the introduction of new methods, materials and techniques. We are looking forward with interest to a report on the progress of this particular programme.

Mr. Chairman, for nearly 40 years The Department of Labour has sponsored and assisted formal apprenticeship training programmes in some 15 trades in the construction, motor vehicle and service fields.

Under these programmes, a person has been indentured to an employer for a period ranging from two to five years, depending on the trade. The apprentice has learned the various elements of the trade on the job while earning a regular wage. During the period of his on-the-job training, the apprentice has attended either one or two sessions of classroom instruction, relating directly to the theoretical basis of his trade, at a provincial trade school operated by The Department of Education. The costs of such trade school training have been defrayed by The Department of Labour, which has also paid the apprentice a weekly subsistence allowance during his term away from employment.

In some of the trades in which formalized apprenticeship programmes have long been carried on—motor vehicle, electrical, refrigeration, watch repair, hairdressing, barbering—a person has not been eligible to practise the trade unless he has possessed a certificate of qualification. This has normally been earned through training under the apprenticeship system. On a limited scale, the department has, for many years, registered apprentices for general industry without offering formal programmes or curricula.

Until recently, the contribution of the apprenticeship system to the development of skills was small in relation to the labour force as a whole. Nevertheless, at the present time the system is registering apprentices at a rate 50 per cent higher than in the previous year.

Not until recent years has there been a public expectation or, indeed, demand, that government at all levels should be responsible in a direct way for anything more than maximizing the educational attainment, in academic terms, of young persons entering the labour market. The operation of the apprenticeship system, with its attempt to train some of the specialized workers required by Ontario's trades and industries, has been the exception to this general pattern, but an exception which, as I have already noted, has been confined to relatively narrow limits.

From the standpoint of The Department of Labour, the breakthrough to a more comprehensive governmental approach followed the increasing concern shared by the public over the implications of technological change. In 1963, the select committee on manpower training reported on measures that could be taken by governments, industry and labour, not only to improve existing worker training programmes but also to undertake new training, retraining and upgrading programmes.

One of the results of the work of this select committee was the adoption of a new Apprenticeship and Tradesmen's Qualification Act by the 1964 session of the Legislature. Under this authority, and with a large-scale expansion of staff and funds, The Department of Labour will be in a position not only to eliminate the bottlenecks of the past, but also to launch an extensive and aggressive new programme covering the whole field of on-the-job industrial training.

As I have indicated, the department's apprenticeship programme will be carried on under the authority of the Act and the new federal-provincial apprenticeship agreement. Other industrial training programmes will fall under the authority of programme 4 of the technical and vocational training agreement. In future, therefore, my department, as well as The Department of Education, will operate under programme 4. In a sense, my department's activities will constitute an extension of the apprenticeship principle into short-term training, with the same kind of division of responsibilities as exists under the apprenticeship system.

My department will be responsible for all aspects of the implementation and operation of training programmes undertaken on the job and designed to develop specific skills related to specific employment. The Department of Education will be responsible for all other forms of training.

An interdepartmental committee consisting of senior representatives of both departments has been established and will sit at regular and frequent intervals to act as a constant channel of communication and liaison between both departments as to what each is considering and doing under programme 4 and apprenticeship training; to determine, in respect of training needs involving both on-the-job and "classroom" training, the appropriate allocation of responsibilities, methods to be followed and assistance to be provided; and to co-ordinate the promotional, assessment, development and operational activities of both departments so that training and education programmes tie in with each other at all levels.

I am confident, Mr. Chairman, that the logic of this arrangement will commend itself to the hon. members of the House. As I have indicated, this extends to the whole field of employment-orientated industrial training and should serve as a very practical division of responsibility. Moreover, training in employment, as a labour department responsibility, is a logical extension of our present participation in the whole field of employment—safety, labour standards and labour relations. These arrangements will also facilitate the planning and operation of short-term programmes as initial credit units in longer and broader apprenticeship programmes.

The estimates before you today provide for the establishment of the new industrial training branch, replacing the present apprenticeship branch. Its total staff will be 133, an increase of 43 over the apprenticeship branch staff.

Organization of the new branch will be in three major sections. The role of the administrative services section needs no elaboration. The field services section will handle inspections and maintain close contact with the progress of trainees. It will perform counseling and advisory functions in the field for both individual apprentices and trainees and for industries. The field staff will be expanded from 35 to 48 officers and representatives of the branch will be stationed in all parts of Ontario.

The programme development and promotion section is entirely new. It will be staffed by some 21 specialists who will work closely with all interested parties to establish training programmes, provide assistance to industry in developing special projects to meet special situations, plan and execute vigorous promotion and information campaigns to enhance the status of trade and occupational training, create opportunities for persons to engage in such training and to encourage persons to take advantage of the opportunities presented.

The new research branch of the department, about which I shall say more later, will assign economists and research personnel to work in co-operation with other agencies, in the field of forecasting our changing manpower requirements. Labour market trends and skill shortage projections will be used to guide the development of new and existing training programmes to avoid training in obsolete skills. Through specialized research, the branch's activities will be more closely geared to the needs of specific industries and geographic areas as well as the economy as a whole.

The current plans for the industrial training branch, as embodied in these estimates, were themselves developed on the basis of studies carried out in 1964. A survey of some 6,500 Ontario manufacturing firms confirmed that apprenticeship is one of the most acceptable and effective methods of developing high-level skills. The survey suggested that priority attention should be given to the development of new programmes in such trade fields as tool and die, mechanical, electrical and electronic, foundry and steel fabrication.

You will note in the estimates the item of $950,000 for "industrial training." This covers the cost of supplementary classroom instruction, subsistence allowances and so forth. Before I am asked the question, I should like to emphasize that this is an estimate, and in the circumstances can be nothing more than an estimate of the possible expenditure required. As the year proceeds, it may be that additional funds will be needed. In any case, it should be noted that this item represents a total potential expenditure of $1,850,000 since the cost here is normally shared 50-50 by the federal and provincial governments.

I want to say a word about credits on apprenticeship training periods for time spent in secondary school or other technical courses. While some might try to make it seem otherwise, the policy of my department is that such courses should be credited to apprenticeship training. This policy has been implemented, for example, in the new regulations covering the motor vehicle and electrical trades, where the apprenticeship period is reduced by as much as 40 per cent in recognition of successful completion of grade 12. Mention has been made of hairdressing courses given in the two-year occupational programme in secondary schools. As you are aware, this programme is designed for pupils to up-grade themselves to the entrance level for the trade. They are able to enter apprenticeship or trade school training in the trade on individual merit, on the recommendation of their school principal.

May I return for a moment to the second role my department has in facilitating adjustment to technological change. This relates to protective measures designed to shield the work force against possible economic hazards of advancing technology.

Since 1949, employment opportunities have increased more than three times as fast in service industries as in non-service industries. The service industries have absorbed large numbers of both unskilled and semi-skilled labour. In the unskilled category, lower wage rates tend to prevail. In those instances where such protective measures as collective bargaining do not operate, the establishment of minimum standards guards employees against unduly low wages and poor working conditions.

Within the past year and a half, The Department of Labour has established the new labour standards branch with responsibility for administering and enforcing programmes designed to protect the worker against exploitation, including the economic hazards of displacement based on rapid technological change.

During the past year, the first comprehensive minimum wage programme in the province's history, providing for a floor rate of $1 an hour to be attained in stages, was introduced throughout Ontario. At the same time, The Industrial Standards Act was revitalized, setting up streamlined machinery for the negotiation of schedules of hours, work, wages and working conditions, binding on all employers and employees in a particular trade or industry within a designated zone. A system of fair wage schedules on government building contracts was introduced to provide leadership to industry in the maintenance of fair working standards.

The operation of the labour standards branch will cost some $688,000 in the next fiscal year, as against an estimated $486,000 in the current year. This $200,000 increase is due to the expansion of administrative and field staff to provide for complete and comprehensive inspection and enforcement of the new standards. At present, enforcement personnel number 35. During the coming year, the enforcement staff, including supervising inspectors, will be raised to 54.

Steps will be taken through the labour standards branch in the coming year to provide incentives for the employment of handicapped persons through special permits under The Minimum Wage Act and other labour standards programmes. Provision will be made for the negotiation and establishment of mutually acceptable wage minima and other standards which take account, in special circumstances, of productivity differences between handicapped and other employees. Employers will be encouraged to employ handicapped persons, and the existence of the special permit system will be publicized.

Mr. Chairman, in order to facilitate employer-employee communication and thereby foster adjustment to technological change, the department will develop and provide research information. Many of the problems associated with technological change are being, and will continue to be, resolved by management and labour at the bargaining table on a case-by-case basis. The conciliation officers of the department can be more effective and helpful to management and labour in these situations if they are equipped with current information on adjustment problems and on the means utilized elsewhere to solve them. This involves a continuing programme of collective bargaining analysis and research which will be undertaken by the new research branch. In addition, the research branch will publish information on technological change that can be useful to employers, employees, and the general public, in formulating their approaches to the subject.

Mr. Chairman, during 1964 and the early part of 1965, labour relations developments in Ontario have reflected the high level of employment and economic activity that has prevailed. In most collective bargaining, attention has focused on the questions of wages, vacations and insured benefits. Some unions and employers have sought to deal with the labour relations implications of technological change, but there has apparently been little current economic pressure on either party to concentrate heavily on this matter. The need to provide avenues for the upgrading of employees' skills was recognized in negotiations between the Steel Company of Canada and the united steelworkers. Ontario Hydro and the Canadian union of public employees have agreed to set up a union-management committee for discussion of technological change outside the normal context of collective bargaining.

In addition to providing regular labour relations services designed to effect agreement between the parties in connection with collective agreements, The Department of Labour will be prepared to work actively in assisting the parties, as in the Stelco agreement, to implement appropriate training and up-grading plans.

Control of the pace at which employees are required to work was the subject of much union discussion during 1964 and, from the union standpoint, the adequacy of grievance and arbitration procedures to deal with the matter was questioned. At General Motors and the Ford Motor Company, the problem was resolved by the parties through agreement that the union would review changes in production standards through its own time-study man in the plant.

While alternative proposals have been put forward, it would obviously be unwise to write a hasty prescription without a full diagnosis of the problem. Thus I have arranged for the department to provide a research grant of $5,000 to Queen's University to assist Professor C. H. Curtis of the industrial relations centre to carry out a complete analysis and study of labour grievance and arbitration procedures in Ontario.

During 1964, Ontario experienced fewer strikes and lockouts than in any of the three preceding years. In 1961, there were 166 strikes or lockouts; in 1962, 172; in 1963, 181; and, in 1964, less than 160. These figures by themselves, of course, might be misleading, for more workers were involved in the 1964 strikes than in each of the three preceding years. Similarly, time lost in the 1964 strikes totalled some 700,000 man-days, as against 363,000 man-days in 1963, 460,000 in 1962, and 644,000 man-days in 1961. On the other hand, almost half of the 1964 total of man-days lost occurred during December when many auto industry workers were away from their jobs.

During 1964, conciliation officers of the department assisted in efforts to reach agreement in 1,206 disputes involving 1,478 employers and 213,000 employees. They were influential in the final settlement of 488 disputes. A further 381 were referred on to conciliation boards. The remainder were either still in process at the year's end or required no further assistance.

Conciliation boards had a total of 471 disputes before them during 1964. Some 379 were disposed of, the remainder still being in process at the end of the year. Settlement was achieved either prior to or during the conciliation boards' hearings in 299 cases. Hon. members will see, from this perspective, that the vast bulk of all disputes are settled with the help of the department's conciliation and mediation machinery and the number that go on to strike or lockout action constitute a very small proportion of the total case load.

This is not to suggest, of course, that The Department of Labour withdraws from the scene once a dispute has passed through all stages of the formal conciliation machinery. Far from it. It is our practice to make available to both parties, at any stage of a dispute, our full facilities to assist them in reaching an agreement. In addition, we are constantly seeking solutions to problems, which cannot be resolved through negotiation alone, by working in concert with labour and management.

However, both labour and management share a common philosophy with regard to the intervention of government in collective bargaining. Both agree that government intervention in any phase of labour-management relations should be held to the irreducible minimum. As a result, in Ontario, under our system of free collective bargaining, labour and management enjoy certain rights and privileges, confirmed by law, including the right to bargain freely and take economic action. It is also recognized that these rights and privileges carry with them certain obligations, including the responsibility for the actions taken by each of the parties.

Through deliberate choice, we in this province decided many years ago to follow and foster free collective bargaining as an appropriate method of achieving a just relationship between labour and management. We established, through The Labour Relations Act, a balanced set of rules within which collective bargaining could operate. Moreover, through the labour relations board, the administration of these rules has long been in the hands of the parties directly involved in the collective bargaining system.

Down through the years, Mr. Chairman, various details of the rules have been modified, adjusted and improved, but the basic structure has remained valid. And experience has proved that collective bargaining, carried out within this context, satisfies the reasonable requirements of both labour and management in the vast majority of situations.

In other provinces, from time to time, labour and management have declared moratoria on the public discussion of questions relating mainly to the rules under which the two parties bargain collectively. These mutually-agreed-upon silences may have validity elsewhere, but in a province like Ontario, with a complex and expanding economy, discussion and debate are the vital catalysts of progress. Elsewhere, declared moratoria on discussion and suggestion may well be a measure of labour-management co-operation, but in Ontario they could well be a measure of something entirely different.

In my opinion, there is too great a tendency in labour-management relations to place cooperation, in any form, in the category of "good" and consider conflict to be entirely "evil." Conflict can be healthy and can, in fact, lead to co-operation. Our economy can afford conflict based on principles, but not conflict based on personalities and a desire for retribution on the part of either labour or management.

I have referred to labour-management co-operation, the achievement of which, in a broad sense, is obviously most desirable. Co-operation does not occur in a vacuum. It must always have a purpose. There must be agreed-upon objectives, and in a free society government does not dictate objectives to labour and management. Similarly, the creation of institutions and forums for co-operation cannot precede agreement upon objectives.

There is general agreement in Ontario on the part of labour and management, as well as by the public, that more industrial training, whether on an apprenticeship or a short-term in-plant basis, is required to meet the needs of both the economy and the individual. Recognizing this agreement on objectives, The Department of Labour is establishing advisory committees to help plan training programmes. These committees are made up of representatives of both labour and management. Here is practical co-operation in the best sense, leading to the joint solution of problems. The labour relations board, to which I have already referred, is another example of practical co-operation; so is the labour safety council; so are the industrial standards advisory committees; at the broad government level, so is the Ontario economic council. I have no doubt that the list will continue to expand.

A little more than a year ago, I asked the labour safety council of Ontario to undertake a study of safety education in Ontario and to recommend ways and means of dealing more effectively with accident prevention through the medium of education. The council, which, as you realize, is a body representative of both employer and employee interests, has reported to me and its report has been made available to the members of the House.

Mr. Chairman, may I express at this time, my gratitude to the chairman and members of the council for their painstaking and exceedingly valuable work. The report and its recommendations are receiving careful consideration and I shall have more to say on this subject later in the session.

The House has before it at the present time, amendments to the construction safety and trench excavators protection Acts which will further strengthen the legislative tools required to safeguard workmen in these fields. You will note that the estimates for the construction safety branch are $250,000, as against slightly more than $150,000 in the previous fiscal year. This 66 per cent increase will permit the branch to carry out an expanded programme of training for the municipal inspectors who enforce the construction safety and trench excavators protection Acts. It will enable the branch to organize rescue units for underground tunneling and the compressed-air work. Research will be carried out to determine appropriate procedures, equipment and training in rescue methods, and steps will be taken to enlist the active co-operation of both management and labour in the construction industry. While Ontario's new underground work regulations are the most modern in existence and were drafted on the basis of the best world-wide experience available, knowledge of the effects of elevated air pressures on air-testing instruments, on air-supply masks used in rescue operations, and on the combustibility of flammable materials is still incomplete. The branch will therefore sponsor extensive research into these matters.

In November of last year a therapeutic decompression chamber was installed in the Toronto general hospital for the treatment of acute caisson disease. This chamber, which was financed by the Ontario workmen's compensation board, will also be used for general research in the field of compressed-air illness.

The department's operations in the industrial safety field are undergoing significant and comprehensive reorganization in an effort to provide better inspection coverage and services and direct consulting assistance to industry in the development and use of safer practices and equipment.

The former factory inspection and engineering services branches have been combined in the new industrial safety branch. The total budget of the new branch will be $942,000, roughly 35 per cent more than the combined budgets of its two predecessor branches. Total staff of the new branch will be 145, a 45 per cent increase.

The major concentration of new staff will occur in the safety division. The province has been divided into regions for inspection purposes with a regional safety manager and supervising inspectors overseeing the activities of field inspectors in each region. The inspection staff will rise from 53 officers to 77. This will enable the branch to step up the frequency of plant inspections by almost 50 per cent and greatly improve call-back procedures.

Mr. Chairman, the engineering division of the branch, which examines the plans for commercial and industrial structures, equipment and machinery to ensure their safe design and construction or installation, has been breaking records in every month of this current fiscal year in direct relationship to the expansion of the province. The total value of approvals in the first ten months of the current fiscal year is 54 per cent higher than in the same period last year.

During the coming year, the branch will begin offering to industry detailed and formal advice as to appropriate machine-guarding techniques and devices. Information and advice as to minimum safe practices on various subjects of concern to industry will be developed and distributed in the form of data sheets. These estimates provide for the addition of ten to the existing staff of 23.

Ontario's safety record is second to none in the areas of elevating devices, and boilers and pressure vessels. In line, however, with the policy of assuming responsibility for the inspection of elevators now under the purview of insurance companies, we shall be adding seven inspectors to the staff of the elevators branch. In order to provide more intensive and extensive inspection of boilers and pressure vessels, nine inspectors will be added to the staff of this branch.

One must admit that safety rests, in the final analysis, in the hands of employers and employees. Accident reports indicate, in the vast majority of cases, that injuries or fatalities were caused by carelessness on the part of the victim or a combination of circumstances over which nobody had any direct and immediate control. But regular inspection and enforcement of safety laws and rules by an outside agency does play a more than significant role in awakening both employers and employees to hazards and unsafe practices. I am proud to be able to report to the House that my department's capability to do this job has more than doubled in the past four years. During the past few months, the salary ranges for safety inspectors have been reviewed and up-graded and competitive rates have been established. I feel confident that with such rates, and with a vigorous training programme for new and existing staff and with that intangible but nevertheless vital ingredient of staff morale—top-grade direction and supervision—we will be fielding an inspection team in the coming year that will attack the safety problem with vigour and success.

The estimates provide for the establishment of a distinct research branch for the department, with a total staff of 23. The branch will service four main areas of the department—labour relations; industrial training; labour standards and industrial and construction safety. Initial research projects will concentrate on labour force trends and manpower requirements. I shall not repeat what I have already stated in regard to the objectives of the branch in the labour relations and industrial training fields. However, extensive research is also planned to support the activities of the labour standards branch through the assessment of the impact and effectiveness of such legislation as minimum wages and hours of work. In the safety field, the branch will probe the nature of industrial and construction accidents, their frequency and association with a variety of factors.

To support the activities of the research branch and of other sections of the department, a comprehensive labour library is being developed under the direction of a professional librarian. The library will also be available for the use of outside organizations and individuals.

These estimates will enable the department to carry forward vigorously its information programme which is designed to provide the public with a fuller understanding of their rights and responsibilities and of the opportunities provided by The Department of Labour. During the past year, pamphlets outlining the various programmes of the department have been established and given wide circulation. Mass media have been employed to keep the public fully informed about the department's minimum wage programme. In the coming year, these programmes will continue, with special emphasis on the promotion of industrial training programmes. Steps will be taken to develop appropriate information programmes to assist immigrants to integrate more readily into the life and work of the province.

I am sure, sir, that the members of the House are familiar with the balanced, yet effective, approach of the Ontario human rights commission to problems of human relations through its education, research and enforcement programmes. The commission has been very active in the educational field. In the area of research, the commission is sponsoring studies in Hamilton, Windsor and Toronto in an effort to determine the extent to which minority groups are affected by employment and housing discrimination in those centres.

While the principles of the human rights code have been brought forcibly to the attention of the public across Ontario in recent years, and have won wide acceptance and support, the case load of the commission is continuing to increase. This is undoubtedly due to the fact that the educational programme of the commission has made the victims of discrimination aware that there is an agency to which they can turn for protection. In the coming year, the professional staff of the commission will be increased by two persons. One will be stationed in Windsor to serve southwestern Ontario through education and conciliation work, and the second will have his headquarters in northwestern Ontario where he will seek to assist in connection with the problems of discrimination involving Indians and immigrant minority groups.

Sir, in years past, the main emphasis within The Department of Labour fell on the services it provided in the general area of labour or industrial relations.

This was always the aspect of the department's responsibilities that elicited the major share of discussion and attention, both in this House and outside, in the press and elsewhere. And to match this attention, the labour relations side of the department was fully and professionally staffed, highly developed and, indeed, led all other jurisdictions in Canada in the legislative tools at its disposal and in the way it handled those tools.

My concern, since becoming Minister of Labour, has been to support and maintain my department's high reputation and record of performance in industrial relations and, at the same time, increase the stature and the capability of the other vital aspects of the department's total programme to a level which would truly meet the rapidly developing, present and future needs of the people of Ontario. These estimates, Mr. Chairman, providing for expansion of existing services, the launching of new services and restructuring of activities throughout the department are designed to accomplish this objective.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

On vote 901:

Mr. L. A. Braithwaite (Etobicoke): Mr. Chairman, in commenting on the estimates of The Department of Labour, I would first of all like to say that we in the Liberal Party would hope that with the advent of automation and the mixed bag of benefits and problems which it is bringing with it, as evidenced by the Toronto newspaper strike—I want to digress here for just a moment, Mr. Chairman. In relation to the Toronto newspaper strike, I want to bring to the attention of this House that there always has been federal legislation in existence to prevent this type of strike by having planned, in-plant training. In the future, labour tragedies such as this strike can be prevented.

Now this legislation has been in existence for at least two years. However, it seems that the legislation has, until very recently, been largely ignored by labour, by management and by the Ontario government. In essence, the legislation, known as Schedule 4, offers to pay half the cost of any training programme that labour and management can devise in any job situation. Thus the simple solution of early training, or sending the worker back to school in an in-plant training programme, is available and has always been available to labour and management.

This federal legislation has always been available to owners of small businesses and one wonders why the Ontario government, through The Department of Labour and The Department of Education, has not, until lately, seen fit to make broader use of the fact that the programme is available. With the federal government paying half of the cost, management and the employees usually make up the other half. It would be a fair question to ask the hon. Minister how many Ontario firms will be taking advantage of this federal legislation in the current year.

Reference was made in the hon. Minister's comments to a new interdepartmental committee and it will be interesting to see how the plan works out.

As I was saying, we on this side of the House, Mr. Chairman, would have hoped that the hon. Minister of Labour would have given this House notice of exciting, visionary and altogether new concepts for his department. Above all, we would have hoped that he would have expanded on this blueprint of his to give this House some indication that he realizes that the time has come for his department—The Department of Labour—to give up its old passive role, especially in the field of labour relations.

With the changes in technology which are now occurring with increasing rapidity, it is apparent, at least to this party, that the role of The Department of Labour should be changed; in fact, it will be quite fair to say that the importance of the whole field of labour relations is increasing at a phenomenal rate. This being so, we in the Liberal Party feel that the resources available to the hon. Minister of Labour in his department and in the government of this province should be made use of in a more active manner so that the destructions which automation may bring to the whole labour picture can be efficiently and beneficially dealt with.

Early in this session, the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) gave us notice of an Ontario foundation on automation and employment. Subsequently, the whole question of automation was taken away from the proposed foundation and given to the Ontario Economic Council, which has representatives from organized labour, agriculture, industry and commerce, universities, government and similar organizations. Whether this has but postponed the ultimate requirement of getting down to brass tacks with the problem, only time will tell. However, we in the Liberal Party feel that the hon. Minister of Labour could well afford to gear the planning for his department to meet some of the problems which may arise in the short run. Over the longer haul, the research, planning, and forward thinking of a progressive labour ministry could be tied in neatly with the possible long-run findings of the Ontario Economic Council.

There is absolutely no reason why the hon. Minister could not move forward in his thinking and planning for the future of The Department of Labour while, at the same time, maintaining a high degree of co-ordination with various other agencies such as the Economic Council of Canada, the Ontario Economic Council and the federal Department of Labour.

The hon. Minister has told us of the major reorganization which his department is undergoing. We have heard of the vastly expanded apprenticeship programme and the hope which his department has for using this programme to ameliorate the impact of automation. We have also read and heard much of the expanded research division of The Department of Labour and the plans which the department has for laying more emphasis on retraining and the upgrading of workers.

All of this is commendable. However, we feel that these steps, indicative though they may be of the desire for progress, do not show a basic appreciation and desire on the part of the hon. Minister and his department to take a new hard look at the whole field of labour relations and the need for change in the role of The Department of Labour, which we envisage.

In that regard there are many areas which the hon. Minister and his research department could investigate thoroughly. In the field of employment, generally, The Department of Labour, in conjunction with other departments of the government, could do a great deal of economic planning. For unionized labour, I suggest that The Department of Labour could become much more active in the search for labour peace by investigating thoroughly the whole question of continuous consultations between management and labour, and also perhaps the feasibility of industry-wide bargaining. This latter factor could become very important as automation grows in importance within a particular industry.

For unorganized labour, the government, through the hon. Minister of Labour, could look into the whole question of improving the grievance machinery so that the ordinary worker might find it easier to lay a personal complaint. It might even consider setting up local bureaus. In any event, there are many areas where the increased research staff of the department could come up with suggestions which I submit would prove, and could prove, to be very useful in the short run in meeting the oncoming challenge of automation.

During the debate on the Speech from the Throne, my hon. leader (Mr. Thompson), in discussing the broad question of labour-management relations, made mention of the fact that in the last decade or so the aims of labour leaders and the labour movement in general have shifted from welfare demands to job protection demands.

It is common knowledge, Mr. Chairman, that increased production through refined techniques must be correlated with an increase in jobs available through expanded production facilities. Without a close interrelation of these two factors, labour-management peace in the future will be impossible. Without adequate provision for the maintenance of labour peace, the true benefits of automation will be lost to Ontario.

In view of the increasing importance of satisfactory labour-management relations, I felt at this point, Mr. Chairman, that I might make a few comments on the progress that Sweden and other countries have made in collective bargaining. The hon. Minister of Labour could well make use of some of the ideas that this Scandinavian country and, indeed, our own province of Nova Scotia, has tried in this regard. My first comment, Mr. Chairman, is that due to the wide scope for self-government in Swedish labour relations, collective bargaining is singularly free from compulsory arbitration. In Ontario, on the other hand, instead of the government making full use of all the resources at its command, to ensure that both labour and management are strong enough that each has a healthy respect for the other, it has taken a regrettable step towards compulsory arbitration.

True, "the hospital-labour disputes arbitration Act" covers an area where this party feels that the public good transcends the rights of both management and labour. However, the people of Ontario would have hoped that the government, through The Department of Labour and The Department of Health, might have taken more progressive steps towards improving the position of hospital employees so that they need not have to resort to strikes.

The short-lived strike at the Ontario hospital is regrettable. The present strike at the Wellesley hospital is even more regrettable. However, it is the considered opinion of this party that if the government is truly interested in improving the lot of hospital employees in general, it would give more latitude to the Ontario hospital services commission, so that a larger share of grants and of other moneys would be available for wages and for improved working conditions for hospital employees. And on behalf of the employees, in all fairness, it should also be pointed out that essential services have never been withheld by labour in any such situation, although this may have been threatened.

Returning to the Swedish picture, Mr. Chairman, legislation in that country enters only at four points: First, it protects the rights of association and negotiation on each side against certain measures on the other that violate these rights. Second, it makes existing collective contracts enforceable and compels adjudication on disputes over their interpretation or application. Third, it makes the intervention of a government mediator obligatory if the parties cannot reach agreement in negotiations for new contracts. Fourth, it requires one week's notice of strikes or walk-outs if mediation fails.

This means, Mr. Chairman, that compulsion is limited to the interpretation and enforcement of existing contract terms. Although a mediator is required before negotiations on a new contract are abandoned, he cannot force an agreement. He can only try to help the negotiating parties to find common ground. The right to resort, by strike and walk-out, to open conflict as a final argument in disputes over new contract terms is considered an essential part of the system and plays an important role in bargaining.

Mr. Chairman, I could go on and on and give further procedural details in connection with the Swedish system of collective bargaining, but I would suggest that it suffices here to say that, in that country, compulsion is limited to the interpretation and enforcement of existing contract terms. In Sweden, an important and interesting position which reflects the joint respect achieved between labour and management is one which deals with industrial democracy. Although labour has recognized management's traditional right to run its business as it sees fit, this does not mean that the workers have dropped their demands to be allowed some voice in production matters and other questions.

In this area, labour-management agreements have encouraged the formation of labour-management committees. These committees are without decisive powers but they do exist for mutual discussions and the exchange of information. These committees do not encroach upon normal trade union activities, but within individual plants they discuss production issues, techniques, organization, development and planning. Management is under obligation to make known its investment and marketing plans but not to disclose any contents that might jeopardize the company's competitive position. Workers are encouraged to submit suggestions, and in fact in 1961, 13,000 suggestions were concerned with production and more than half of them were used.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, in respect to the Swedish system, the system of basic agreements has already proved itself as a working scheme for industrial peace. Under these agreements, the responsibility for wage negotiations rests on labour and management with the tacit understanding that if they cannot agree, then the government can act. The prime interest that management and labour have in common is to keep the negotiations unhampered by government regulations.

During a period of time, agreements between labour and management have come to cover such things as plant safety, vocational training, application of time and motion study, the problem of women workers, a joint labour-management life insurance company, and so forth. Both labour and management agree that one of the most valuable results of their system of agreements and freedom from compulsory arbitration, has been the growing trust and respect produced by the experience of getting to know each other on a more personal footing.

As understanding has grown, wider and wider areas of agreement have come into view and the whole field of conflict has correspondingly dwindled.

Mr. Chairman, Ontario could well borrow some of the ideas which seem to work so well in Sweden. Automation can bring untold benefits if we are ready for it. Ontario cannot be ready for automation if it is not prepared to take steps to plan for labour peace. If it is not ready, it will be guilty of another lost opportunity. Sweden is meeting this challenge. Nova Scotia has tried to meet it and is in the process of doing so. Ontario must meet its challenge in the months that lie ahead.

Continuing with my theme of the need for peace and harmony in the whole area of labour relations, I want now to say a few words about negotiation rights for professional staff and in particular for the registered nurse. The importance of this area is centred in the following words, which are taken from the preamble of a brief recently presented to the government by several professional groups. In part, the preamble says, and I quote:

The large corporation or institution has a dominant hold in the economic life of our citizens. Most professional people—and the proportion is steadily increasing—are employed by such corporate bodies. Our civilization is becoming increasingly dependent upon the advice of professional people, but the voices of professional staffs are seldom heard in public, either with respect to their professional work or with respect to the determination of the conditions under which they work.

Mr. Chairman, the thoughts set out in these words apply equally to the nursing profession. For some time now there has been talk of an Act which the government has ready and which it is said the government proposes to put forward for first reading at a time when it considers it to be most appropriate. Since our party feels that such an Act might possibly be the forerunner of other legislation in connection with other professional groups, we have a distinct and abiding interest in what may be put forward by the government and what the effect of such legislation might be.

It is well known that wonder drugs, machines such as the artificial kidney, and other changes within the nursing profession, have changed the whole profession and have possibly outmoded the prewar type of nurse, who was long on warmth and long on understanding. It has been said that such changes and requirements have the nurse in such confusion about her role that it is difficult to say whether a nurse now performs as a nurse, a medical assistant, a clerical worker, a part-time dietician, a housekeeper or a pharmacist. Because of the evolution occurring in the nursing profession, the present-day nurse in many hospitals finds that the conditions that were once considered acceptable, are now thought of as intolerable. Today we see that although a strike, in the usual sense of the word, rarely if ever occurs in the nursing profession, one finds quite often a type of silent individual strike in which nurses drift away from a particular hospital or institution, away from the country and even away from the profession itself because they have found their wages and working conditions to be unacceptable.

It is this silent strike in a massive form that threatens Ontario's hospitals and their patients and it is in this light that the proposed legislation should be considered. The profession is interested in the prospects of increased pay and better working conditions, as well as the professionalism of nurses and their future role as part of the hospital team. As for the man on the street, his major interest is that competent nursing care be available wherever and whenever he is in need of it.

According to newspaper reports, the nursing profession itself is divided into two basic parts. The largest group by far is represented by the registered nurses association of Ontario. A smaller group is represented by a relatively new body known as the committee for the advancement of professional nurses. This body claims that the registered nurses association of Ontario is not truly representative of the nursing profession in that its guiding body is made up chiefly of nurses at the management level. Inasmuch as this body was chiefly responsible for the proposed legislation, there is some thought that it cannot fairly represent the rank and file of the nursing profession.

According to the committee for the advancement of professional nurses, a general duty nurse does not feel that she will be fairly represented at the bargaining table by senior nurses who have the power to hire, fire, promote and demote her. Her interests and theirs are different and are in open conflict. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, there are certain areas that the government, including the hon. Minister of Labour and the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond), should thoroughly investigate before this proposed legislation is proceeded with.

First, as stated previously, there should be sufficient investigation made to determine whether the registered nurses association of Ontario truly represents the rank and file in the profession. If it does not, then provision might be made in the Act for the association to be split or treated as two separate entities for bargaining purposes. Perhaps one entity could bargain on behalf of the supervisory or managerial nurse, and the other for the general duty nurse.

Second, I submit that the Act should be put under the control of The Department of Labour with the chairman of the Ontario labour relations board authorized to name arbitrators. This would prevent any actual or apparent conflict of interests on the part of the Minister of Health. He would not then be in the conflict position of being the same person who names arbitrators in nurses' disputes, while, at the same time, being responsible for hospitals and other institutions that hire nurses, and for the Ontario hospital services commission, which has the ultimate control over the budget of hospitals.

Mr. Chairman, the Liberal Party is in favour of any legislation that will improve the working conditions and bargaining rights of any professional group, including nurses. However, certain flaws in the proposed legislation have been pointed out to the government and it is our hope that the legislation will be re-examined in the light of these suggestions before it is implemented.

In considering various areas where The Department of Labour and the government as a whole might take some action to facilitate the advent of automation, I next propose, Mr. Chairman, to make some general observations on our arbitration procedure.

I note that the hon. Minister has said that Professor C. H. Curtis of the industrial relations centre of Queen's University will be making a study. While this is commendable, there is a feeling in the ranks of labour that if the compulsory feature of arbitration procedures as contained in The Labour Relations Act was dispensed with, the parties to an agreement would arrive at a settlement without bringing in the government through the Minister of Labour. In fact, some trade unions have established voluntary final settlement procedures without involving the government in any way. However, if the government insists that a final settlement clause must be contained in collective bargaining agreements, then the whole question of arbitration must, I submit, be re-examined. Under the conciliation procedure, which is also compulsory in Ontario, the government has made provision for the cost of the chairman and of the nominees. In the field of arbitration, I submit that the responsibility for the cost of arbitration should be provided for and that our arrangements for the supplying of qualified, impartial chairmen be improved. At the present time there is a distinct shortage of qualified people to act as chairmen of arbitration boards. Such work is done in Ontario by a handful of county court judges, some magistrates, some professors and, on some occasions, laymen. Still there is no provision for training new people in this important field.

Our submission is that if The Ontario Labour Relations Act is to continue to make it mandatory that provision be made for final and binding settlement of disputes arising during the life of the agreement, then the government should seriously consider recommendations, which have been made time and again by organized labour, that new people be found to be available as trained arbitrators and as qualified, impartial chairmen of arbitration boards.

Basic to this problem is the establishment of some kind of an organization that will be responsible for securing and training necessary personnel to work in this field. There are a number of trained persons available, but if their number proves inadequate, there are various sources from which suitable persons could be recruited; with a minimum of training, Ontario's arbitration needs could be supplied. The number of persons, it should be noted, who have endeavoured to and have succeeded in making a full-time occupation of conciliation or arbitration is very limited. It follows, therefore, that in order to procure the highest calibre of person required for this work, provision must be made by the government for a satisfactory guaranteed minimum income.

Having given consideration to securing a preliminary source of trained arbitrators, the next step would be the establishment of a group of trained personnel made up of an equal number of representatives of labour and management, with a neutral chairman for the development stages. Any name, such as the Ontario Arbitration Association, could be given to such a group. The group would initially go through the usual motions that provide for bylaws, requirements for membership and so forth, so that it might function.

The activities of the association would, in the main, be subsidized by the government. Management and union would pay membership fees for belonging to the association, and other incidental fees could be charged by the arbitrators who would be working out of the association for the provision of services, including research. In essence, the arbitration association would be responsible for securing suitable people who could be trained for arbitration-chairmanship jobs. It would bill the parties and be responsible for collecting the accounts. In time, the association would build up a file of all arbitration board reports, since the individual arbitrator would be required to file his report through the association, thus a complete library of case histories would be developed which, in itself, would be invaluable as a research tool for the securing of labour peace. The primary object of the association would be to aid in the development of a pool of people prepared to work in arbitration on a full-time basis. By having a number of permanent people in this field, it is felt that the long delays that now take place between the time a case is referred to arbitration, the hearing by the board and the actual receiving of the board's report would be minimized.

As for the actual training of competent arbitrators, it would seem that The Department of Labour could sponsor short, crash courses in evidence, court procedure, the understanding of The Arbitration Act and similar matters, so that the neophyte arbitrator would have a good basic training in the required areas. Subsequently, there could be set up an on-the-job or apprenticeship training programme where he would be assigned to an already established arbitrator, and would act as secretary to the board or assistant chairman in order to gain some practical experience before starting out on his own.

In this period of training the government could make provision for bursaries or scholarships as may be necessary, so that no qualified person who is interested in becoming a full-time arbitrator would be denied the right to achieve his wish. Once the arbitrator is able to go out on his own as a trained impartial chairman, it is proposed that he would be remunerated through a fee-for-service basis and, as a result, would have the opportunity of achieving earnings beyond the income guaranteed by the association. By this method, Mr. Chairman, it would be possible that a high calibre of person would be attracted to the profession of arbitration.

In concluding this portion of my remarks, Mr. Chairman, I would say that I have but briefly given this House some of the views of organized labour on the provision of a trained pool of arbitrators for industrial disputes.

Since it is most important that The Department of Labour and government of Ontario take all steps necessary to see that industrial disputes are kept to a minimum, in order that the benefits of automation might be maximized, we would urge the government to give consideration to this proposal.

Mr. Chairman, I would like now to move to several areas of legislation where the hon. Minister of Labour could use his influence on other departments of the government in an effort to see that labour strife is kept at a minimum in the months ahead.

First of all, I would like to say a few words about ex parte injunctions. With the coming of technological change it is almost certain that there will be periods of strife; in spite of the best efforts of the government, there are bound to be strikes and the threat of strikes during the period of adjustment. Aside from the fact that it is only fair that both sides to a dispute should be heard before a decision is arrived at, I would remind the government that labour has complained many times that the ex parte injunction has been used to limit picketing and, at times, to prohibit it.

Assuming that the role of the picket remains that of a person whose job it is to provide information to the public about the strike in progress, I would submit, and submit strongly, that for management to use the courts and the police force to maintain its position is most unfair.

Theoretically, the interim injunction was designed solely to maintain conditions in the same balance until the dispute between the parties could be settled. It was designed to avoid giving one of the parties to a dispute a chance of changing the situation. Many times, organized labour has complained that the use of the injunction in labour disputes, whether it prohibits all picketing or merely limits it, usually places the employer in a position to break the strike. Thus the balance is tipped in favour of management against the striking workers.

In an attempt, Mr. Chairman, to rectify this situation, it is suggested that question 17 of The Adjudicature Act be examined by the government and an amendment made so that an ex parte injunction would not be granted by the courts unless there was just cause for same. By this I mean that damage of some consequence must be proved, or a serious breach of the peace must be imminent.

On labour's side, the role of picketing should be limited so that entrances and exits from the premises are not blocked and that responsibility to keep the peace is recognized. I would suggest, therefore, that the government thoroughly examine the whole field of injunctions to see if a more equitable manner of granting injunctions could not be arrived at, so that the right to strike is not reduced to a sham and a farce.

Next, I would like to turn to runaway plants. Mr. Chairman, the cases are legion where a strike has been broken by a company merely selling out or moving, or sometimes moving without even taking the time to sell out. The Liberal Party, Mr. Chairman, feels that once a union is certified, such certification should cover its bargaining agency under all circumstances, including the period when operations are discontinued and resumed in another location in another part of the province.

We realize that there may be difficulties associated with proving that the new company is the same as the one which moved from the old location. However, the matter is such a vital one that certification should be extended as suggested.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to turn next to section 89 of The Labour Relations Act. It empowers any municipality to remove its employees from the protection of the Act. In 1958 the select committee on labour relations of the Ontario Legislature recommended that this section be repealed. This report was signed by the present hon. Minister of Labour, among others. Not only did the 1958 select committee on labour relations recommend that section 89 be repealed but more recently, in 1964, the Royal commission report on compulsory arbitration and disputes affecting hospitals and their employees made a similar recommendation.

The government has received numerous annual briefs from trades union bodies urging the repeal of this discriminatory law.

In the January, 1965, issue of the Ontario Hydro Employees' Union News mention is made of certain employees of the Perth public utilities commission, as follows:

Fourteen employees of the Perth public utilities commission decided they needed a union. Consequently, they joined the Canadian union of public employees.

I quote, Mr. Chairman, from the third page of the Ontario Hydro Employees' Union News where it says as follows:

No one wanted a strike. The men simply asked their employers to recognize their union and bargain for a collective agreement. Not wages, not hours or any of the usual demands were the issue in this fight. The issue was whether Perth PUC would have a union at all. "Over my dead body," was one commissioner's blunt reply to the first person the union asked.

From what I understand, the strike began in early July of 1962. As far as the union is concerned, the employees left the water tanks full of water and even left the floors clean. Above all, the public never suffered during the strike. Water and hydro services were never interrupted. The public utilities commission of Perth broke the strike by using every means possible.

Mr. Chairman, it is a sad state of affairs when men who have worked for 12, 15 and 17 years, who have given faithful and loyal service to their employers, should be in the position where they could not even buy a job now.

What is their crime, Mr. Chairman? Merely that they joined the union and tried to get some of the lowest of fringe benefits that go with an honest day's toil.

Section 89 is one of the most discriminatory and arbitrary pieces of legislation on the books. This party has always been opposed to section 89 and I would ask the hon. Minister of Labour if he would turn this research group of his on the problem. Any government that claims to be interested in the affairs of the public in general should be interested in the adverse effect of legislation such as in section 89 of The Ontario Labour Relations Act.

An hon. member: Good work!

Mr. Braithwaite: Mr. Chairman, I would like now to say a few words about industrial safety and health in the province of Ontario. First, Mr. Chairman, our party firmly believes that The Factory, Shop and Office Building Act should apply to all factories. There should be no exclusions. It may be said that this would require an unnecessary number of inspectors. This may be true, but our submission is that the health and safety of every worker in the province of Ontario is of paramount importance.

In connection with safety, Mr. Chairman, and in view of the fact that ordinarily a complaining union or worker has no recourse but to strike if The Industrial Safety Act is contravened, it is our submission that the hon. Minister of Labour should consider legislation containing minimum standards and provisions for government inspection to regulate things in connection with the following:

1. There should be a maximum set out for the amount of weight that an employee is required to lift.
2. Proper and adequate ventilation should be mandatory in all factories.
3. Provision should be made for the regulation of temperatures—particularly the heat—under which an employee may be required to work.
4. An efficient system of inspection should be set up to regulate dust and noise control in factories throughout the province. This is especially important in situations where large presses and heavy machinery are being operated and men may be growing progressively deaf.
5. Provision should be made for the furnishing of proper lunch rooms for employees to have their daily break and meals.

6. Materials such as epoxy which cause skin infections and irritations and the handling of said materials should be controlled by legislation so that the danger of injury to an employee is minimized.

7. Inspection should be frequent enough so that defective machinery and equipment are not permitted to operate and thereby endanger the safety of employees.

8. Shower facilities, particularly in hot, dirty factory jobs, should be required under law.

Mr. Chairman, here are some general comments on labour safety. In September, 1960, the Ontario federation of labour submitted a brief to the Royal commission on industrial safety in which the federation stated, and I quote:

The actual organization of government inspection and enforcing in the field of safety, and to some extent the content of existing statutes and regulations, prove that the need for government intervention is far from being effected. In fact, the bulk of the accident prevention function seems to be organized in such a way as to forestall effective public action in this area.

Mr. Chairman, in spite of improvements in legislation since 1960, the above fact still obtains, by and large. A study of the legislation and the administration of it in Ontario in connection with safety shows a lack of any single conscious approach to safety and health problems. Rules applying to some areas of safety originate in the Legislature, others in the Cabinet, and still others at the administrative level. The workmen's compensation board has another set of rules. The employers' accident prevention association may have still another set of rules and regulations.

The complaint, really, is not that there are too many rules, but that the rules that exist are not properly enforced. Interweaving of responsibilities among the various agencies of government, and the duplication of responsibility, in some cases makes it possible for one department to neglect certain problems merely by stating that they are not its responsibility. Even where inspections are carried out and enforcement orders are provided for, there is still need for better designed safety rules, more co-ordination of inspection services and better training and supervision of inspection.

Mr. Chairman, in connection with the construction safety branch, apparently the safety officers are supposed to be the liaison between the branch and the councils of all municipalities. They should be constantly engaged in the education and training of responsible officials at the municipal level, and they should always be available to advise and assist with the interpretation of the Act and regulations.

However, our main contention is that the whole field of construction safety should be taken out of the hands of the municipality and put into the control of the Ontario government—The Department of Labour.

The hon. Minister's recent blueprint, under the category of safety, calls for a reorganization of operations in the industrial safety field to increase efficiency and to help industry to reduce accidents through closer observance of the new Industrial Safety Act, which was assented to on March 25, 1964. The old statutes for factory inspection and engineering services were combined into a new organization, designated as the industrial safety branch, a high-sounding name indeed. A professional engineer with experience would direct the new branch.

Further, the blueprint recommends that the province is to be divided into three regions for safety inspection purposes, with a regional safety manager overseeing the activities of the field staff in each region. Lastly, it is apparent that supervising officers are to operate in the field in each region, to assist in training the industrial safety officers.

This sounds fine, Mr. Chairman, but we now come to what we consider to be one of the major defects in the government's whole approach to the idea of industrial safety. Organized labour has been complaining for years in the field of safety, to obtain better standards, more stringent penalties and stricter enforcement at the government level, and more authority for labour at the working level, especially where they hold bargaining rights. The problem has been examined from time to time in Ontario and the same old remedies seem to be popping up.

The promotion of industrial safety by the Ontario government is a typical example of the manner in which the Ontario Conservative government has succeeded in appearing to do an aggressive, first-rate job and at the same time managing to succeed in not interfering with the best interests of the employer, which it strives to uphold. Above all, the status quo must be maintained. This is the true criterion of any action which The Department of Labour and any other department bears in mind when changes are contemplated.

The labour safety council of Ontario, reporting in January of this year, recommended plant safety committees through which management and labour would jointly direct their efforts for the promotion of safety. There is no question but that labour has a vested interest in plant safety in addition to management; it is the workman who suffers most in an industrial accident.

If the hon. Minister of Labour was truly interested in improving the standard of safety legislation in this province, then it would seem that he would long ago have taken into account this recommendation and provided a vehicle whereby, in any particular plant, both management and labour would have an opportunity to direct requests or complaints to the inspectors involved.

However, Mr. Chairman, our submission is that if the hon. Minister is truly worried about the safety of the citizens of Ontario, one would think that the fines and penalties levied would be so severe that an offending employer would be dealt with as sternly as the drinking driver is in the criminal court.

I pose the question, Mr. Chairman: How often has the hon. Minister of Labour called for jail terms for offences under the safety laws? In that regard, Mr. Chairman, there are many who feel that those who are charged with the enforcement of safety regulations and laws, as well as many magistrates, look for reasons not to prosecute. And, further, these people give one the impression that they think, once the accident has happened, the matter is just left to die, often along with the victim.

If the hon. Minister wished to do something really constructive, he might have given some thought to making safety a more vital factor in Ontario. In this small way he could contribute to generating a better relationship between labour and management, which in itself can only be beneficial.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, Mr. Chairman, I wonder if this would be an appropriate time to move the adjournment of the debate?

Mr. Braithwaite: I have only four pages; I will be finished in a moment.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, there is a request from one of the hon. member's front bench members that the matter be accelerated.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Give him another five minutes.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That will be fine. Proceed.

Mr. Braithwaite: In the area of The Workmen's Compensation Act, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. Minister of Labour wishes to make an active contribution towards labour-management stability in the months to come, then we would strongly urge him to give some thoughts to the whole method of operation of the workmen's compensation board. Too often one hears comments such as, "the board gives too little and it gives it too late."

Mr. Chairman, it looks as if I may be longer than five minutes.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves that the committee of supply rise and report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report progress and asks for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, before asking you to recognize a motion to adjourn, may I say that tomorrow morning we will go to the order paper with the House in committee of the whole. We will deal with details of various bills, which are available for that purpose.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): No Budget debate?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: No, we will go to the committee of the whole House and, if necessary, we will then go to estimates, but I think that will be enough to occupy our entire morning in the committee of the whole House.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 5.35 o'clock, p.m.

Introduction of bills.

THE MUNICIPAL FRANCHISES ACT

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Municipal Franchises Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is just a very minor amendment to this Act to repeal a clause which provides that the Act does not apply to a bylaw of a county or township that is approved by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, could we revert to motions? I move, seconded by the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan), that the provincial auditor be authorized to pay the salaries of the civil service and other necessary payments, pending the voting of supplies for the fiscal year commencing April 1, 1965, such payments to be charged to the proper appropriations following the voting of supplies.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, it is my purpose to table the report of the Attorney General's committee on securities legislation. This committee was constituted in October, 1963, with the following terms of reference:

To review and report upon, in the light of modern business conditions and practices, the provisions and working of securities legislation in Ontario, and in particular to consider the problems of take-over bids and of "insider" trading, the degree of disclosure of information to shareholders, the requirements as to proxy solicitation, procedures as to primary distribution of securities to the public and like matters, and generally to recommend what, if any, changes in the law are desirable.

The members of the committee who made this report consist of J. R. Kimber, QC, as chairman; W. B. Common, QC; R. A. Davies, QC; C. W. Goldring; T. A. M. Hutchison, FCA; Professor H. I. Macdonald; H. C. F. Mockridge, QC; and J. S. Yoerger, QC. The committee was assisted by Mr. H. L. Beck and Mr. H. P. Crawford as secretaries and Professor M. L. Friedland as legal associate.

The report, Mr. Speaker, which consists of 101 pages, deals in a very comprehensive, and at the same time concise, manner with all items in the terms of reference. The report recommends extensive changes in the law and we are now considering the recommendations.

I have appointed a committee to advise me on how legislation could be brought forward, and when I receive the report of the committee I shall report further to this House. The committee at present is composed of the deputy Provincial Secretary as changes will be required in The Corporations Act; the deputy Attorney General; the legislative counsel and the chairman of the securities commission. It has been set up to advise on how the report could be implemented, and what time would be required to bring forth legislation.

I might say that I have not placed a copy of the report on the desk of every hon. member, but additional copies are available, and if any hon. member wishes a copy of the report, he may have same if he will indicate he would like to have one.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. Attorney General would permit a question? Does he believe that the report will be followed by changes in legislation in this session?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I have only had the report for a very brief time myself. There are, as I have mentioned in this presentation, extensive changes recommended. Since it will involve also The Corporations Act, I think it would be a mistake, perhaps, to attempt to do something suddenly which would deserve time and study. It is my thinking at this moment that possibly some recommendations might be implemented, but I would not think it possible, unless this session were to last longer than I think it may, to do properly the complete carrying out of the recommendations. I have the idea that it may be possible to bring about some changes in The Securities Act and possibly in The Corporations Act, but the matter is being studied immediately, and if it is possible to achieve a result of bringing forward legislation, we shall do so.

I would think that the hon. members of this House, and persons engaged in this activity in securities, would want to study the recommendations of the report and that this might take some little time.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, that being so, I wonder if the government would consider putting this on the order paper, so that we could debate the report. I can appreciate what the hon. Attorney General said, and I think it would be a mistake to rush into legislation. It is perhaps unlikely that we will see too much major legislation in regard to it, but I think this report, although I have just glanced at it, will be well worthy of discussion, and certainly I would suggest that perhaps it be put on the order paper to give us an opportunity to discuss the report at some length.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, we will see how this matter develops. We have not had a chance to study it either, but I understand the request and it will be given consideration.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The second order; committee of the whole House. Mr. W. E. Sanderoock in the chair.

CITY OF TORONTO

House in committee on Bill No. Pr19, An Act respecting the city of Toronto.

Sections 1 to 5, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 6:

Mr. T. L. Wells (Scarborough North): I would like to say a few words on section 6, Mr. Chairman, to register my disapproval of one of the principles which is initiated in this section. I understand that under this section, the new city hall in Toronto would become one of the only municipal headquarters in Ontario in which liquor licences could be obtained and liquor could be sold.

I emphasize the words "could be sold" because this does not guarantee that it would. They would still have to comply with all the ramifications of applying to the liquor licence board for a licence, but as I understand it at the present time there is only a cafeteria planned in this city hall, and this cafeteria is primarily for the use of the employees. I think to give the city of Toronto the right now to apply for a liquor licence for an employees' cafeteria is a principle with which I do not agree. And I would like to register my disapproval of this section.

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, on Section No. 6, I would also like to join with my colleague, the hon. member for Scarborough North in registering my objection to this.

In committee, it was suggested that in order to make excellent arrangements with the concessionaire it was necessary to have the right to serve liquor and alcoholic beverages. It seems to me that in ward three, where the city hall is located, there are more liquor outlets than anywhere else in the city of Toronto. We have no objection to liquor being sold in ward three. It seems too bad, Mr. Chairman, that it is necessary for the city hall to have a liquor licence in order that the employees, who are working in the city hall, should have the privilege of consuming liquor during working hours.

An hon. member: They can go out.

Mr. Reilly: Yes, they can go out from the city hall and there is no endorsement then from the standpoint of the city hall, there is nothing to prevent them from going across the road, to going north, to going east, or going west, if they wish to do so. But what happens in a case like this is that I think perhaps we are encouraging the city hall to sell alcoholic beverages during working hours. Personally, Mr. Chairman, and hon. members, I would have no objection if they wanted to have an exclusive restaurant on the top floor, say, and to serve liquor under those circumstances. I think it is a mistake for us to endorse a policy which permits alcoholic beverages to be consumed in the public cafeteria, and this is the request under this particular bill. If the bill was restricted to consuming alcoholic beverages after hours, or if it was restricted to an exclusive restaurant, it would be a different situation entirely.

I agree with the hon. member for Scarborough North, and would like at this particular time to register my opposition to it.

Mr. A. H. Cowling (High Park): Mr. Chairman, I think in connection with this section it should be pointed out that the city is asking permission to lease the restaurant facilities and reads something like this:

The corporation may sell or let the right to sell from year to year, or for any time not exceeding ten years, food, confectionery, tobacco and refreshments and, if licenced by the liquor licence board, liquor as defined in The Liquor Control Act, within the city hall and the Nathan Phillips Square under such conditions as the council may prescribe and provide facilities therefor providing that nothing herein shall be deemed to preclude the corporation, or any other person, from compliance with any law of the province of Ontario in effect in the area in which the city hall and Nathan Phillips Square are located relating to the sale, keeping, serving or consumption of liquor, and without limiting the foregoing from compliance with the provisions of The Liquor Licence Act respecting the issues of licences or permits for such sale, keeping, serving or consumption of liquor.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the city will be leasing this property, and it will be up to the people who do the leasing to apply in the usual way, I suppose, for a licence. There is no guarantee of that, of course.

I think that in order to encourage people—that is, the public—to use the facilities that may be in the city hall, I think this is a very reasonable request. It certainly was not my understanding that employees of the city hall are going to be spending time in some place where drinks are provided. I think that is out of the question. But from time to time we know, and we do it here, we have visitors, we have deputations, we have committee meetings, we have other people coming to visit the city hall from time to time, and it is very convenient and it is very handy, and in some cases very hospitable, to be able to serve this kind of refreshment.

I think it must also be pointed out, Mr. Chairman, that this city hall in Toronto is a most unusual one. I suppose it is the only one of its kind in the world and it is certainly a little different from most other city halls in the province of Ontario. The public seem to demand this kind of service, and I think to be in line with the modern thinking insofar as this building is concerned, and the fact that the person who makes arrangements for the provision of food and refreshment will be leasing the property from the city—from the council—I cannot see that there is any conflict here at all. Although, as you know, I have some reservations about my own local situation—and it might seem odd for me as the member representing High Park in the city of Toronto, which is a dry area, to be speaking in this way about the city hall—I think it is quite justified because the two situations are not related in any way.

The council voted to have this section in the bill, they voted unanimously for it, I understand, and I would urge all hon. members to support it.

Mr. Reilly: There is just a point there that perhaps should be corrected. As I recall, the report which was submitted to the committee, did not receive a unanimous decision of council, it was something like about 13 against 9. It was very close amongst the members of city council.

The thought expressed by the hon. member for High Park is that perhaps it would not be used by the employees in the city hall. I do not know how he can read that into this, if a licence is granted, and it is a public cafeteria, and those people are there, and you grant them permission to drink, how you are going to deny them the right. So we either have to accept or reject the proposition. This is the only place, to my knowledge, operated by a government, federally or provincially or municipally, where they are going to permit the consumption of alcoholic beverages.

If this is going to be the trend, if we are going to allow all municipalities—and there is no reason why we should not—if we are going to permit the city of Toronto municipal building to sell alcoholic beverages, there is no reason under those circumstances why every municipality should not be granted the same licence privilege, if they want it.

I am suggesting that it is a type of legislation that the hon. members of this government at this particular time should be cautious about adopting. I think it is a dangerous piece of legislation to enact at this particular time.

Mr. Cowling: Mr. Chairman, I have a little more confidence in the staff at the city hall. I do not think they are in the habit of frequenting drinking places at noon hour. Even though the stuff might be available, I certainly do not feel that it would be overdone, because they have work to do every afternoon. Another thing, too, is that we must keep in mind that no other municipalities have applied for this, and if they do, it can be considered at that time.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, I would like to make one brief comment: I am not going to enter into debate as to the merits or demerits of drinking at the city hall. I am not interested in that. But I have listened to spokesmen of this government for years, from the front benches to the back benches, talking about the desirability of leaving as great a measure of autonomy as possible at the local level. Suddenly there emerges from this same area this contradictory voice that we are going to regulate the decision that the city council has debated at considerable length and come to its own conclusion. This is Big Brother; this is 1984 carried pretty far. I think it is about time that some of the people on the government benches became a little more consistent in their logic and their thinking on issues of this nature.

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Chairman, if there is somebody who is going to be consistent, it should be the hon. member for York South.

Mr. MacDonald: I am.

Mr. Reilly: Just a short time ago, perhaps within this last year, the same thing happened with the city of Toronto when it brought a bill before this Legislature to amend the Maple Leaf Gardens, to make an extension and an encroachment onto Carlton Street. He was one who at that particular time felt that he should interject and vote against it and oppose it. In one case he says we should leave it to the municipality itself to offer whatever solution is necessary, in the other case, he says we should interfere.

So if it is a question of being consistent, I think perhaps the hon. member for York South should be consistent.

Mr. MacDonald: This could go on and on, but I would hate to see this little revolt in the Tory back benches remain there. This is a pity, but just let me draw attention to the fact that in the instance of the other case, the issue was quite different. What we were asked to do, was to put our approval on a decision to violate the law after pressure from influential people in the community. I do not think we should approve the violation of the law. That is a completely different kind of situation to the one we are debating this morning.

Mr. Reilly: What the hon. member for York South is saying is that if we have a private bill that comes in from the city of Toronto, it does not concern us and we should be rubber stamps in connection with it. I am a member of the committee that deals with this matter. I think I will have to deal with it as it comes forward.

Mr. MacDonald: I did not say that at all.

Mr. Chairman: Is section 6 carried?

Mr. A. J. Reaume (Essex North): Mr. Chairman, I want to say only one thing, that if the mayor and the board of control and the aldermen want it and have voted for it, then I am for the bill. We have it at the airports. Those buildings are operated by governmental agencies and I was thoroughly impressed while I was in England, of all places, that you would find a bar in a police station.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): What were you doing in a police station?

Mr. Reaume: I just want to say again that in all my experience, and this has covered a vast area, I really have never found anybody, and that includes a lot of my hon. friends on both sides of the House and in other places as well; you do not really have to hold anybody down on the floor to pour drinks into them. I feel like my hon. friend from High Park: I have faith and confidence in people who are employed there and I do not think they are going to spend all their time sitting around a bar, drinking at noon, getting overloaded; so I am for the bill.

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Chairman, surely the hon. member for Essex North is not suggesting that there is any comparison between the airport and a public building and a public cafeteria.

Mr. Reaume: I certainly am.

Mr. Reilly: Certainly it is no comparison whatsoever.

Mr. Reaume: I do not know if my hon. friend was ever at an airport or not.

Mr. Reilly: Many of them.

Mr. Reaume: Were you? Well then, if you were, you would find people who are working for governmental agencies, many of them.

Mr. Reilly: Operating a business!

Mr. Reaume: Operating a what?

Mr. Reilly: A business, a commercial venture; no comparison at all.

Mr. Reaume: We do not agree.

THE USED CAR DEALERS ACT, 1964

House in committee on Bill No. 6, An Act to amend The Used Car Dealers Act, 1964.

On section 1:

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, when the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) introduced this bill for first reading I asked him whether or not the appeal procedures as established in the other sections of The Used Car Dealers Act would in fact apply to this control over advertising. His reply was that he thought it would.

When we got the bill into committee, a careful examination of the Act made it quite clear that there was no such appeal procedure. In answer to questions posed to the hon. Attorney General and to his officials at that time, they in fact confirmed this conclusion that was advanced to them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we had quite a fuss in this chamber a year ago in connection with the whole problem of putting power in the hands of nameless and faceless civil servants who could make arbitrary decisions which could affect the businesses and lives and freedom of individuals who reside in the province of Ontario. As a result of that, the provisions of several statutes that had been introduced by the government were very substantially changed. But in a year's time the government is reverting back to this arbitrary type of legislation and is suggesting that a person called the registrar, who no one really knows and no one can identify, can immediately order the cessation of material in an advertisement that he, in his opinion—and his opinion may be all wrong—that he in his opinion concludes is misleading or deceptive.

Mr. Chairman, it may well be, and I think it should be, that along with control of used car dealers there should be control vested in someone concerning advertising. But in those controls that this House approved of a year ago, there were ample appeal procedures written into the Act to eliminate all suggestion of governmental officials acting in an arbitrary manner without giving the person who was accused an opportunity to appear and argue his case, an opportunity to be represented by counsel, an opportunity to take his case from one authority to a higher authority. All those safeguards were written into those Acts and into The Used Car Dealers Act.

As I say, Mr. Chairman, hardly a year has passed when we see the same sort of mentality in the writing of whoever was responsible for the drafting of this Act bringing back an amendment to be inserted into one of these Acts. If this one goes through, we will hear in a year's time: Will you approve—we have got it in The Used Car Dealers Act, the registrar and his opinion can do it—why not put it in The Mortgage Brokers Act and why not put it in The Police Act and why not put it in this other Act?

Once this precedent is created and we have a nameless, faceless civil servant who in his opinion comes to some conclusion and can make these arbitrary orders, then, I suggest, Mr. Chairman, you have taken a serious step in abridging the rights of citizens of this province. There is a way that this can be done, and the hon. Attorney General knows how it can be done, and we are not objecting to controlling advertising. But we are objecting to giving this inordinate control to a civil servant who, once this statute passes, if it does, can exercise just his opinion and can be as arbitrary as he wants to and from his decisions there are no appeals, no method of dealing with it at all.

For those reasons, Mr. Chairman, I do not think that section one should pass, and if section one does not pass, then I do not think there is any purpose in the bill. Certainly we are going to oppose the passing of section one unless there are the appeal procedures written into this section.

Mr. MacDonald: May I ask the hon. Attorney General a question? I am not a member of the committee to which this was referred and, therefore, I did not have the benefit of the discussion there.

My question is this: Is the hon. member for Downsview correct—that there are no appeal procedures at all, or do the general appeal procedures from the rest of the Act apply to this section when it becomes incorporated into the statute?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I was about to rise, in any event, to clear this point. I think the hon. member for Downsview is well aware that the procedures for appeal and review of the acts of the registrar in The Used Car Dealers Act are all there, the same or very similar on all fours, let us say, with those in The Mortgage Brokers Act and those other supervisory types of Acts. They are all there.

With respect to this specific power which is given in section one of Bill No. 6, that is the control of advertising—the right to say that such advertising shall not be published—there is not a specific section saying that this action of the registrar shall be appealed, but all the appeal procedures, as in all the other similar Acts reviewing the acts of the registrar, run through The Used Car Dealers Act as I recall it. I actually have not got The Used Car Dealers Act in front of me.

Mr. Singer: I have just sent for it.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think we have those there and I feel certain I am correct—I will have my copy of the Act in a moment, too—that any action of the registrar which affects the licence—the issuing or the cancellation of a licence—of a dealer is subject to review.

So in my opinion, speaking at the moment, if the instructions from the registrar “Do not publish this particular advertisement,” are disobeyed, I presume this would call into question the right to have a licence and to carry on business. The whole matter then would be subject to review.

Mr. Singer: It might, but it might not. It might not have any relation to it.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I will check now that I have the Act in front of me. I believe that all the powers of review are in that Act.

Mr. Singer: This was argued very extensively before the committee. The Act was there and the hon. Attorney General's deputy admitted quite definitely that there were no appeal procedures. For the hon. Attorney General to say that if this order of the registrar was disobeyed, there probably would be a licence cancellation for which there is an appeal, just evades the issue.

If your registrar wants to be arbitrary and comes to the conclusion that he wants to pick on X, he can say that every one of his advertisements are no good. He can effectively put him out of business in that way, as well as taking any one of the other actions which are appealable.

But on this one there is absolutely no appeal unless the hon. Attorney General is prepared to disagree with the legal argument I put forward at the committee, and with the opinion of his deputy. He is begging the question, because here you are giving to this man absolute power, if in his opinion the advertisement does the things that are cited.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I now have the Act before me. The Used Car Dealers Act, which is chapter 121.

Mr. Singer: I am sorry, I have not got it and there does not seem to be a copy there.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Chapter 121, 1964. This is the Act on which we spent a very great deal of time last year. It was proclaimed early this year to come into effect in the first part of the year with section three—the one which prohibited anyone carrying on without a licence—coming into effect, I believe, on the 31st day of this month. Section 16 of The Used Car Dealers Act, the marginal note is Review. The section reads:

Any person whose registration, or right to register, is affected by a decision of the registrar may, by notice in writing served upon the registrar within 30 days after delivery of the notice, request a hearing and review of the matter by the director.

Mr. Singer: This is not registration, this is advertising.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Let me continue for a moment. Then it goes on in that same section with procedures on that review by the director. Then in section 17, where the director has reviewed a decision and given his decision upon the review, the person who requested the review may appeal to a justice of appeal of the court of appeal, and then it provides the way that appeal shall be carried forward.

Mr. Singer: But again, that is in relation to registration.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am quite aware of that, but I do say this, the procedures which we provided in The Used Car Dealers Act and with which I think many hon. members—certainly the hon. member for Downsview and the hon. member for York South—discussed in committee and in this House last year, provided all those procedures of appeal and review. What the hon. member is saying is that on the simple direct matter of advertising as provided in this proposed amendment, that the decision of the registrar when he forbids a particular piece of advertising to be published, that that particular item as such, is not subject to appeal and I admit that. But I say that any action of the registrar which affects the licensing or the registration of a dealer, is subject to all the procedures of review and appeal, and I submit that at some point you must have, as this amendment provides, an authority in the registrar or in some official under the Act—in this case it is the registrar—to say “No, that is false, and it must not be published.” That is first of all.

Now on the appeal, if, as I say, the dealer proceeded in the face of that, he could call in question, through the procedures now in the Act, the actions of the registrar. That is my view.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I pose the very simple case that a registrar, who again I say is a nameless and faceless civil servant, who comes to the conclusion that he just does not like used car dealer X, is not going to put himself in the position where he is going to make a decision that is going to be appealable. So the best way of getting used car dealer X out of business is to refuse every one of his advertisements. Should the dealer contravene the order of the registrar, then he subjects himself to all the penalties that are in the Act in section 19:

Every person who fails to comply with any order or direction or other requirement made under this Act—and one of them now would be this order as to advertising:

is guilty of an offence on a summary conviction, is liable to a fine of not more than $2,000 or a year in gaol or both.

If it is a corporation, it is $25,000.

I am not disagreeing with the hon. Attorney General that advertising should be controlled. If he is concerned about the wording of this, the advertising could be controlled and not be allowed until the appeal has taken place. But since we fought this thing out a year ago and determined, that to be reasonable and fair to the people who were going to be affected, to exercise this sort of control and there had to be appeal procedures built into each one of these Acts. Surely the government, just a year later, is not going to abandon this principle and give to this nameless, faceless civil servant the power to make these arbitrary opinions when in his opinion—and that is all it is—when in his opinion something is wrong. If this is what the government believes—that the government wants to go back to this type of legislation—mark my words, if they do, it will only be a question of time till we have amendments to another statute and another statute. The government members will stand up and say: “Well you approved of it in The Used Car Dealers Act, why not have it in this Act?”

You erode civil rights, you erode the opportunity of persons to defend themselves, to be dealt with in a fair and reasonable manner; and you really are destroying civil rights. The whole principle of Bill No. 99 is back before us now. The government is threatening again to take this sort of action.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to argue the case in what may be the exaggerated terms of the hon. member for Downsview at the moment. Quite frankly, I am trying to think my way through this, because I agree the rights of the individual have to be protected. On the other hand, this involves not so much the right of the individual as it does the means to get at the people who are really “con” men and who are engaged in advertising for the purpose of bilking the public. They have been getting away with it for years. I am anxious to make certain that we come to grips with this.

Mr. Chairman, I think I am correct—and I should have taken a look at the federal food and drug statute—but I believe I am correct that this is essentially the situation in the federal food and drug legislation. This, nameless and faceless, if you will, civil servant comes to the conclusion that certain advertising is not in the public interest, as spelled out in the Act or in its regulations and the guillotine falls, there is just no advertising.

Now the other interesting argument—

Mr. Singer: No, the hon. member is not quite correct there.

Mr. MacDonald: Why not?

Mr. Singer: There can be an order but then there has to be, in The Food and Drug Act, there has to be a prosecution. If X has contravened the provisions of The Food and Drug Act a charge is laid against him about the contravention. In this case, the charge would be laid against the person who offends by publishing. It is a very substantial difference.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I am not a lawyer and I am not familiar with that Act, but my understanding was that in The Food and Drug Act if in effect an instruction is given in the first instance from that department, then if they want to proceed—

Mr. Singer: They can argue the merits of the advertising before the judge. But here they cannot.

Mr. MacDonald: Let me give another example to illustrate the point that was in my mind.

I was interested in the argument of those who are opposed to this bill altogether, and if the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha) were here we would have a divided voice from the Liberal benches on this issue, because there is no doubt that he is opposed to it.

I was interested in the argument of The Toronto Daily Star editorially in this connection. Their argument was that this was not something that the government should get into, at all. Indeed, they tried to make their point by contending that their regulations were even tougher than what the government was proposing because they quoted—I believe on a CKEY interview—the hon. Attorney General as saying that they were not going to make it necessary in advertising to say that the used car had formerly been a taxi so that the prospective used car buyer would be aware of the fact that he was getting a former taxi. In the Toronto Daily Star apparently they do make it necessary that if former taxis are being sold this must be specified in the ad.

Now, the interesting thing is that the Toronto Daily Star in the case of certain used car dealers in this city, are in effect saying, "We will take none of your ads." Now here is censorship. Here is really a guillotine censorship—"We just will not touch it."

The problem for us at the legislative level is that down the street there is another paper that will take the same ad. I invite people to take a look at the ads. In fact, Ron Haggart, in the same Toronto Daily Star, has been doing a magnificent job, showing just why you must have legislation with teeth in it. The very advertising that the Toronto Daily Star will not take, the Telegram is printing. It is certainly the kind of advertising which, in my view should not be tolerated.

I am apprehensive if there is any genuine infringement on the rights of the individual, but there comes a very delicate point when you are seeking to regulate those people who are skating on thin ice all the time, and deliberately so. When you have to catch the people who are deliberately trying to bilk the public, you try not to let them hide behind their so-called civil liberties, because their so-called civil liberties, in their view, are to be able to go out and bilk the public.

This is the case as far as some of these used car dealers are concerned. I know from my investigations in some depth on this issue a year or so ago in talking to the people in the Better Business Bureau, that they have a committee which has worked with the newspapers. Some of the people, such as Ted Williamson, have been repeatedly brought before this committee. But this did not make any difference. He just came up with another gimmick, as imaginative in its capacity to hoodwink the public as the one which he may or may not have been persuaded to jettison when he came before this particular committee.

In other words, what you have is a small—not a large—group, but you have a group that is deliberately trying to mislead the public. This group should not be permitted to hide behind the argument that it is their civil right to continue to do this kind of thing.

I am still persuaded that this bill is a satisfactory bill. If we find that somebody is being unfairly treated, or his right is being unfairly encroached upon, I will be the first one a year from now to come in here and say that experience is proving that we have not adequately protected; but at the moment I am interested in catching these people who have been operating too long in this fashion.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence (St. George): Mr. Chairman, I am in the rather unusual position this morning where I want to agree with all three speakers.

First of all, I agree with the hon. member for Downsview when he says at the moment there is no appeal procedure definitely written into the Act to deal with the decision of the registrar in such a case where he forbids certain advertising, or certain advertising material.

Second, I agree with the hon. Attorney General when he says that it was the intention of the framers of this Act that any major decision of the registrar should be reviewable by the director, and the director's reviews are even appealable then to the court. As I understand the situation, the administrative procedure at the moment is actually that the decisions are reviewable, and this falls into the general intention and the way the Act is administered at the moment.

I also agree with the hon. member for York South when he says there is a definite need for this type of legislation. I know we have had several instances brought before us on the select committee on consumer credit, which definitely cry out for the need of this type of legislation.

I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if I could suggest to the hon. Attorney General therefore that this bill should be amended so that there is no doubt at all that the present intent of the framers of the bill as a whole, and the present administrative procedure in the department at the moment, is actually safeguarded by some legislative enactment which will guarantee that these decisions of the registrar are appealable—are reviewed—by the director. Then these in turn would follow the general appeal procedures actually followed at this time.

If we already do it at the moment administratively, I do not see why these rights are not guaranteed in the actual bill itself. Therefore, if I may, I would suggest to the hon. Attorney General that we adjourn this particular consideration of the bill so that we can all take another look at it.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand at the moment the Statutes of Ontario, 1962-63. I am referring to The Mortgage Brokers' Registration Act, chapter 85.

If the hon. members would observe the language of section 1 of the bill before them, I would like them to compare it with this language which is lifted, I may say, word for word from the same context exactly as in The Mortgage Brokers' Registration Act.

Section 5 of The Mortgage Brokers' Registration Act, chapter 85 of the Statutes of Ontario, 1962-63—here is the language:

Where in the opinion of the registrar any person registered under this Act is making false, misleading or deceptive statements in any advertisement, circular, pamphlet or similar material, the registrar may order the immediate cessation of the use of such material.

That is exactly the same language, in every word, as now.

Let me say this: The Mortgage Brokers Act has worked well. This was an amendment added to it in 1962-63 and I am proposing now to add an amendment to The Used Car Dealers Act. Let me say further that I do not agree with the hon. member for Downsview that section 16 is not in this language, describing an act of the registrar which does not affect or may affect, the licence of the dealer. The language is:

Any person whose registration, or whose right to register is affected by a decision of the registrar.

I believe that the preventing of an advertisement or the order of prohibition from advertising can certainly be said to affect the rights of that dealer to carry on business.

In any event, it is exactly the same as the hon. members of this House have adopted in the past and what we have tried out in experience, and I suggest that nobody's rights have been unduly affected or taken away by giving to the registrar the right to say—somebody must have this right—"This advertisement is false and misleading; do not publish it."

We have used it. It has worked well and all the provisions of review, and appeal of The Mortgage Brokers Registration Act are to be found in The Used Car Dealers Act; they are all there and they have all worked well. I would suggest to this House that it pass this bill.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Attorney General confirms one of the arguments that I was making. Once a section like this is cut away from a statute and is brought forward again in a different statute, it is always going to be argued, as the hon. Attorney General argued just a few minutes ago: It is in The Mortgage Brokers Act, therefore what is wrong with putting it in The Used Car Dealers Act and within this Act and that Act?

The fact that it got through in 1962 and 1963, and, I would suggest, wrongly then, as it is wrongly now, does not now make it right.

I want to clear up one more thing. I am sure the hon. member for York South did not want it implied in the objections that we are making, that we do not believe there should be any control of advertising. Let me make it abundantly clear; there should be control of advertising in this field. We think it is reasonable and we think it is logical, but the thing that concerns me is the appeal procedure.

It may be that there has been no problem in The Mortgage Brokers Act, but there is the possibility that there could be a problem. We do not know whether, this year or next year or five years from now, there will be some registrar of mortgage brokers or used car dealers who is going to be arbitrary and unfair, and I think that the public are entitled to be protected against arbitrary and unfair actions of any civil servant.

The suggestion of the hon. member for St. George is eminently fair and eminently reasonable and I cannot see any possible basis on which the hon. Attorney General should say that there should not be an appeal procedure. His curious, and I emphasize this, his curious argument is around the wording of section 16 saying that this involves appeal procedure—I am surprised, I am really surprised that the hon. Attorney General would attempt to take one word and argue in this way. He knows, as well as any legal member of the House certainly, that this is an argument that would not stand up in court for two seconds. If he sent his officials into court to argue this, they would be thrown out before they opened their books.

It is a ridiculous argument. The hon. Attorney General knows it. His deputy agreed in committee with the argument that I am presenting now. The hon. member for St. George made the same argument in committee; this is a very simple matter but the important point is that it is a matter of principle.

Control the advertising, yes, but if it is going to be put in the hands of a civil servant, allow appeal procedures which will protect the public against the arbitrary use of those powers. It is simple; it is clear cut; it is fair and it is reasonable, and I do not see any reason why the government should not accept it.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Chairman, I just want to say that I did not get into this argument in the committee; unfortunately I was unable to be there.

Mr. Wells: Mr. Chairman, I am not a lawyer, and perhaps it is a little more difficult for me to weave my way through some of the legal technicalities here, but it seems to me that the case the hon. Attorney General has presented, in this situation, is the one that is right.

I would agree fully with what the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. MacDonald) said, and with what others have said; we all agree that there is a need for control of this type of advertising.

Mr. Chairman, We have brought up the name of a used car dealer who operates in the township of Scarborough, some of whose advertising Ron Haggart, I think, has very excellently exposed. This advertising is accepted by some papers in the city of Toronto, and yet refused by others because of a voluntary code of standards to which all the newspapers give lip service without adhering to it.

I looked the other day at a few advertisements in last Saturday's Telegram and here is one, for instance:

We sell government inspected cars. All our cars are inspected by The Department of Transport and bear the seal of approval clearly displayed on the windshield.

And this is only part of the advertising that is inserted in some newspapers every week, and when this is looked at, I think you will agree that there needs to be some type of regulation of advertising.

As the hon. member for York South has said, we always want to insert things in here that help the people who are really out to try to fleece the public, and they are just looking for all these little ways that can make it easier for them to continue to carry on this type of advertising.

As I see it, what the hon. Attorney General said is that if any one of these dealers feels that he has been wronged by the registrar—if the registrar calls him up or writes him and says: "This advertising that you have inserted does not meet with out approval. We are asking you to withdraw it"—if that person feels that he has been wronged, he can say: "I disagree with you." He can leave that advertising in and then the whole question of his licence comes into question—

Mr. Singer: No, sir, it does not at all.

Mr. Wells: That is what the hon. Attorney General said—

Mr. Singer: He did not say that. If he has committed an offence under the Act he can be fined $5,000 or a year in jail; they are both for disobeying the order.

Mr. Wells: There is an appeal procedure in there then; his licence comes into question and there is an appeal procedure. This is a very important matter then and it means that if someone has been wronged, he can then carry out this procedure; but it is a type of procedure that he is not going to take lightly. In other words these fellows that know they have made a mistake are not going to try to skirt around it. They are going to have to think very carefully if they are going to contravene this order. If they do think they have been wronged, they can contravene it but their licence then comes into question and then all appeal procedures apply. This is the way that I understand it and I think it is eminently right in this situation.

Mr. Reilly: Before the hon. member leaves that point, Mr. Chairman, would the hon. Attorney General clarify that point, because this is of concern to many of us in committee.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The hon. member who has just spoken stated my opinion quite correctly.

Mr. A. F. Lawrence: Mr. Chairman, on that particular point—unless the hon. member is going to speak on that particular point—let us take an example. Say an urban morning newspaper hits the streets at 9.30 or 10 o'clock in the evening, with an extremely misleading newspaper advertisement from a used car dealer. I am just using this as an example. This advertisement could then immediately be brought to the attention of the registrar, and the registrar then would, presumably, immediately communicate with two people; first, the newspaper itself and, second, the person who placed the advertisement, in an attempt to have the dealer immediately issue instructions to prevent that advertisement from appearing in the morning editions of that newspaper.

Let us say it is a matter of such urgency, and I would suggest to you that it would have to be, otherwise the registrar should not act in this way—but let us say that it is a matter of such urgency that it should not appear in those morning editions, and supposing the dealer himself is unavailable, as some of these people have made themselves so to be in previous circumstances such as this, the only outfit that can prevent that newspaper advertisement from appearing then is, presumably, the newspaper itself.

We are not talking here about the cancellation of any licence, or anything affecting the licence of the dealer himself. The only way it could possibly be done is to have that advertisement yanked out, and the dealer may not know anything about it because it may be impossible to reach him. Therefore, how can this possibly affect that dealer's registration or his licence? Yet he should have the right of appealing this. I would suggest—I do not want to make the amendment at all—I would suggest that section 1 could be amended by adding to 18A, some wording such as this at the end of it:

And any such orders shall be reviewable under the appeal provision of section 16, and subsequent sections hereof.

I do not want to make that amendment myself, but I would hope that if such an amendment in those terms would be acceptable to the government and to the hon. Attorney-General, it would clear up the whole situation. As I understand it at the moment, the intent is that any of these decisions by the registrar are reviewable in any event, and there can be circumstances where it is quite urgent that these advertisements be yanked and be yanked immediately. We have seen some of them in the last two months here, some from the Danforth Avenue used car lots. I would think that in such an urgent matter as that—it would presumably only be in such an urgent matter—the registrar should act, in any event. But if he should act, it certainly should be appealable and this would not necessarily affect the registration or the licence of the used car dealer himself.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question—

Mr. Chairman: This gentleman has been up.

Mr. Young: Sorry.

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Chairman, the fact that there has been so much argument over this section, whether there is a right in appeal or not, is to me evidence that there is going to be a great deal of argument after a few years have gone by, or a case arising from this particular section comes before the courts.

It is all well and good for the hon. Attorney-General to say what his intention is, or what he thinks, but the real intent must appear on the face of the bill. If you appear in magistrate's court, you have no opportunity to quote Hansard. There are rare occasions where you are allowed to use Hansard, maybe in a constitutional case before the Supreme Court of Canada. But very, very rarely are you allowed by a judge or a magistrate to read Hansard into the court record to try to show what the intent was at the time the bill was passed.

I am surprised that the hon. Attorney General, who to date has always appeared such a reasonable man, is so stubborn on this point. I have been one who has believed that something should be done to protect the consumer, and certainly something should be done to bring about protection of the consumer from the used car dealers. At the same time, we must not go whole hog and not allow the private businessman, the used car dealer, or anybody else, protection from government.

This is our one great objection, that there is a great question of whether there is a right of an appeal. And why can not the hon. Attorney General accept the suggestion of the hon. member for St. George? I, for one, know that there is a great deal of disagreement among lawyers as to whether there is a right of appeal or not.

The hon. Attorney General's argument might be right. The argument of the hon. member for Downsview might be right. Why can not we in this Legislature be certain that there is a right of appeal, because there is no certainty. If we are going to get into this type of argument before the legislation is even passed, what in the world is going to happen when a few thousand lawyers start to argue over the section when we get to the various courts?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Would the hon. member permit me to say something at this stage?

Mr. Trotter: Yes, certainly.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I admit to some stubbornness, particularly when I feel that I am right. I think there is no question but what this decision of the registrar would, in the proceedings of the Act as I have stated, be subject to review, and be subject further to appeal.

But since there seems to be such doubt on the point among some hon. members of the House, I certainly have no objection to section 1, as proposed in the bill, having words added to it which would amend it; something to the effect that such decision shall be subject to review and appeal as set forth in sections 16 and 17—something like that.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, could I ask the hon. Attorney General a question? The matter we want to get at here is the protection of the public; this is fundamental. We want the public to be protected against this kind of advertising and protected quickly, by action of the official concerned. Now, does this amendment mean that the advertisement can run until the appeal procedure is carried through? If it does, then of course the whole intent of the legislation is frustrated. It would seem to me that if the registrar can act, the advertisement can be yanked, and then the appeal go forward, it would make some sense. Otherwise, it is frustrating the whole intent.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Such language as is here proposed, with the suggested amendment providing for review of this decision, I would say would not, of itself, make it absolutely essential that the advertising must stop while the review and the appeal were going forward. I think a dealer could assert his right to carry on.

We could put language in which would say, "and while such review is being taken, the advertisement shall not be published." But I think we need not go to the point of spelling out details to this extent in the Act.

I offer an example: A dealer publishes an advertisement. The registrar says, "That is false, that is misleading, cancel it, do not publish it again." Or perhaps as the hon. member indicated, he might not immediately get the dealer, but I think he would suggest to the newspaper—we have found the newspapers very co-operative, very anxious to assist in the other similar Acts—that the advertisement should not be published.

Now if the dealer was notified and he continued to put it in, he would jeopardize himself under the sections of this Act to the point of having his licence taken away, having disobeyed the decision of the registrar. If it were upheld on review and on appeal, he would be subject to a substantial fine, with the cancellation of his licence and all the penalties which are in The Used Car Dealers Act.

I think we need not concern ourselves with carrying the Act out to that very detail as to whether the ad may run or may not run. I think any dealer who would run that risk, would be such a man that he would not be in business. And I think if he did run that risk, and the registrar's decision was upheld, he would certainly be out of business.

Clerk of the House: The amendment proposed by the hon. Attorney General is as follows:

That to 18A as printed in section one, the words be added after the word material:

And any such order shall be reviewable under the appeal provisions of section 16 and subsequent sections hereof.

Mr. Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, just before it does!

There are many ramifications to this. I did not attend the legal bills committee and I have not had the benefit of their arguments, but I have some very firm ideas about the protection of individual rights. I also agree with the statements made by the hon. members of the New Democratic Party that, as always, we have to balance two items, one against the other. Both are in the public domain and both concern the rights of individuals.

What, I wonder, is this: If we introduce an appeal—and perhaps the hon. Attorney General has the answer to this, or perhaps some of you who have gone into this and are recommending this right of appeal, is the man who publishes what in the opinion of the registrar is false and misleading advertising and is then told to stop; he refuses and he can appeal against the form of the advertisement; would that appeal prevent the registrar from attacking his licence when he is continuing to do what the registrar says is false and misleading? Could we then get into a series of appeals where his licence could not be affected until the appeal on the actual wording of the advertisement was disposed of? In this event, you are going to institute a course of legalistic actions which might have the effect, in my opinion, of nullifying what we are trying to attempt in the legislation.

Mr. Singer: In the meantime, he has accomplished his purpose.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Perhaps the hon. Attorney General could satisfy me on this point before the motion is put.

Maybe I should repeat the point. It is simply this.

We have introduced a new area of appeal. The appeal is from the actual form of the advertisement as put in the newspaper. One man says it is false and misleading, the man who puts it in the paper says it is not. This must go to some third party to decide.

Now, my point is this. Once that appeal is taken on the form of the advertisement would this prevent the registrar from then moving against the licence of the man? That is, the ultimate control we have, if he is doing things badly. Does the whole course of action have to wait upon the settlement of the appeal on the form of the advertisement, or can we trust to the position taken by the hon. Attorney General?

And that would be this: If I were a used car dealer and put an ad in the paper and the registrar said, "Stop, it is false and misleading"; and I said "No, it is not"; we are then in dispute. This affects my licence, because if I do not obey him he is going to cancel it. I then would be able to appeal directly to the director, if that is the person concerned, saying if the registrar is right and I am wrong then he is in a position to cancel my licence because I am doing what he has told me not to do.

I just wonder if the introduction of another step of appeal will weaken the control that we are seeking to exercise over this type of behaviour.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I think we can resolve this matter. The proposed amendment to section 1 would provide the review and appeal which are now in the Act. But it would be—with respect to the advertisement—it would be an appeal, I think, in the wording of the amendment as suggested that the order of the registrar may be subject to review and appeal.

Now that might be with respect to that particular advertising situation. But the Act itself provides—in the duties of the registrar, section 5, and this would not hinder or delay his action if he wanted to deal with a dealer—for the suspension and cancellation of the licence. The registrar may, after giving the registrant an opportunity to be heard, suspend or cancel the registration for the breach of a term or condition upon which the registration was granted or where—this is significant—in his opinion to do so is in the public interest.

So I would think that the registrar would say: I am satisfied this man is doing some false advertising and it is in the public interest that his licence be cancelled, putting him out of business; subject again to review and appeal.

Mr. Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?
Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, may I make just one brief comment on the bill generally? I suppose it may be a bit unfair at this point to specifically ask the hon. Attorney General what is going to be the attitude of the registrar with regard to certain kinds of gimmicks in advertising. But I want to suggest to him that there are two which should be considered immediately, and they are ones for which I am not claiming any originality; but if anybody has been reading Ron Haggart's columns, he will have noted them.

One is the practice of posing as a private individual in an effort to sell the car. The hon. Attorney General looks as though he had a spontaneous reply to that.

The second one is the proposition of making it obligatory that the licence number of the used car be put in the ad. Now, hon. members may not be aware of this, but I happen to know of the experience that a number of people have had and they were provoked to the point where they tested this.

A certain dealer will advertise a very attractive car. This is a come-on. When you get there, invariably the car is sold and then they proceed to try to pawn off some other pile of junk that they have sitting around the yard.

In this particular instance they actually went to a telephone booth, literally 50 yards from the used car dealers, and called up, and said "Have you got that car," and he said yes. They walked right over and it was gone. So clearly, it was a gimmick.

Now it seems to me that the way you get at this effort to lead people on with one attractive car—not even on the lot, but just in the ad—and then sell them the others, is to put the licence number in the ad and then the prospective buyer is in a position to protect himself.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am not, frankly, Mr. Chairman, prepared to answer in detail the question of the hon. member for York South; but I would say this: I think our registrar and our administrative people will be aware of these things and will be active in making the necessary arrangements to take care of this sort of situation. If we need to make further provision, I believe the regulations are wide enough to insist that this Act provides the form of advertising, it governs the contracts for sale, and I think we can reach these situations.

THE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT

House in committee on Bill No. 31, An Act to amend The Workmen's Compensation Act.

Sections 1 to 7, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 8:

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, on section 8, I wonder if I might ask the hon. Minister for a comment. This section is the one that deals, I believe, with the application of The Workmen's Compensation Act to the agricultural industry.

In committee the other day, the gentleman representing the compensation board said that notwithstanding the provisions here in section 8, it would still take a special regulation to apply the provisions of the Act to the agricultural industry. He was not prepared to say at that time that the regulation would be brought in. I believe that is the intent of the thing, and I wondered if the hon. Minister would just make a comment on it.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, it is the intention of the government that the application of the compensation Act be made to the work force in agriculture at the earliest possible moment. In the meantime, I would add this. There are many details to be worked out leading to the formal adoption of this new participation, and active negotiations and discussions in depth and in detail are being carried on between the officials of the compensation board and representatives of various agricultural associations.

Mr. Nixon: The suggestion was made, Mr. Chairman, that it might come into force as of July 1 this year. Has any specific date been mentioned in these negotiations?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: In the operation of the compensation board it is legislation. Some time is usually required to notify all interested parties and instruct them with respect to the application of the Act. I would say that I think the date they have in mind for making effective the other provisions of the Act is July 1, and I would assume that that is the target date for this matter to which the hon. member makes reference.

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might ask the hon. Minister a question. Does this mean that all farmers would have to make out forms in connection with workmen's compensation, whether they had employees or not? I believe in other small businesses the law now is that the compensation forms must be sent in yearly, whether they have employees or not. I was wondering if there was any way we could get round this so that farmers who did not have employees would not have to fill out these forms, because it is quite a problem.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I understand the point that the hon. member raises. While I cannot speak in detail to it, I can speak to the policy of the government, and it is not to make any additional work or to involve any additional work than is absolutely required.

Mr. Nixon: Further to that, Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister mentioned that the compensation board would be conferring with a number of farm organizations. I wonder if he would mind telling us what those organizations would be.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: My understanding is that the agriculture federation of Ontario and, I cannot say absolutely but it was my understanding, the farmers union group as well had been in touch with the board.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I should like to add to that, if I might, Mr. Chairman. In addition to what the hon. Minister has said, contact has been made with the fruit and vegetable growers association, and with various producer commodity groups as well. There seems to have been very good liaison, with the general agreement that this matter should be worked out as satisfactorily as possible.

Mr. Nixon: In case it has not come to the hon. Minister's attention, I believe the Ontario flue-cured tobacco growers marketing board has gone on record as opposing the implementation of this legislation, and I would hope that you would give them an opportunity to express their feelings before it was taken much further.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I do not think I could accept that proposition at this stage of the bill in the Legislature. The bill has received approval of this House at second reading in principle, therefore the matter is going forward. The bill has been before the committee on labour and has been passed by that committee. Opportunities, ample opportunities, have been presented for the group to which the hon. member makes reference, to make their views known, and their views have been taken into account with respect to the broad application of the bill. But it is the government's intention to proceed with the implementation of this legislation. I have to put it to you in that fashion because the principle of the bill and its implementation have been advanced by the government and approved by this House.

Mr. Nixon: That is so, and I agree with the hon. Minister in that connection; but surely a group like this, which has expressed publicly that they have definite reservations, must have good reasons for this. I presume they were informed well in advance and had an opportunity to appear before these committees, but I do not believe they did appear.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I can understand the hon. member's desire to record—

Mr. Nixon: No, it is more than that.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Just a moment—to record that position in the House and at this point. I would simply say this about it, that I will check this out myself with the board to make certain that the flue-cured tobacco marketing board group have ample opportunity of being informed at least of the details of the implementation, and a consideration given to any special problems that they think apply to their situation.

Mr. Nixon: I do not want to take up too much time of the House in this connection, but the very fact that they did oppose it in general would, I presume, mean that they have some specific difficulties that have to be taken into consideration when the regulations are brought down.

Clerk of the House: The Honourable the Lieutenant-Governor recommends the following:

That the cost of the board of negotiations established under section 9-a of The Expropriation Procedures Amendment Act 1965, shall be paid in the fiscal year 1965-66 out of the consolidated revenue fund as provided in Bill No. 45, An Act to amend The Expropriation Procedures Act, 1962-1963.

Recommendation concurred in.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2:

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I cannot see anything in section 2 that allows the board of negotiations to have any advisers. Is it the government's intention that these people who make up the board of negotiations operate solely on their own, or are they going to be allowed to retain evaluators?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The thought is that the persons who make up the board of negotiations would be people with general knowledge of the area, of the land, or the property being expropriated, or the situation, that they could advise themselves. I do not know that the Act spells out that they would get appraisers, but I would think they would get such information. I think nothing further is necessary than that the Act provides we have a board of negotiation which will be made up of knowledgeable people in the area, who have the power to do such things as are necessary to try to reach a settlement.

Mr. Singer: They have no power to have a staff of their own, or to bring in independent advice if they believe there is not enough information before them, if the parties to the dispute are not able to provide them with the technical language. You are relying on their personal knowledge, is that it?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think it would be implicit in the Act that they would have power to get such information, and seek such evaluations as they might wish. These would be different boards on almost each case, different groups.

Mr. Singer: I would like to see written into this section broader powers to these persons to enable them to have such staff as they deem proper.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: That is the intent.

Mr. Singer: It may be the intent, but I do not seem to find it here.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, may I say just a word on this?

I feel very keenly about this piece of legislation. To me it is one of the most important pieces of legislation to come before the House this year.

Having lived in an area that has been crossed with pipelines on innumerable occasions in the last few years, I have come to know the problems that are associated with expropriation procedures in a very intimate way.

We have had the operation of a similar committee to this under The Pipelines Act that was set up when my friend, the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner), was then Minister of Mines, who established a committee, such as this, that was comprised of local people with a chairman who understood and had good command of the situation from a legal standpoint, to go out and hold meetings in the various areas of this province where there were problems in the settlement of property that had been expropriated for pipeline purposes.

This has worked so well in our area that I felt that this should work well in almost every area. Now this committee—and I have known many of the members, I have talked to them personally and asked them of their experiences. They have found that where they sit down around—I like to refer to them as the kitchen table committee. This is about what happens, because these men can go right out to the farmer's home, if it is a farmer that is having the problem, they sit down in his home and they discuss the problem with him. The expropriating authority may be there and they discuss the matters of concern to all of them.

Now, in this case I see no difference between the committee my friend, the hon. Attorney General is proposing and the actions of this other committee. Where they feel that additional advice is required and they want additional information they have every right to go and get it, and they do. They have the right and they do go out and see the actual property that has been expropriated and what has happened—the damages, if it is damages that are under discussion—and they come back and they discuss these things with the concerned people again, if necessary.

They say: Well, in our opinion, this is what should be done as a matter of settlement here.

It is working in almost 100 per cent of the cases. I virtually know of none that have gone from that committee of negotiation to an arbitration settlement. To me it takes out of the settlement on expropriation the necessity for appearing before a formal arbitration board. We recognize the fact that there must be expropriation procedures, painful and unhappy as some of them sometimes may be; but nevertheless we have to have this right if we are going to live in this modern age in which we find ourselves.

I think we should do everything we can, and I think our friend, the hon. Attorney General has done this, in protecting the rights of the individual and saying to the individual you are not required to go before a formal court of arbitration until these other steps of negotiation have been proceeded with. I think sometimes we can find settlements reached by negotiation with a committee such as this that is a bit removed from the scene and yet has a good general knowledge of the land values and of the problems of concern.

Now this to me is the real strength of this piece of legislation. I think it is a forward step. I am satisfied, because I know that farm organizations of this province have begged that this kind of legislation be established. It has worked well in the case of my friend, the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs in his former department.

I feel it is a great step forward. I think, to reassure my hon. friend who has raised this point of saying it should be spelled out, that they have the right to go and get this information, that they should have it spelled out in the Act. The intent, as the hon. Prime Minister has said, is certainly there and in effect this is actually what has happened.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I have already expressed my opinion about the principle of this Act when it came up for second reading, so I do not intend to go back to that argument. The majority of the House did not choose to agree with my hon. colleagues and me and with the NDP in connection with our views on this. So we must accept the fact that the principle of the bill has been approved.

But if the bill is going to become law, while I can appreciate what the intent would be, I would be happier if the intent was spelled out a little more. There are people other than farmers who have lands expropriated from them. Now what may be of common knowledge in a rural community as to value of lands perhaps would not pertain in the cities, or in the urban communities. It may well be necessary that to get the sort of advice that the board of conciliation would have to get in an urban community would require the services of some very highly skilled people; people who are able to evaluate assessment records, people who are able to go to the registry office and get a list of comparable sales and that sort of thing.

The rural community is quite different. If farm A is worth so much an acre, it would not seem illogical to take that value and put it on farm B. There is sort of a community idea of values, and that is a pretty good basis on which to make offers for rural land. But you come into the cities and you have an entirely different kind of a problem—

Hon. Mr. Stewart: There is an entirely different committee working in the city.

Mr. Singer: There may be; but I suggest a lot more technical advice may be needed, a lot more highly trained technical advice in the city.

I am quite prepared to accept the government's suggestion that the intent is there, but where they are setting up a new procedure I can see no reason why they do not allow these people—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: It does not have to be spelled out. If they require assistance, then they would have the right to obtain it. The hon. Attorney General has assured us of this.

Mr. Singer: With great respect, I think that a Minister embarked upon the expenditure of public money should be able to find authority to do it in the statutes. Here you are passing a new statute, setting up a new procedure, and I think it would be only the course of proper caution to see that you have in your statute what you want to do.

To say that it is the intent perhaps invites at a later day some complicated legal argument before the courts. This is the time to fix it up and I am surprised that the government does not see some logic in this.

The other thing that I wondered about: Is it the intent to just set up these boards of negotiation from time to time as disputes arise, or is this going to be a continuing body? Is a new office going to be established from which this will function? I can conceive, for instance, this being a very busy thing if it catches on and wherever there is a dispute about expropriation. Does the government contemplate that sort of thing as a big involved office, or just the appointment of two or three men from time to time?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It is not contemplated to set up a permanent board of negotiation, but in a situation—there might be six of them going on at one time in different areas of the province, or there might be two or three—you would pick from the area, two or more persons, knowledgeable, capable, who would go into the situation, meet the owners on behalf of the expropriating authority, sit down, as my hon. friend has said, around the kitchen table and say, "Can we settle this in dollars and cents? What are all the circumstances?"

There might be one going on in Renfrew as I mentioned the other day, or Essex county, or Thunder Bay or the Ottawa area or the city of Toronto, and so on, and they would be separate boards, not to last beyond the time that their particular function in a certain area had been performed.

That is the experience out of which we have brought this Act; that is how it works; that is what we would like to bring about here.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister of Agriculture's account of how successful this kind of committee has been in the instance of pipeline expropriations is obviously an impressive one. On second reading my reaction to the proposed negotiating committee was that it was a new creature, a new kind of body—maybe it is not as new as the hon. Minister informs us—and we ought to wait to see how it works out.

I was rather impressed with the comments of somebody who has had fairly extensive and intimate association with the conservation authority and the problems of expropriation related thereto, as to what the effect of this would be. His observation was, first, that anybody would be a fool not to go to this committee because he has nothing to lose. Second, let us take for example, a situation like the 1,000 properties that are likely to be expropriated for the Spadina extension. Here is a very complicated set up. The suggestion was made, although this may be exaggerating it a bit, that the negotiations might go on for a day for each one of them, and therefore it would require a thousand days.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: No, but you could name 10 or 20 boards—

Mr. MacDonald: Ten or 20 boards within the same expropriating area?

An hon. member: They will all come up with different decisions.

Mr. MacDonald: My hon. friend says that they will all come up with different decisions. I must say I have some misgivings as to how this is going to operate in some areas, but there is no point in raising bogies.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Chairman, I hope that when they are setting up the committee they will follow the suggestions of the committee on expropriation, which unanimously felt that this board should have some background in either law appraising or engineering. To us it seemed desirable that board members should have a combination of qualifications of those professions.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): There is a point here that I would like to raise with the hon. Attorney General. As I understand it, the major purpose the government has in mind in making this amendment to The Expropriation Procedures Act, is, shall we say, to give greater satisfaction to owners whose property is to be expropriated. This is the primary purpose, as I understand it. If that is so, I wonder if there is any need to put an owner in a situation where he could be forced into negotiation by the expropriating authority. First of all, I would like to make sure that I am interpreting the words of the bill correctly, but as I understand the bill—and they are pretty complicated words the hon. Attorney General will agree—either the expropriating authority or the owner, can ask for, and get, the negotiating procedure put into operation.

I would like to suggest to the hon. Attorney General that this is a matter that should be entirely at the option of the owner. If it is designed for his benefit, then let him decide whether or not it is actually to his benefit to negotiate. Perhaps he would like to go directly to arbitration and get the matter over with. The negotiating procedures are valuable in many cases, but they certainly delay, and it is even conceivable that an expropriating authority in some time and place in the future may have a motive to delay. I would say that the expropriating authority should not be in a position where it can force the owner to undertake this negotiating procedure, but the owner should be in a position where he can force the expropriating authority to do that if he wishes.

Again, I may not have understood the bill correctly, but it seems to me at the moment that either one can force the other, and I would suggest that the hon. Attorney General should give further consideration to that point.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think the hon. member understands the language rightly, that it is either the expropriating authority or the owner who may call for negotiation. While it is perhaps quite right that in most cases it would be the owner who might feel the need of negotiation—I think it is fair to leave it to either one to ask for—at least let us sit down before a negotiating board or committee—we call it a board of negotiation here—and see if we cannot settle this without cost and without expense and without delay, if possible, before we have to get on to arbitration. I think it is fair to leave it to both.

Mr. Bryden: I do not think it is, Mr. Chairman. Is it not a fact that the cost of arbitration is usually a burden on the owner being expropriated? It is not a burden on the expropriating authority to any significant degree. Most of them are not short of money. I am sure they would like to avoid those costs if they could, but I repeat that my understanding of the government's intention is that this should be for the benefit of the owner, not of the expropriating authority.

Let us leave it to the owner to decide what is to his benefit. If he decides that it is not to his benefit to institute the negotiating procedure, then he should be able to go directly to arbitration.

I can see a situation arising—it probably would not be a common situation—where this procedure, if forced upon the owners by an expropriating authority, would increase the owner's sense of grievance, rather than reduce it. It would make him feel that he was being deliberately stalled at a time when he may want to get the thing through arbitration and done with. I think he should be left to judge for himself whether or not this procedure will be to his benefit in any individual case.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I should have apologized first of all. I spoke on this on principle really, as I was out of the House at the time this bill was debated on second reading. I got here for the vote, of course, but in getting back to this matter pertaining to what the hon. member for Woodbine has raised here—the idea is that the owner, if he feels that the offer is not sufficient, he may ask for negotiations. On the other hand, if the expropriating authority feels that the price put on the property by the owner is too high, it can ask for negotiations. But if they mutually agree that there is no use in going to this negotiating board at all, we will go to arbitration right off the bat—

Mr. Bryden: I understand all that, and I think it is wrong.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: You may well think it is wrong.

Mr. Bryden: I think if you were carrying out your announced intention you would agree that it was wrong.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I do not agree to that at all, not at all, because what the hon. member is in effect saying is the very thing we are trying to correct, in that the farmer might have said, "Look, I don't want to go to arbitration before a formal board and have to bring in witnesses and pay lawyers' fees and all the rest of it." In this case he can sit down and informally negotiate this matter by saying to the expropriating authority, "This is the procedure I want to follow."

Mr. Bryden: I am afraid the hon. Minister has missed my point completely.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I think the hon. member has missed ours.

Mr. Bryden: I am afraid not, Mr. Chairman. It is a pity that the hon. Minister of Agriculture is so obtuse on the matter. I was raising the other possibility, where the farmer or other property owner, decides that he wants to go direct to arbitration. He cannot do it under this bill if the expropriating authority wants to hold him up in the negotiating procedure. It is his business, to decide whether he wants to undertake that expense.

I am quite satisfied with the procedure in the case where the owner wants, if possible, to avoid the expense of arbitration. But I am suggesting to you that the procedure is defective in the opposite case where the owner decides that it is in his best interests to undertake that expense and go directly to arbitration. However, I will not push the matter any further.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: All I would say further is this: Perhaps there is much could be said that it should be left to the owner whose property is being taken, but I think maybe there are some opportunities here where, even if he did not want to negotiate, it may be a good idea to say, "Well, let us discuss it."

Mr. Bryden: Now do not be his father, let him make his own decisions!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We might achieve something there.

Introduction of bills.

THE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY ACT

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Legislative Assembly Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a short statement concerning this bill.

It has always been an accepted principle in Ontario that the indemnity paid to the members here in the House would not compensate them fully for the time spent in carrying out their duties as elected representatives of the people. I am sure all the hon. members were well aware of the sacrifices involved when they stood for election in their various constituencies.

Nevertheless, in all jurisdictions, indemnities have been increased from time to time in recognition of the increased burden of work involved in serving the public as a member of a legislative assembly; the longer sessions that are now involved, and the ever-increasing cost of living. Increased indemnities have also recognized that the field of public service must be open to all our citizens, regardless of their personal or financial situation.

The last increase in indemnities for the members of this House occurred in 1960. Since then members of the federal Parliament and eight of the Legislatures of Canada have received increases in their indemnities, ranging from $800 in Manitoba to $5,000 in Quebec, and $8,000 in the federal government. With the increases that are proposed in the legislation, hon. members of this assembly will not be the highest or the best paid in Canada; on the other hand, the increases provided by these amendments will bring the indemnity and allowances more in line with the present-day cost of living, the burden of responsibilities, and the length of time which a member must spend if he is to discharge his responsibilities properly.

The work load and the demands on the time of our provincial members have steadily increased in recent years. Since 1960 every session except one—and that was a special session which only lasted two days in the fall of 1963—has run to 50 or more sitting days. One has to go back to the days of the Drury administration in the early 1920s to find a period when the Legislature remained in session for longer periods than it does at present. To date, in this session, we have been here for 51 days. During this time we have dealt with 78 public bills which have been introduced, we have dealt with some 43 private bills, and we have much more work to do before this session will be prorogued.

Another measure of our responsibilities and work load here might be the size of the Budget. Our budget of $1.5 billion this year represents an increase of 74 per cent in the last five years, and is the same size as was the federal budget for all of Canada just 24 years ago.

However, days of sitting and fiscal responsibility provide only a rough measure of the work our members are called upon to do and the responsibilities that are thrust upon them. I think it is fair to say that in this era of highly sophisticated voters and almost instant communication, more and more of our members' out-of-legislature hours are devoted to constituency business and to problems in their ridings. Committee work has taken on an ever-greater significance to all members in recent years. The work done by select committees between sessions has become of increasing importance and has expanded in recent years. This reflects the increasing complexity of our society and the necessity for our members to undertake extensive study and investigation of social problems in order that we may be able to legislate intelligently here in this Chamber.

In addition to these formal duties, there are few members who do not make several trips to Toronto each month between sessions, to deal with the many problems that arise among their constituents. These visits are of varying length, but necessitate absence from home and are on the increase.

I would also point out, Mr. Speaker, that as the business of government continues to place increasing demands upon the time of our members, it becomes correspondingly difficult for them to look after their private and domestic responsibilities and to conduct their own businesses. As a result, it is inevitable that the members must become increasingly dependent upon their indemnities as a source of supplementary income.

Apart from these valid considerations supporting a pay increase to the present MPPs, there is a strong argument for raising the indemnity in order to attract highly capable candidates for future office. The present stipend of $7,000 is so low as to discourage many men of potential and valuable experience from offering themselves for political office.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, this Act provides for an increase in the indemnity payable to members so that all will receive a basic indemnity of $8,000 rather than the $5,000 as at present. In addition, members for ridings in Metro Toronto will receive an expense allowance of $3,000, which is an increase of $1,000 over the current allowance. Those members representing ridings outside Metro Toronto will receive an expense allowance of $4,000 rather than the $2,000 as at present.

It is recognized that this is a very rough method of recognizing the differing requirements of those living varying distances from Toronto, the capital city. Nonetheless, the difference does exist and this is an attempt to give it recognition and to bring equity between those who must spend so much time in hotels and are required to purchase all their meals in restaurants over long periods of time, and those whose expenses of this type are not so burdensome.

In recognition of these increases, provision is made for higher advances to be made during the year.

Provision is also made to increase the number of trips that members may make between their ridings and the seat of government with a mileage allowance. This number will be increased from six to 15 per year. This will be of assistance to members from outlying parts of the province who are called upon to make an ever-increasing number of trips each year to Toronto, as I have previously stated, in connection with the day-to-day duties involved in looking after the needs and requirements of their constituents.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, may I say that it has been suggested to me that this entire matter might advantageously be referred to an independent group outside the Legislature for assessment. However, it is my conviction that we must face up to our full responsibilities and deal with them accordingly. After this bill has received second reading, it will be referred to a select committee appointed for the purpose and made up of hon. members of all parties in the Legislature. This committee will have an opportunity of examining the bill in all respects.

THE MUNICIPAL FRANCHISE EXTENSION ACT

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Municipal Franchise Extension Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

THE JUNIOR FARMER ESTABLISHMENT ACT

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Junior Farmer Establishment Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

THE ENERGY ACT, 1964

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Energy Act, 1964.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment in section 1 is to exclude hard-rock drilling from the purview of the Act.

In section 2 the scope of the prohibition is extended to cover machines used for deepening and plugging wells.

In section 3, subsections 1 and 2, the scope of the regulatory power is widened and in subsection 3, the scope of the regulatory power is widened to include fuel oil appliances.

THE GAS AND OIL LEASES ACT, 1962-1963

Hon. Mr. Simonett moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Gas and Oil Leases Act, 1962-1963.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Speaker, this bill contains two amendments of principle.

In section 1 under the Act at present only the lessor as defined may make an application under the Act. The words in the first and subsequent lines of subsection 1 of section 2 of the Act as re-enacted by section 1 of this bill, "Or any other person having an interest in such land or any person authorized by such lessor or other person"; are new and will enable the persons mentioned as well as the lessor to make applications.

In section 2, the words added in clause (a) of subsection 1 of section 2 of the Act as re-enacted by section 1 of this bill; "Or has failed to complete the drilling of," are new and will cover a situation that does occur occasionally under some forms of gas or oil leases.

The other amendments in the bill are complementary to the first two principles mentioned above.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day I have two questions.

The first one is to the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree). Is the hon. Minister satisfied that proper safety procedures were being observed when Arthur O'Regan plunged to his death on the MacDonald-Cartier bridge over Hogg's Hollow on Friday?

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this unfortunate occurrence is now under investigation today by a municipal inspector and an officer of the construction safety branch of The Department of Labour. I assume this incident will be the subject of an inquest and therefore any comment at this time would not add anything to the situation and probably would not be desirable.

Mr. Young: The second question is to the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond).

Are there standards for conductivity in respect to non-electrical operating room equipment in hospitals in Ontario? Are there standards at which equipment in hospitals must be discarded because of loss of conductivity; and are there conductivity standards for clothing worn in operating rooms in hospitals?

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, there are no official standards as such laid down by any organization in the province or by any provincial body, but there are certain well-established guides widely used in the province and endorsed by hospital authorities and by the Ontario hospital services commission.

The principal authority dealing with this problem is known as "The code for use of inflammable anaesthetics—A safe practice for hospital operating rooms."—This is a publication of the Canadian standards association. All hospital plans that relate to operating rooms and safety hazards must be approved by the office of the fire marshal and I believe the regulations are very rigidly enforced.

In answer to the second part of the hon. member's question: Again there are no standards as such set down, but the same code already referred to deals with the subject and describes a method of testing equipment that is used in operating rooms. It is presumed that this testing is carried on and when the equipment does not pass the test it is discarded.

The answer to the third part of the hon. member's question: Again the code deals with this as well. It describes in some detail the type of clothing that is permissible in operating rooms and is safe to use; for example, textiles, grounding of boots and shoes, and so on.

Mr. Young: Would the hon. Minister entertain a supplementary question?

There is a question in my mind as to whether the hon. Minister feels there should be some tightening up and adopting of this code so that there can be sanctions if it is violated.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I can only say in answer, sir, that this matter is being very closely studied and it is viewed very thoroughly when we are faced with any explosion such as occasionally occurs. To the best of my knowledge, in each case where this has occurred since the commission came into being, there was no lack of observance of the recognized ground rules. However, once again in this most unfortunate matter the whole set-up with relation to conductivity, the suitability of equipment, clothing worn, and so on, is always being thoroughly investigated.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary and Minister of Citizenship) begs leave to present to the House the annual report of The Department of Reform Institutions of the province of Ontario, for the year ending 31st March, 1964.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I have here the answers to 27 of the questions appearing on the order paper. These are, numbers 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 23, 24, 25, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34 and 35.

The hon. Prime Minister tabled answers to questions as follows:

1. Mr. Singer—Enquiry of the Ministry—Will the Attorney General advise the average case load handled by each magistrate in the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto during the year 1964, and by each magistrate elsewhere in Ontario?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart):

Metropolitan Toronto: 19 magistrates; average case load 4,492.

Elsewhere in Ontario: 75 magistrates (including six part-time); average case load 4,398.

2. Mr. Singer—Enquiry of the Ministry—(a) Will the Attorney General advise if there is a backlog of cases to be tried in Metropolitan Toronto? If so, how many such cases are awaiting trial? (b) Will the Attorney General advise if in the event an adjournment of a case pending in magistrate's court in Metropolitan Toronto becomes necessary, what is the average length of time that it takes to have the case heard again?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

(a) There were 2,388 charges pending as at December 31, 1964.

(b) It depends on the type of case. If it is a complicated, time-consuming case involving a number of witnesses, counsel, etc., a special courtroom has to be provided and this may take up to two months to arrange. The average case which is not involved will be disposed of in a much shorter time.

3. Mr. Singer—Enquiry of the Ministry—Will the Attorney General advise if there have been any requests from the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto, or from a chief magistrate of the province of Ontario, or from the inspector of legal offices, for the provision of more courts for magistrates in Metropolitan Toronto, or improved facilities?

(a) If so, within the last three years, who made such requests, and when?

(b) In what form were these requests set forward?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

(a) and (b) The late Chief Magistrate, F. W. Bårtrém, QC—letter to the executive corporation of Metropolitan Toronto, dated September 10, 1964.

Chief Magistrate, A. O. Klein, QC—Submission to the executive committee of Metropolitan Toronto, dated December 11, 1964.

Inspector of legal offices—oral discussions with senior magistrate, administrator of courts and Metropolitan officials.

4. Mr. Singer—Enquiry of the Ministry—Will the Attorney General advise if the inspector of legal offices has, within the last three years, advised that in his opinion magistrates' facilities in the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto are not adequate? If so, what action has been taken in regard to such advice?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

The inspector of legal offices had advised the Attorney General within the last three years of the necessity for expanding magistrates' facilities in the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto.

As a result of such advice and following negotiations with the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto, several improvements were made as follows:

(a) New buildings were constructed in Willowdale in 1960.

(b) New buildings were constructed in Scarborough in 1962.

(c) Additional court space was released in the city of Toronto at 57 Adelaide Street in 1962.

(d) Additional facilities were provided on Hollis Street in York township in 1962.

(e) Additional two courtrooms were made available on King Street, Toronto. One in 1961 and one in 1964.

(f) Facilities were improved in New Toronto in 1962.

In November, 1964, the Chief Magistrate, A. O. Klein, QC, was designated to work closely, on behalf of the Attorney General, with the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto on the requirements of additional magistrates' courts facilities. Negotiations are presently being carried on with the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto with a view to providing additional courtrooms for magistrates in the old city hall.

5. Mr. Singer—Enquiry of the Ministry—Will the Attorney General advise if the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto is in breach of section 19 (4) of The Magistrates Act, Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1960, Chapter 226.

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:
No.

6. Mr. Singer—Enquiry of the Ministry—Will the Attorney General advise: (a) The number and location of magistrates' courts contained in buildings in which police departments are also located within the province of Ontario? (b) The number of such courtrooms constructed since January 1, 1960? (c) The number and location of such courtrooms for which his department has plans for construction? (d) Whether his department was consulted with respect to the planned use of the city hall, Toronto, as a magistrates' courthouse and a police station following the relocation of the municipal offices of the city of Toronto in the new city hall, and, if so, what recommendations, if any, were made by him or his department with respect to this matter?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

(a) Thirty: Brantford, Ottawa, St. Thomas, Kingston, Owen Sound, Hawkesbury, Cornwall, Lindsay, Hamilton, Kenora, Sarnia, Smiths Falls, Brockville, St. Catharines, Barrie, Fort William, Kitchener, Guelph, Welland, London, North Bay, Port Hope, Oshawa, Stratford, Orillia, Port Arthur, Niagara Falls, Newmarket, Timmins, Peterborough.

Second revision—By Order-in-Council numbered OC-4003/64, dated December 3, 1964. The Public Service Act, 1961-1962.

The above-mentioned Orders-in-Council were made under the provisions of section 4(b) of

17. Mr. Singer—Enquiry of the Ministry—When does the Attorney General contemplate appointing a full-time senior master?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

The appointment of a full-time senior master of the Supreme Court of Ontario was made by order-in-council numbered OC-630/65, dated February 18, 1965, with the effective date of May 1, 1965.

18. Mr. Singer—Enquiry of the Ministry—Will the Attorney General advise on whose authority an advertisement was placed in Ontario Reports soliciting applications for the position of masters of the Supreme Court?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

On the authority of the Attorney General in co-operation with The Department of Civil Service.

23. Mr. Singer—Enquiry of the Ministry—Will the Attorney General advise the normal retirement age and the basis by which it has been set for all persons employed in the Attorney General's laboratory?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

The normal retirement age of civil servants employed in the Attorney General's laboratory is 65 years under the provisions of section 10 of The Public Service Act, 1961-1962, and is subject to reappointments or extensions up to the age of 70 years under the aforementioned provisions of such Act.

However, under the provisions of section 1 of The Public Officers Act, RSO 1960, chapter 326, any person can be appointed for a temporary purpose by the government of Ontario or by any commission acting for or on behalf of the Crown when in the opinion of the government or of such commission, such employment is in the public interest. This type of appointment which normally relates to consultants, commission members, board members, etc., is not subject to any age restrictions but at the same time it does not provide the officers so appointed with fringe and pension benefits.

24. Mr. Singer—Enquiry of the Ministry—Will the Attorney General advise the names of all persons at present employed in the Attorney General's laboratory who have passed the normal retirement age and the basis on which their continued employment has been allowed?

Answer by the hon Attorney General:

Name	Position	Basis of continued employment
Deadman, Dr. W. J.	Part-time Medical Examiner	Order-in-Council numbered 3142/58 dated September 11, 1958.
Sharpe, Dr. N. C.	Part-time Medical Director	Order-in-Council numbered 2230/50 dated November 2, 1950.
Rogers, L. J.	Part-time Consulting Chemist	Order-in-Council numbered 2230/50 dated November 2, 1950.

Note: The above-named have never been civil servants of Ontario and their services have been rendered to the province upon an appointment based on the provisions of section 1 of The Public Officers Act, RSO 1960, chapter 326, in a part-time consulting capacity at a moderate retainer fee following retirement from professional positions elsewhere.

25. Mr. Singer—Enquiry of the Ministry—Will the Attorney General advise the names, date of birth and salaries paid to all persons earning more than $5,000.00 per annum who have left employment with the Attorney General's laboratory for the five-year period commencing January 1, 1960, and ending December 31, 1964.

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

Name	Date of birth	Salary paid ($)
Davies, M. I.	September 8, 1921	5,750
Dencer, R.	April 2, 1930	6,000
Eijgelaar, G.	August 25, 1929	6,600
Gupta, S. N.	June 30, 1926	6,600
Hoffman, G. D.	January 2, 1940	5,500
Liu, E. L.	September 29, 1928	5,750
Packard, R. J.	November 22, 1925	7,500
Sandford, D. C.	September 23, 1927	6,000
Treiers, D.	March 10, 1938	6,300

Wong, A.	October 3, 1936	6,300

28. Mr. Troy—Enquiry of the Ministry—(a) Have certain officers of the provincial police been furnished with Persian lamb hats for winter wear; (b) did the Attorney General approve of such a purchase; (c) does the Attorney General know that the bulk of the fur for such hats is harvested in Russia and imported therefrom; (d) why doesn't the department support the Ontario trapper industry?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

(a) Yes.

(b) This type of hat has been used for several years by the Ontario provincial police and the Attorney General was not requested to approve a recent purchase.

(c) The Attorney General has been informed that the fur for such hats is imported mainly from Afghanistan, South Africa and Persia—in that order. Special lamb fur is not imported specifically for the manufacture of hats for the Ontario provincial police. Only cuttings obtained from Canadian furriers are used by the hat manufacturer.

(d) The answer under (c) above explains the situation. However, it would be much more expensive to manufacture hats of similar design with beaver fur.

29. Mr. Singer—Enquiry of the Ministry—(a)

Will the Attorney General advise whether there has been any investigation as to possible injury that might result to any person working in the Attorney General's laboratory by reason of their close proximity to X-ray machines; (b) if the answer to part (a) is Yes, will the Attorney General advise what steps have been taken to minimize such dangers?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

(a) Yes, in 1963.

(b) Staff working in critical areas wear special film badges which provide a warning to X-ray exposure.

30. Mr. Singer—Enquiry of the Ministry—Will the Attorney General advise: (a) whether the laboratory performs functions for departments other than the Attorney General's department; (b) if so, what are these functions; (c) at whose direction is such work undertaken; (d) will the Attorney General advise whether the Attorney General's laboratory does drug assays for provincial hospitals?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

(a) Yes.

(b) Analysis and evaluation of drugs supplied to Ontario hospitals and clinics of The Department of Health.

(c) Upon the direction and approval of the Treasury board requested by The Department of Health.

(d) Yes.

31. Mr. Singer—Enquiry of the Ministry—Will the Attorney General advise whether there is any integration of the Attorney General's laboratory functions with research conducted at the University of Toronto or any other university in the province of Ontario?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

Yes.

32. Mr. Singer—Enquiry of the Ministry—Will the Attorney General advise when the Attorney General's laboratory plans to use neutron activation analysis in criminal investigations?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

The laboratory has used neutron activation analysis in a number of investigations to date. However, there has been no necessity to present evidence obtained through this method of investigation in the courts up to the present time.

33. Mr. Singer—Enquiry of the Ministry—Will the Attorney General advise whether: (a) the facilities of the Attorney General's laboratory are available to defense counsel? (b) if so, on what basis?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

(a) No.

(b) Not applicable.

34. Mr. Singer—Enquiry of the Ministry—(a) Will the Attorney General advise if it is the practice to hire from time to time, on a temporary basis, medico-legal experts to conduct examinations and investigations in parts of the province remote from Toronto? (b) if so, how often in 1964 were such experts employed and at what cost to the department?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

(a) No.

(b) Not applicable.

Note: The employment of medico-legal experts to conduct examinations and investigations in the whole province falls under the provisions of The Coroners Act. Medico-legal experts are assigned by investigating coroners and their fees—standard fee of $50 per case—are paid by counties, cities, separated towns and provisional judicial districts.

35. Mr. Singer—Enquiry of the Ministry—Will the Attorney General advise what is the average period required from the time the request for investigation is made to the Attorney General's laboratory until the time the investigation is completed?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

Depending on the type and complexity of the case from 24 hours up to three months.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The seventy-fifth order; House in committee of supply; Mr. W. E. Sandercock in the chair.

Mr. L. A. Braithwaite (Etobicoke): Mr. Chairman, continuing with my comments on the estimates of the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rowntree), I would return to the field of the workmen's compensation board.

If the hon. Minister of Labour wishes to make a maximum contribution toward labour-management stability in the months to come, then we would strongly urge him to give some thought to the whole method of operation of the workmen's compensation board. Too often one hears comments such as that the board gives too little and it gives it too late. Then, too, there is the question of survivors. We submit that a widow's pittance should be at least $150 monthly or more. This becomes very important when there is no other form of support except welfare. A widow who is middle-aged or unemployable with no other means of making a living, could truly be in dire straits.

My hon. colleagues will be making further comments on the amount of compensation that this party feels should be paid in various situations and on many other areas of The Workmen's Compensation Act. I will comment solely on the question of a man who is injured on the job and can come back only to do light duties. A difficulty arises if there are no light duties available. Shall he leave his present job where perhaps he has built up seniority and benefits, and register for employment with the unemployment insurance commission? That is a problem in itself. Suppose he does. Quite often there is no light work available even at the commission. Then a man finds himself back at home and he must go on welfare.

Mr. Chairman, this is not fair, and this party strongly urges that The Workmen's Compensation Act be amended so that a man returning to work and able to do only light duties, may stay on full compensation until he is fit to return to his normal employment; or, that the compensation board absorb the difference between what he is able to earn now, and what he was earning prior to his accident, including any increases in wages to which he may have become entitled if he had not been injured.

Our party has found so many areas in which The Workmen's Compensation Act has been wanting, that we would strongly urge the government to set up a select committee that would study the whole area of the operation of the Act and bring it up to date, so that greater stress may be laid on the humanitarian aspects of the problems of the injured workman.

Mr. Chairman, human rights is the last area that I propose to comment on. I would state that this party has already made it quite clear that it feels that the government should lose no time in perfecting the Ontario human rights code. To do this, we have already stated that any opportunities for discrimination in the field of employment or elsewhere, should be removed forthwith.

Further, during the debate on the Speech from the Throne, I suggested to the hon. Minister the fact that our party would like to see the director of the commission given the right to inquire into a complaint without having to secure the consent of the Minister of Labour. We have no objection to the Minister having sole discretion in the responsibility for initiating court action. However up to that point, in the whole process of investigation—and where possible, conciliation—we submit that the director of the Ontario human rights commission has the time and the closeness of contact to arrive at decisions that are best for the persons complaining and the person or firm against which the complaint has been lodged.

Mr. Chairman, it is well known that as more and more members of the Ontario working force reach the age of 40 years or so, they are finding that they are unable to secure employment suitable to their needs. Our submission, Mr. Chairman, is that discrimination because of age at this time of life, is a major personal tragedy for anyone who feels he is fit and able to work and cannot secure employment. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, we would at this time urge that the Ontario human rights code be amended so that the older workman is protected from discrimination because of his age.

Mr. Chairman, I have commented fully on the estimates of the hon. Minister of Labour. My hon. colleagues will be making further comments as the various votes are considered.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Chairman, in making a few opening remarks in regard to the estimates of The Department of Labour, I would say first, that I hope the hon. Minister is in his usual cheery mood during my remarks and the remarks of other hon. members on the specific votes of his estimates. I say this because a week ago tomorrow, in this Chamber, we dealt with The Operating Engineers Act in committee and I detected somewhat a bit of impatience. It seemed to me that the hon. Minister was just a little bit touchy—

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Not at all.

Mr. Gisborn: —before such an audience of trade unionists while we were dealing with that particular bill.

On the Monday a week ago today, sir, while we were dealing with the second reading of the compulsory arbitration bill, I think the hon. Minister at least got a little bit nasty with members on this side of the House. I refer to his inference that the New Democratic Party opposed the compulsory arbitration bill because we were in some way tied to the trade union movement, and that one of our members was a paid staff man for the union. I would say this quietly to the hon. Minister, that I think there is room in this province and in this country for various sets of principles, and I think there is room in this province and in this House for members with different political philosophies. I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that in the time to come there will be several trade unionists sitting in this House, reflecting the points of view of groups they represent and those of the community at large, and I dare say that the time will come when we will have many trade unionists sitting on that side of the House as well.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): In all parties.

Mr. Gisborn: I think a trade unionist, whether he is called a professional trade unionist or a staff man, has as much right to voice his opinion in this House as someone who speaks for the farmers, or the insurance companies, or for big business.

Mr. Nixon: In all parties.

Mr. A. J. Reaume (Essex North): In all parties.

Mr. Gisborn: Right. And I think the hon. Minister was just a little bit not nice in making those remarks.

Mr. Chairman, when the hon. Minister presented his remarks from his text, I could not find much in them to justify the statement a few weeks ago that he was going to present to this House a new blueprint for labour. There has been some extra money requested to increase his department staff so that it can better enforce and administer the legislation that comes within his jurisdiction. Certainly this is long overdue, and something that we have been asking for for some time.

But what caught my attention more than anything, Mr. Chairman, was the first two pages of his text dealing with the economic background of the problems. At first, one would have thought that it was the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall) who was delivering his opening remarks on his estimates and not The Department of Labour, but it did not take long to find the point that the hon. Minister was trying to make. I might say that the same point was made by the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) when he was making his remarks on the Throne Speech and termed the discussion and the great amount of talk about the impact of automation as a "bogey". The hon. Minister of Labour then followed the same pattern by debunking the fears of automation in certain terms and I would just quote briefly from his own text, at page 4:

In any discussion of technological change, the term "automation" comes to the fore. No word, in my opinion, is subject to such flagrant abuse as automation. This is largely because there is no generally accepted definition for it; as one university professor has said: "Few words have been so twisted to suit a multitude of purposes and phobias. There are some who use it as a vehicle to spread mistrust and fear, the haunting fear of the unknown."

Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the hon. Minister of Labour has any more right to debunk the fears of automation than those experts across this country who have studied automation for some years and projected its impact in this country. Certainly the documents that have been produced by experts who have analyzed the trend and the potential impact on our society deserve some recognition.

I cannot say whether either one is right, but it struck me as funny that we should have this pattern. I did not really think it was a pattern until I picked up my monthly newsletter from the Canadian manufacturers association. It was headed "Automation Myth," and the Canadian manufacturers association went on to debunk the fears of the impact of automation.

I can understand that the Canadian manufacturers association might not be too concerned if we had a large labour market at their disposal so that they could again take unfair advantage of people on the labour market in their production, but I do not think that the hon. Prime Minister of this province, or the hon. Minister of Labour, should be supporting this kind of a pattern.

I do not think it is fair, and it seems to me that they are showing a very weak position. They are burying their heads in the sand and are going to let this problem grow on us until it becomes a crisis and then we will start to do something on a crash programme that will not be effective enough to meet the real impact of automation.

Mr. Chairman, I listened to the comments of the hon. member for Etobicoke who spoke for the Liberal Party on The Department of Labour, and certainly I feel that he has covered every item very thoroughly. It seems to me that he has done a summary on the presentations of the Ontario federation of labour to the Cabinet for the last three or four years. I do not think that there is anything wrong with this. I am glad that we now have the Liberal Party behind the very necessary things that are needed in regard to the working people of this province—

Mr. Reaume: We always have been.

Mr. Gisborn: No, you have not always been. There used to be a speaker for the Liberal Party, when I first came into the House, who propounded the idea of Canadian autonomy. The only people who were in favour of Canadian autonomy at that time were the Canadian manufacturers association and the Liberal Party. I have not heard that this week and I am very pleased that you have now become enlightened and you will support the democratic process—

An hon. member: What is the hon. member talking about?

Mr. Gisborn: But I would just refer to one section of the press release put out by the hon. member for Etobicoke in regard to his remarks—on the front page, too—and I quote:

For unorganized labour Mr. Braithwaite proposed that the government explore the whole question of improving the grievance machinery so that the ordinary worker might find it easier to lay a personal complaint.

Now, I do not know what he means by that comment. I do not think that the unorganized worker has any avenues to get his complaints aired in a proper manner and what I would like to have read that the hon. member said was that we, as a party, believe that the trade union movement plays an integral part in our society and that unorganized workers should get into unions of their choice so that they can bargain collectively for fair wages and conditions.

I have never heard him say this. I hope that he will make it very clear at some point, because that is the solution to many of our problems. We can talk about minimum wage laws, fair employment laws and compensation, safety and health, but the solution for the unorganized and those that are subjected to unfair treatment is that they should find a union of their choice and get some representation by those people who know just what the problems are.

Mr. Chairman, I understand that the Ontario federation of labour presented their brief to the Cabinet and the hon. Minister last Wednesday. I am not going to review what might be in a sense the need for the organized trade union movement in this province. I am sure that the executive of the Ontario federation of labour are very able men and they presented in a straightforward and frank manner those things that they feel are important to the organized groups, and also those things they feel are necessary and important to the community as a whole.

I do want to deal with just three sections of The Labour Relations Act. I have had some personal experience with them and even though they were mentioned in the brief of the Ontario federation of labour, I feel that there should be some emphasis put on them so that they may get some attention.

The first is the conciliation procedure. I think it is about time that the hon. Minister and his department took a real look at the conciliation procedure. I think that they should drop the board section of the Act, and this will expedite bringing about of collective agreements where they really count in this province. I would think that the Act should at least be amended to only make the board stage of conciliation applicable where both parties mutually agree that they would like to have a conciliation board.

That would provide—if there were a lot of inexperienced unions, new local unions, springing up—some assistance for those who felt that the conciliation board could be of some help. They could then jointly agree and have the services of the conciliation board.

The large unions in this country have mature and experienced bargainers, and management also have raised their sights in the collective bargaining field. The patterns have been set year by year; they know exactly what they are entitled to through their research departments and they know where they are going. Rather than a conciliation board stage being a cooling-off period, it has now become what has been termed by several of the trade union leaders as a frustration period.

Certainly one might say that the provisions of the Act allow the board to sit for certain lengths of time and then they will have to report when it is over. But that is not the case.

I know the hon. Minister can argue with me and say: Well, the conciliation board sittings have been extended by mutual agreement or by the request of the trade union committee or by management or mutually. I would agree with this, but once you get into a board stage the committee, no matter how they might try to bring the board to an end, are in a sense trapped. Trapped by public opinion, by their real efforts to bring about an agreement, their hopes that every day will see something break and that they might be able to get to an agreement without breaking off at the board stage. Of course, if it is not successful then it goes on and on.

I was on the committee with Local 1005 of the steelworkers last year. We started to bargain on May 14 and we got a settlement about a week before Christmas, in December.

I know there were delays in establishing the board. The board was established, I believe, about November 14. We went on until December, almost Christmas, before we got a settlement.

What happens? It is all right for one to say: Well, what is the difference if you bargain for five, six, eight, nine, ten months; as long as you get a settlement? But this is not the question. It was obvious in our set of negotiations, and I have noticed it in other large negotiations, once the negotiations go past a certain point then the membership is in a certain condition that their demands keep raising and raising, they are frustrated. When we settled up in December it was not a question of selling the membership the agreement we came up with, because I felt, and the committee felt—and I do not think anyone has denied it—that we got what might be termed one of the best contracts which has been negotiated with the Steel Company of Canada on a two-year basis, but the membership was in such a state of frustration because of the delays that it was not prepared to accept anything. Among those who followed the procedure, we won our vote to accept only on a few hundred votes. We could not talk to the members in any way, shape or form. They did not want to listen to the terms of the settlement; what they wanted was a strike and were blaming their frustration on the long-drawn-out delays.

The public and the customer of the company have a large problem also. The press, during our critical periods, was criticizing the union committee and the company committee for stalling and not getting on with the job. It was telling the public that the sales had dropped drastically in our area and that people had stopped spending, and this all raised a lot of apprehension and was certainly not good for negotiations. Customers of the steel company were complaining. We understand that they were starting to send circulars to other steel companies for their orders, and all of this just puts the whole conclusion of real collective bargaining in a state of frustration. Certainly the conciliation board procedure, in many cases, now has fulfilled its usefulness and I believe that it would be well to have the conciliation board stage based on the application of both parties by mutual agreement.

Mr. Chairman, I would again raise the question of the section of the Act that provides what we call bargaining in good faith. Section 12 says this:

OBLIGATION TO BARGAIN

The parties shall meet within 15 days from giving of notice or within such further period as the parties agree upon, and shall bargain in good faith and make every reasonable effort to make a collective agreement.

That section at this point means just about nothing. I believe it would be well if the hon. Minister would take a real good look at that section and either define exactly what is meant—what is “bargain in good faith”—or else take the section out. I suggest that he take the section out and he should also take out the section that prohibits strikes or lock-outs during the terms of the collective agreement. The glass and ceramic workers in Hamilton have been before the courts for almost two years and yet at this point they have not had a decision as to whether they have a right to prosecute the company for failing to bargain in good faith. As far as I can make out in listening to panels following this particular court case in regard to bargaining in good faith, all a company has to do is meet and that is what is covered by the Act. It does not have to make any offer whatsoever; it just has to provide a meeting place and meet with the union, and it has lived up to that section of the Act.

Some will argue that the union also has the responsibility to make some concessions and that management will say: “We met with you but you didn’t meet our demands. We asked you to increase your hours of work, we asked you to provide for overtime, and you wouldn’t meet these conditions.” I think management is using this section and is violating the whole concept of collective bargaining. When a trade union local goes before the company and asks it to sit down and bargain for a new agreement or improvements or amendments, it is asking for increased wages and a betterment of working conditions. The union has nothing to give to management in the sense of collective bargaining. It is bound by an agreement. Management has all its rights under management clauses and that right then should only be outside of the collective agreement.

Therefore, I would think it is absolutely necessary that that section of the Act be defined very clearly so that management will recognize it has some obligation to bargain in a real collective manner.

I would like to quote the arbitration section of the Act—section 34, subsection 1:

Every collective agreement shall provide for the final and binding settlement through arbitration, without stoppage of work, of all differences between the parties arising from the interpretation, application, administration or alleged violation of the agreement, including any question as to whether a matter is arbitrable.

Mr. Chairman, subsection 2 goes on to provide a section that must be in each agreement if those provisions are not made. I feel that the model arbitration clause should be amended to provide that the judge or the arbitration chairman can deal with any question of dispute arising between the union and the company, and not be restricted as he is in the particular section. In the event of failure to make this change, I say it is highly necessary that we remove the "no strike, no lockout" section of The Labour Relations Act.

As the hon. Minister knows, this problem is one of the most vexing in some of the large industries in this province today. The problem of technological changes and methods changes, brings about conditions in industry, between the terms of collective agreements, that the employees find hard to live with.

We had a stoppage in the Stelco plant last year because we had no other weapon to use to rectify what was considered a very serious problem. We have what is called the cold mill employing about 700 workers, who as well as being under a basic agreement, were living under a supplementary agreement covering seniority and incentive rates. The company changed the supervision in this large department, split it up into several small departments, and this in turn disintegrated the seniority status of many employees. Incentive rates were removed from jobs, which brought about reductions of as much as 70 cents per hour per employee. The employees had no recourse under the arbitration section to have this problem rectified.

I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. Minister give consideration to either one or the other of the alternatives: strengthen The Arbitration Act to cover any dispute that arises between the company and the union, or repeal the section that forbids strikes or lockouts during collective bargaining agreements. Let them fight their problems out. The hon. Minister has said that he believes use of The Labour Relations Act and the supervision of government should be brought to their most irreducible measure, and I think he should do just that at this stage of collective bargaining in this province.

What I felt was missing from the hon. Minister's remarks when he opened his estimates, Mr. Chairman, was some reference to the federal labour code. As we all know, the federal government has introduced legislation to provide for a $1.25 minimum across Canada for all those under federal jurisdiction, to provide for two weeks' vacation with pay after one year's service, and to provide for 40 hours of work in a week and overtime for time in excess of 40 hours. I would have thought at least that the hon. Minister would have followed this pattern in the province of Ontario, because if he does not, many workers in this province become second-class citizens. Certainly it is time to move in this direction, now that we have had the lead by the federal government.

We are still working on a 48-hour week pattern. The provisions of enforcement are fairly slack and are not enforceable to the extent they should be. We still have only one week's vacation after one year's service in this province. We have been lagging for years in this area, so one would have thought that with the legislation that has been passed in the federal House, the hon. Minister of Labour of this province really would have developed what he calls a new blueprint for labour, and at least copied the provisions of the federal Act and made them apply to every worker in the province of Ontario.

I will conclude those few remarks and we will deal with them a little more specifically as we go through the estimates.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, before we get into the individual estimates, is it the intention to deal with the workmen's compensation board as a unit itself at the end?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I think that the pattern adopted last year is a good one. There is no particular spot in our estimates for a debate in depth on the compensation board, but in my view it is a matter that should be debated. Let us have that as a special item at the end of the estimates.

On vote 901:

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Chairman, I thought that the hon. Minister might be answering some of the points brought out by the speaker for our party and the hon. member for Wentworth East, but apparently not.

In regard to the item on assistance to amateur sport, I notice there has been quite an increase in that particular estimate this year. Those of us who are interested in amateur sport are very much pleased to note that the Ontario athletics commissioner is resuming his former place in the promotion of amateur sport. My own particular interest is, at the moment, in track and field. From discussions with the athletics commissioner, and also from reading comments in the press, I note that the department will assist amateur clubs in the provision of equipment.

As you very well know, the equipment for a track and field club, such as adjustable standards and the implements that they use, is fairly expensive. I think the fact that your department is showing interest, will mean a fine development across the province in the promotion of track and field clubs.

As you know, too, The Department of Education is in this field also, through its fitness programme. However, that department assists only in the field of leadership clinics and it does not provide facilities. I do not suppose we will ever reach the era when the government itself will go into the field entirely and provide stadiums and such facilities as that, too.

It seems to me that in the old days—I do not know which department it worked under—there was such a thing as the Ontario athletics commission with a director and a secretary in the person of the late Jimmy Fitzgerald, who was the distinguished sports editor for the Toronto Telegram. We had one member of the Legislature, Mr. Tom Murphy, on the commission, along with Mr. Harry Price, Sr., who all through the years has taken a very active interest in amateur sport of all kinds and has been a member of that famous committee that was set up by the Minister of Health. It got into print all right, but I think few of the recommendations of that committee were ever implemented. I think it might be well to consider the possibility of a commission again. At least the suggestion could be considered by the hon. Minister and his advisers.

I hope, too, that this is just the forerunner of further expansion of the department in this field. I understand this year the emphasis is on track and field, as I said, an activity in which I am very much interested through the Royal Canadian Legion. As you know, we have our sports training plan, which emphasizes, at the present time, the coaching of leaders in track and field under the direction of one of the outstanding coaches in the world, Mr. Geoffrey Dyson. It is fortunate, too, that because of his coming over here, we are getting some of the best of the English coaches, who are now settling in Canada, in the universities of the west. Possibly some day we will get some of them to settle down here in the province of Ontario.

We certainly need as much support as we can get. The tragic part about it is that I do not think either the federal or provincial government is taking the interest it should in the expansion of our sporting activities. Another tragic aspect is that if you pick up the metropolitan dailies, you find that professional sport gets all the emphasis and it is only occasionally that we find amateur sports getting much support whatever in the sporting pages. Of course, if a newspaper is going to co-operate in the operation of a track and field meet, say, in Maple Leaf Gardens, then you find the publicity is abundant then. But ordinarily, the lack is the tragic part about amateur sport. In the fall, it is professional football and professional baseball; in the winter it is professional hockey; hockey goes on into the spring season, sir; then in the summer time and fall come professional football, with the result, unfortunately, that our amateur athletes get very little attention.

I must say, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, that again I congratulate the hon. Minister and his department for getting into the expansion of amateur sports in a much larger way. I know, after my discussions with his athletics commissioner, that we should see an expansion in the development of track clubs all across the province. As I say, we in the Legion are quite concerned in the training of coaches, but we must also look to the future in the training of our young athletes and we must broaden the basis as much as possible. I think the broader the basis, the better, and that as we go up we will eventually reach a very high standard in that particular activity.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, I would like to join with my hon. colleague first in commending the hon. Minister on the substantial increase in assistance to amateur sport. For the last five or six years we have criticized the Minister because the amount of assistance to the amateur was not sufficient. Even with the contribution of $120,000, that still leaves room for a tremendous amount of further assistance to the athlete. We look forward to the future when either this department or some other department of government looks at the amateur athlete through rose-coloured glasses.

May I suggest to the hon. Minister that in the allocation of the funds to the various sports bodies, he set aside sufficient funds to have a portable track so that possibly the department could transport the track to the various communities throughout the province. In that way it would encourage track and field as a winter-time activity, not only in the major centres of the province but also in any other city or municipality which has indoor facilities that could accommodate a portable track. Track and field seems to be growing by leaps and bounds at the present and the addition of a portable track would be of substantial assistance to the various track clubs throughout the province.

I would also like the department to consider not only track and field and hockey, but every other aspect of physical activity. There are too many different sports to single out any individual one that could stand some type of financial or equipment assistance.

Rather than carry on with any more comments on item No. 5, may I ask the hon. Minister if the department has ever considered transferring this vote to the community programmes branch, so that in The Department of Education, under community programmes, assistance to amateur sport might be included, rather than here?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: No, that has not been considered. We operate in quite different areas from The Department of Education. It operates through a network of the schools throughout the province and that is pretty much of a self-contained unit. I would think that the expansion of operation of the office of the athletics commissioner in our department is as good a place as any for this operation.

May I just make reference to some of the observations that have been made? You will recall some years ago one of the real objectives for which this branch existed was to control and direct and guard against exploitation and other such matters in the field of professional boxing and wrestling. The fact is that those two professional sports are on the decline.

Mr. MacDonald: What about hockey?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Oh, I would not put hockey quite in the same—

Mr. MacDonald: No, but control of the exploitation of juveniles in hockey.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Hear me out. I would not put hockey or football in the same league or in the same category as I would wrestling and boxing.

Mr. Troy: Nor I.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: But the revenue, and of course there are fees payable with respect to those items, is down to some $15,000 a year from the licensing of managers and whatever fees are payable from the exhibitions.

Reference was made to a portable indoor track, and I have before me a recommendation from the athletics commissioner that this be proceeded with by the department. In the immediate days ahead, as soon as my estimates are completed, I will have an opportunity of determining with him just the form that this should take. We have rendered assistance to those who have owned portable tracks before. There was one in Hamilton that we assisted in rebuilding and it was used on a number of occasions. I assume these things wear out and I will look forward to seeing this particular item advanced.

Track and field is receiving some special attention at this time, as you know, and I would hope that this would be but the forerunner of a trial effort with this particular sport. I think it represents the kind of amateur organization that exists throughout the province, and whatever lessons we can learn and experience we can gain from this particular operation—it is not an experiment; I call it an operation—will put us in a good position to move on to other areas.

Some reference was made to the question of the three metropolitan papers and the types of sport and the areas of athletics to which publicity generally is given in this metropolitan area. I suppose that is just one of the problems of being a large metropolitan area. But I think you have to look at what goes on in smaller communities of the province and at those newspapers published outside of Toronto, to see really what is going on.

There is another aspect to this which I think must be apparent to all of us. The activity and the benefit to be derived with respect to the operation of amateur sport, if I can put it that way, are directly related to the volunteer aspect of those connected with the sport itself. I do not think any of us would want to do anything to discourage those volunteers who make such a great contribution to the young people of our province.

My own interest would lie more in the field of midget sports and beginners' sports. I think, like a lot of other things, that if we can get young people off on the right foot, that is the time to be dealing with them. I hope that in the weeks ahead I will have something more to say about this type of midget league and athletics, with a view to expanding its operation and making it possible for these young lads and girls to get going. I think it is like anything else, as I said. The sooner they get going in a healthy form of recreation, the more they are going to benefit from it in the years ahead.

As a matter of fact, almost 1,000 associations are helped by this branch.

Mr. Troy: I might say, Mr. Chairman, that in reading bulletins from France—although I do not know per capita what it would mean—I discovered that in 1964, $300 million was spent on the development of amateur sport in France. This country—I am not saying the province—could spend $300 million—

Mr. Newman: $300 million; it is a continuing programme.

Mr. Troy: Yes, a continuing programme.

Mr. S. Apps (Kingston): Mr. Chairman, I would like to take just a moment of the time of the House in connection with track and field athletics, having had some experience both in track and field athletics in general and also rather detailed experience in professional sport.

I would like to make a comment here to the effect that I think track and field athletics would do more for the overall physical development of a young boy, particularly, than any other sport in which he might participate in, because I think it contributes to better all-round development.

I should like to commend the hon. Minister on the money that is being spent on amateur sport and I would hope that he would have a good look at track and field and try to promote this particular aspect of boys' athletics to perhaps a greater degree than is being done at the present time. It helps the overall physical development of a boy to be able to take part in track and field athletics and I commend the hon. Minister on the amount of money that is being spent and would hope that he would take a good look at it and try to promote it even more than is being done at the present time.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a few questions of the hon. Minister.

First, I would not like to get into the discussion on the value of track and field in relation to the sports that I have had the opportunity of coaching, because it is generally known that gymnastics is the key sport in all athletics. A good gymnast is always a good track and field man and is good for practically any other type of athletics, but—

Mr. Apps: Pole vaulting, too.

Mr. Newman: Yes, a terrific advantage in pole vaulting, too.

Mr. Chairman, several years ago I brought up the possibility of collecting revenues from wrestling in a television studio where the public is admitted and allowed to view wrestling. This wrestling is sometimes carried "live," sometimes it is on tape. Has the hon. Minister looked into the possibility of collecting revenue from the television wrestling bouts?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: As I understand it, when I looked into that matter—and I remember the debate on the point—it is an exhibition under our interpretation, whether it is in a studio by television or in a public arena.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, a licence fee is collected from wrestlers during exhibition bouts in the Maple Leaf Gardens, is it not?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes.

Mr. Newman: This is practically in the same category except that it is held in a television studio.

Mr. Braithwaite: Mr. Chairman, an examination of the vote leads me to wonder if the hon. Minister is not engaged in a little personal image-making.

Now he has announced a widely publicized expansion for his department and undoubtedly he will use this to justify many of the increases which are apparent in his budget. His main office salaries are increased by more than $100,000 from last year and that is about 25 per cent. The total main office expenditures have increased from $803,900 in 1964-65 to $1,136,000 this year; this is an increase of $332,000, well over 35 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few comments on item number 4 in vote 901, covering "Advertising." Here we find an increase from $140,000 to $288,000, amounting to in excess of $100,000. If you will examine the vote, Mr. Chairman, you will note that this purports to bury items, including conferences, membership and legal costs. In our estimation, Mr. Chairman, we wonder whether this is not really self-promotion. In 1962 this item was $25,000 and it has increased 1,000 per cent in the last three years.

Let us compare this image-making expenditure to the expenditures on the following: Industrial training increased from $1,274,500 to $1,494,000, approximately 17 per cent increase; conciliation services increased from $417,000 to $445,000, approximately a six per cent increase; the labour standards branch increased from $522,000 to $689,000, approximately a 35 per cent increase; the labour relations board, on the other hand, was $519,300 and this year is a budget figure of $515,000—a decrease; as far as safety and technical services is concerned, the amount of $1,538,300 has been increased to $2,060,000 and that is approximately a 34 per cent increase.

Now, as far as the human rights commission is concerned, last year's figure of $88,000 has been increased to $119,000. The question that worries us, Mr. Chairman, is that the government has increased its image-making machinery by $148,000, but its human rights budget is increased by only $31,000. The hon. Minister has stated in this House how important his government feels the human rights commission is and one would wonder why the increase in this department was not larger.

As far as vote 901, item 5, is concerned, I would like to make a few comments about amateur sport. It is noticed that there is an increase from $70,000 to $120,000. As far as the blueprint of the hon. Minister is concerned there was not any reference at all to this department in the blueprint and we wonder why.

And so, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a few questions of the hon. Minister. First, how much of the increase in this vote is going into research into the uses of leisure time brought about by automation?

My next question is how much is going into the development of community recreation programmes?

Next, how much of the increase is going into research grants to recreational specialists?

How much of the sum allocated for assistance to amateur sport is really assistance to professional sports, like boxing and wrestling?

The next question is, how much of the sum allocated to this department is travelling expenses for the athletics commissioner?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would digress here for a moment and read from a clipping I took from a recent edition of the Telegram. The sports writer says:

One other post at Queen's Park that does not seem to me to be worth the money is the office of the athletics commissioner. This one costs us something like $9,000 for the Commish who handles only boxing and wrestling. Unless his duties expand to take in the NHL, I doubt if we are getting value.

The sports writer goes on to say, Mr. Chairman:

How can anybody put in a full day looking after boxing and wrestling in this province? Where is the boxing and, more important, where is the need of an athletics commissioner to oversee exhibitions of tumbling at Maple Leaf Gardens? One day a month might be sufficient time to let the commissioner wind up all the work he has to do.

And then the commentator goes on to say:

Instead of laughing, the government might be better to consider any suggestion aimed at trimming the payroll.

In that light, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the following questions: Does the department pay any sum for travelling or long-distance expenses for Mr. McKenzie when he is acting in his capacity as president of the world boxing association?

The last question: Has the athletics commissioner spent any moneys out of the sum allocated to this department to attend boxing matches outside the province of Ontario or to attend meetings of conventions of the world boxing association?

Some people have said, and I do not know how true it is, but it has been said that he attended the Chovalo-Jones fight in New York on October 2, 1964. Also he attended the fight where Chovalo fought in Hull sometime in November. I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. Minister would like to make some comment on some of these questions.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: If the hon. member will send that list of questions over I will be glad to answer them.

Mr. Braithwaite: Well, Mr. Chairman—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I could not keep track of all those 14 questions.

Mr. Braithwaite: I will be glad to repeat them.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Send it over and I will be glad to answer.

Mr. Braithwaite: Mr. Chairman, my job is to ask questions of the Minister and if he does not care to answer he can say so, but I am on the floor of the House, Mr. Chairman, and it is my duty to ask these questions.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: If you would just ask them in an orderly fashion, as you have done with the aid of the paper before you—but you must know that you cannot ask 14 questions under one heading. I think I just want to point out—

Mr. Braithwaite: With respect, Mr. Chairman, I will be glad to repeat them individually, one by one.

An hon. member: Just give them one at a time.

Mr. Braithwaite: I will give you one right now.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I will do some just from my own memory.

Mr. Braithwaite: Mr. Chairman, I have the floor.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The first item I will speak to, Mr. Chairman, would be the newspaper article. I simply suggest to the hon. member that he knows much better than to state what he did in those terms, because it is perfectly obvious from the content of that article which I read that the author knew nothing of what he was talking about. I tell you that quite frankly, because he confined the man's efforts almost entirely to boxing and wrestling. I will give you some outline of the analysis of the commissioner's work. This arises from an audit of his activities in the fall of 1964, to ascertain the nature of the duties and the responsibilities.

The commissioner spends approximately half of his time, including three to four evenings per week, in attendance at wrestling and boxing contests, meetings of promoters, sports associations and other similar organizations. There were approximately 100 wrestling and 30 boxing bouts last year. These activities include the control of all professional bouts through the licensing of promoters, events, managers, contestants and referees as required under The Athletics Control Act. The balance of his time is occupied by encouraging amateur sports throughout the province, by analyzing and recommending grants-in-aid for equipment to recognized leagues—approximately $50,000 to 1,000 applicants last year—and providing liaison between such bodies as The Department of Education community programmes branch, Ontario federation of school athletics associations, and the amateur athletics union. He also advises local groups in matters of league organization, facilities necessary, sources of material assistance, and so on. In the last connection he is virtually on call most evenings and weekends as amateur athletics activities are at their peak during these times.

At the meeting of December 2, 1964, the civil service commission approved a flat rate of $7,500 per annum for this position in light of the information contained in the audit report.

With respect to the reference to assisting professional sport indirectly, if I were to find that any such connection existed, or the office or the funds of this branch were being used for the advancement of any such matters as you raised, I would immediately cancel it because that would completely offend against the policy of the department with respect to the use and application of our funds.

Mr. Braithwaite: Do we take it for granted, Mr. Minister, that your answer to question 5 is "none"?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: What was question 5?

Mr. Braithwaite: My question is: How much of the sum as allocated for assistance to amateur sports is really assistance to professional sports?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: None.

Mr. Braithwaite: None; thank you.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: With respect to the major items which you mentioned earlier having to do with information, this department is a service department—we do not build roads, we do not build buildings but we do try to provide services that are for the benefit of the people of this province. The only way that we can tell the public the facts of what is going on, what facilities are available in the department, and details of the various programmes, is by providing that information and actually paying for it. The hon. member may not have been in the House last year when this matter was debated at some length. I would say that pamphlets are more important to our department as a means of effective communication than they are to any other department in the government. Accordingly, an information programme is required, and really an information programme goes to the root of the successful operation of the department, particularly in the first step of any programme which is establishing communication and distributing information to those who are concerned.

With respect to the increase in other branches, the main expansion in our operation would include the increase in the complement of those branches where inspection services are involved. This again was debated at length last year. The hon. member for Woodbine (Mr. Bryden) had a good deal to say about this subject and we analyzed it in debate in some depth. To make the safety legislation, and the works labour standards legislation, and so on, effective, we have to have men on the road. This is the only way we can meet that situation. In my remarks in the introduction of my estimates I pointed out that this principle was recognized, that we were trying to make these inspections in the field as effective as possible, and that the only way we can do that is through bodies travelling about the province.

Some reference was made to the Ontario human rights commission. The budget being asked for comes from the director of the commission himself, Dr. Hill, and he estimates and tells us that these additional amounts and additional parties will enable him to operate the commission in an effective manner and having regard for the potential volume of business—if I could put it in that way—or work which his commission will be called upon to perform in the approaching fiscal year. As a matter of fact, the human rights commission does not come under this vote; it is down in 907, in any event.

Mr. Braithwaite: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. Minister would be good enough to tell us how much of the increase of $332,000—main office expenses—is going into research into the uses of leisure time brought about by automation?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That is under another vote—research, 908.

Mr. Braithwaite: Then, Mr. Chairman, how much of this increase is going into the development of community recreation programmes?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: None. It does not come under our department, as I stated a couple of moments ago, it comes under The Department of Education.

Mr. Braithwaite: Is any of this money going into community recreation programmes?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Only insofar as those who are entitled to our grants are associated indirectly with community recreation. Community recreation as a total subject comes under The Department of Education.

Mr. Braithwaite: My question, Mr. Chairman, is how much of this increase, if any, is going into community recreation programmes?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The answer must be obvious. As far as I understand, none.

Mr. Braithwaite: Next, Mr. Chairman, how much of this increase is going into the research branch to recreation specialists?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: None.

Mr. Braithwaite: Then as far as item 5 in this vote is concerned, how much of the sum allocated to this department is travelling expenses to the athletics commissioner?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: $3,000.

Mr. Braithwaite: The next question is, does the department pay any sums for travelling or long-distance expenses to Mr. McKenzie when he is acting in his capacity as president of the world boxing association?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The answer is no, but the province is a member of the world boxing association; because it controls boxing and wrestling we are a member of the world boxing association and in the normal course the commissioner would attend the annual meeting of that association at government expenses.

Mr. Braithwaite: My last question, Mr. Chairman, is: Has the athletics commissioner spent any money out of the sum allocated to this department to attend boxing matches outside the province of Ontario, or to attend meetings or conventions of the world boxing association?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes, I gave him permission to attend at least one meeting which was apart from the annual meeting in view of the fact that he is the current president of the world boxing association.

Mr. Braithwaite: Would the hon. Minister be good enough to tell us which one that was?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I could not do so at the moment.

Mr. Braithwaite: Could the hon. Minister find that out and give it to this House in due course, Mr. Chairman?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask of the hon. Minister: Does the department actually authorize wrestling in studios, wrestling that will eventually be televised either live or on tape? Must that studio obtain a licence or a permit from the department?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It is the promoter who would have the licence, as I understand it, and he in turn is controlled by us.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I asked this because I can specifically recall hearing back in my own community that the matches were put on with the specific permission of Mr. McKenzie of the Ontario athletics commission, so there must have been some permission or some licensing.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, there would be a permission inherent in the existing licence of the promoter.

Mr. Newman: Thank you.

Vote 901 agreed to.

On vote 902:

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make some rather extended comments on this estimate.

If there is one thing, Mr. Chairman, in the operation of The Department of Labour that disturbs me more than any other it is the failure to enforce its own laws and regulations.

Now there are a number of reasons for this. One of them is that down through the years the department has had inadequate staff. Related to this, I think, is another practice on the part of the department and that is that they have contented themselves with spot checks in the enforcement of many of their regulations. Inadequate staff combined with spot checks means that you are really skimming the surface and not coming to grips with a clear revelation of the extent to which the laws and regulations might not be enforced or implemented.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Just so I might follow you, I take it you are directing the general argument under this heading of apprenticeship or are you just—

Mr. MacDonald: I will be getting perhaps painfully specific before I am finished.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, I hope not.

Mr. MacDonald: Again, Mr. Chairman, combined with the fact that there is inadequate staff and the practice of spot checking, is a third factor—that this department has developed a practice of warnings rather than penalties on the first visit—perhaps on the second visit and perhaps even beyond that—with the result that there has developed an attitude on the part of those who are being regulated that there is no real serious consequence to be suffered if they do not live up to the regulations. That, combined with the spot checking approach, means that generally speaking the regulations are being honoured in the breach rather than in the observance.

As a matter of fact, I ran into an instance of this last winter, and this is outside of this immediate estimate but it illustrates the basic point I am working, Mr. Chairman. There was a strike of the operating engineers in connection with the aluminum company in Kingston on which there was considerable difficulty for the officers of this department. I think they approached the company, they sent inspectors down. Ultimately they persuaded the company to correct their approach, to cease violating the regulations. The question asked by those who had been on strike, regarding the company's violations up until then, was—is there any penalty? And when I put this matter to the people in the department the answer was no, the company has now agreed to live up to the regulations and so the whole matter is dropped.

Now if I may make an analogy, it may seem a little strong, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is about the equivalent of catching somebody robbing a bank yet there is no obligation on the part of the robber to hand over the benefit he may have gotten from the violation of the law, plus the fact he can go free if he just gives assurance that he is not going to continue to break the law.

It seems to me that this kind of approach is really asking for trouble. Now I come down to applying this general complaint of mine to the apprenticeship branch, and more particularly, Mr. Chairman, to the motor vehicle repair section of the apprenticeship branch which I have been concerned with for some years. I can recall a number of occasions when I have raised it with the head of the apprenticeship training after representations were made to me with regard to how certain apprentices were being treated, or how garage operators were getting away with more apprentices than their number of journeymen permitted under the law.

The government sends in inspectors who are euphemistically referred to as counsellors. In many instances—this can be solidly documented—the counsellors only approach management. They do not approach and discuss and seek out the details of the situation from either the journeymen or the apprentices involved. In some instances, and before I am finished I will give you one documented case, the garage operator is advised in advance that he is going to be inspected.

Indeed, it is sort of a cat-and-mouse game. I am not even certain that the description of a cat-and-mouse game is too fair, because I think the cat is the garage operator and the department is the mouse.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I would not say that. As we get on in this debate, if this is the association I think it is, I think it will be worse than a cat-and-mouse game.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, just let me proceed, Mr. Chairman. Apart from my—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Why do you not lay out the name of it now and the number of members they have, and so on?

Mr. MacDonald: I am not interested in the number of members they have. What I am interested in is whether this department's regulations are being lived up to. The number of members they have, I suggest to you, is completely irrelevant.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Not at all. This particular association is carrying on a game with our department. They have a very small, almost negligible membership. They send in names of garages picked, I say, at random. They complain about their operation. We send inspectors out and it is a wild-goose chase. There is some sort of vendetta going on between—

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, may I make my case?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes, but I just wanted, in the spirit of our debate, to point out that this is the situation. They are practically usurping a good many of the people that we have in that branch and keeping them from legitimate business on this wild-goose chase.

Mr. MacDonald: We will let the full facts speak for themselves. I am not going to be deterred by a completely irrelevant argument as to—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Oh, it is not irrelevant; but I would be glad to hear what the hon. member has to say.

Mr. MacDonald: What I am suggesting is that in my own experience down through the years I have become persuaded that there is widespread violation of the regulations with regard to the number of apprentices and other requirements, and that this department has not indicated enough vigour in its inspections—or in its counselling, if it wishes to use this term—to see that the regulations are lived up to.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, I think there is concern among the public because one of the common complaints is of taking a car in to have it repaired and feeling that you have paid a pretty high bill and then discovering that some time later the repairs did not appear to be effective. There is this undercurrent of complaint and dissatisfaction with regard to the quality of work that is being done. Now if there is widespread failure to implement the regulations, so that many of the people working are not being supervised when they are apprentices or if they are not really trained mechanics, inevitably you are going to have a lower quality of work and thus create the dissatisfaction.

As I say, down through the years I have been attempting to come to grips with this, and I simply do not have an adequate staff to do it. But I have been provided with some facts and some specific instances and I want to relate them to the House, and I want to put some questions to the hon. Minister. During the years I have been presented with situations but it is like trying to pin jelly to the wall. I do not know whether I have it pinned to the wall as yet but I think I have enough facts to make an attempt.

As I understand the procedure with regard to apprentices, it is that an apprentice registers, works for a certain number of years under the supervision of a journeyman—and attends basic and advanced training courses at the provincial institute of trades over on Nassau Street.

I want to draw to the hon. Minister's attention something which I think in effect undercuts his whole apprenticeship programme right at the start. General regulations for The Apprenticeship and Tradesmen's Qualification Act, 1964, under section 20, reads as follows:

When an applicant for a certificate of qualification, who is not the holder of a certificate of apprenticeship in the trade

(a) supplies evidence satisfactory to the director of having continuously engaged in the trade as a journeyman in Ontario or elsewhere for a period equal to or greater than the apprenticeship period prescribed for the trade, the director shall upon payment of the prescribed fee, issue to the applicant a certificate of qualification.

If I am correct—and I shall later attempt to prove that I am correct—in many instances people are in the trade without the necessary apprenticeship supervision simply because the department is not doing its job. This means that having violated the law, they come and present evidence to the government that they have been in this trade for five years without the necessary supervision, without necessarily having got the basic theory, and at that stage the government says, "Well, fine, you have five years' experience, you make application and write, and if you pass the examination we grant you your mechanic's licence." In short, this is undermining the whole apprenticeship situation.

Related to this, has been a practice with regard to blue cards. Quite frankly, I have not been able to figure out exactly what is the function of the blue card and whether it has changed through the years. The blue card used to be a card given to a workman who had the necessary qualifications from another province, and had moved here. Until he had actually been able to write the examination, he had a blue card that permitted him to work. But there is at least one instance that the hon. Minister's staff and his assistant deputy are very aware of, and this puzzles me. Let me set the context of it by a quotation from The Bulletin of the organization that the hon. Minister is not too impressed by—the Ontario licensed auto mechanics' and bodymen's association in January, 1965.

The text of a letter received from the assistant deputy Minister of Labour, Mr. T. M. Eberlee, reads as follows: One person working as a mechanic under the authority of a blue card was quite in accord with both the law and the policy of the apprenticeship branch. He is not considered to be an apprentice.

This statement undoubtedly refers to one "J.M." I am not interested in getting the name in—I shall just give the initials:

—who, we understand, started to work in Ontario at the motor vehicle repair trade in 1958 but never registered as an apprentice. In February, 1964, while working at Ken Seager Motors Limited—after providing the apprenticeship branch, at its request, with letters from previous employers stating that he had worked at the trade for five years or more—he was allowed to write an exam for a certificate of qualification, and failed same. Nevertheless, The Department of Labour considers him to be a mechanic.

My question to the hon. Minister on this, without going any further, is: If a man says he has been in the trade for this length of time and he writes and he fails his examination, you give a blue card so he continues to operate in the trade. How does the hon. Minister justify that kind of situation?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: First, I am instructed that the part of the letter from Mr. Eberlee, which the hon. member read, did not give the total context in the hon. member's quotation.

Mr. MacDonald: In what way have I misrepresented?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: There was an explanatory sentence or two that were not given.

Mr. MacDonald: What are they?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: We do not have the letter here on this specific subject. The hon. member has the letter himself.

Mr. MacDonald: I think I have got the letter, but this is not the relevant point. The relevant point is that the man wrote his examination, failed, after operating in the trade without being registered as an apprentice for five years, and you handed him a blue card so he can continue to operate in the trade. Are there any details so far as that is concerned, and if so, would the hon. Minister please correct them?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I do not have the particulars of that "Mr. X" or "J.M." to whom the hon. member makes reference. I would like to have a look at the letter and I will have a look at the file myself in the department and inform myself.

Mr. MacDonald: Very good. We will leave it at that, because I suggest to the hon. Minister that this man has been in the trade for five years; he had not been registered as an apprentice, therefore, the regulations had been violated; he wrote his exam; he failed, and you handed him a blue card to continue in the trade. I do not know how you can establish standards if this is your approach.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: May I just say on this general subject that when there is a licensing system in effect such as this, I do not care what jurisdiction we might be talking about, but there are always cases where people will make application for a licence on the basis of qualifications, or that they have conformed to the requirements but do not have the actual certificate itself. The policy of the department in those cases would be as follows: It would ask for an application supported by evidence—the pertinent and important parts of the evidence in this case having to do with the service and earlier training or employment, and the pertinent part of the questioning being under oath. If I were to find or become satisfied that there was an element of fraud involved in these matters, I would take a pretty serious view of it, with a view to possible prosecution. I would take it that seriously. And I tell you that.

As to the question of enforcement of charges that may be laid, we are not a police department. We are not a police state, and I say that advisedly. If we were to have somebody looking over everyone's shoulder, this system would be an absolute impossibility to administer and it would not be acceptable, I do not think, to anyone in this House. We do the very best we can and I make reference to the opening remarks of the hon. member on this point. He was talking about—I think he used the phrase—"warnings on the first visit," as the accepted practice.

I have looked into this matter of Department of Labour inspections with respect to the various branches for which we are responsible; I have looked into them in the United Kingdom in some detail, and that is the accepted practice there. Out of that kind of inspection a pattern evolves. Most people are law-abiding citizens, at least I have found them to be that way. It is always the minority that spoils everything for the responsible, law-abiding portion of the population, and that pattern, to an intelligent inspectional staff and its supervisor, becomes pretty clear.

There are certain firms, employers or people who would be in the minority but probably tend to live on the fringe of society, if I could put it that way, and when that is ascertained, they are the people who should be inspected without notice and frequently. They are the people who, after having had notice, show a pattern of taking advantage of the kind of situation to which the hon. member made reference. Certainly the Act should be applied and enforced strictly, as far as that group is concerned. I tell you that frankly because this is my view on the matter.

Mr. MacDonald: This may be the hon. Minister's view on the matter, but I can take another case to disprove the comparison he is making. For years we have been complaining about the failure to strictly implement safety regulations on construction, and finally this hon. Minister came in and said this nonsense is going to end. All I am suggesting is that a similar kind of nonsense has been going on for years in many other aspects of the department.

It is all very well for the hon. Minister to say that he does not want to establish a police state, nobody wants to establish a police state, but if to avoid establishing a police state violation of the law is permitted 50 per cent of the time, then the law might as well be taken off the books.

My contention is that to too great an extent, partly because there is an inadequate staff, partly because of a spot checking procedure and partly because there is not a feeling on the part of the person caught violating the law that there is any serious penalty, that the law is certain to be held in disrespect. This is the whole problem—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I cannot accept the hon. member's remarks about construction safety, but it is not this vote in any event and I will be ready for him when we get to it.

Mr. MacDonald: Agreed, very good! I know he will be ready for me because he has tightened up on that, but all I am arguing—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Quite frankly I could summarize the blueprint in about one and a half sentences and tell the hon. member this, that the blueprint requires sufficient money and people to see that an effective job is done in this department. When he is talking about experience and that sort of thing, which he is talking about, if it exists it is our intention to point it out; this is the government's intention.

Look at the request for bodies, for money—

Mr. MacDonald: I would suggest to the hon. Minister that he not talk too long, because the longer he talks the more he is complaining. He has now got to the point of saying: If it happens, we hope to get a large enough staff to see that it does not happen.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: No, I did not. I said if what the hon. member says, if it exists at all—

Mr. MacDonald: Yes—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: —it is just a matter of debating—

Mr. MacDonald: Yes, I know.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I would not ask for this money—

Mr. MacDonald: I am only one-quarter done, so relax—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I would not ask for this money across the board, nor for the extra people to complement this department if we were not prepared to follow through on this matter.

Mr. MacDonald: In the last election campaign at one time, in one speech, I had documentation to prove that we have far more money spent to look after cows' udders than we have to look after human safety, in The Department of Agriculture as compared with The Department of Labour.

If the hon. Minister gets up and says to me that he has inadequate staff, I would agree with him. In this great industrial province of Ontario the one department that has languished because the government is not really interested in it is The Department of Labour. So the hon. Minister should not get up and say in, in defence of what he is not willing to concede, but what I am asserting, namely, widespread violation, because he has not adequate staff.

I agree with him. I have been fighting for years, and my party has been fighting for years, to have The Department of Labour provided with the funds that it deserves in a great industrial province. I agree that we have made some progress, but we are far away from the kind of implementation of laws and regulations that are needed, and I am trying to document it and shall persist in trying to document it. Perhaps if the hon.

Minister will leave his comments until the end I will be able to get it done and we will make this a little shorter.

For example, let me take another specific case. On February 13 of this year this body wrote to the department over the signature of Otto J. Wolf, who was vice-president at the time and pro tem secretary, and inquired with regard to the qualifications of the service manager at York Mills Pontiac Limited. The hon. Minister acknowledged his letter on February 18 and said that he was going to look into it. He stated that this man had written an examination, or rather the records indicated that in October, 1962, the service manager had presented proof of experience in the trade, that he had tried an examination and passed it with a good mark and was issued the certificate in July, 1963.

But that is only part of the story. To be able to write an examination he must have had five years in the trade or he must, for example, have been an apprentice at some point. I want to ask the hon. Minister specific questions because eventually his department replied—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: While we are on this point, it would assist me if the hon. member could identify the file or—

Mr. MacDonald: Yes, I will identify the file: G. R. MacDonald, service manager, York Mills Pontiac.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: All right! Be calm. Let us write it down so we can get the file.

Mr. MacDonald: G. R. MacDonald, service manager, York Mills Pontiac Limited.

Now I want to ask the hon. Minister some specific questions. He said that the man had had adequate experience, he said that he had written an examination. But the final reply that closed this issue, after some specific questions were asked of the department, was that "the requirements of the apprenticeship branch were met and both the application for and the issuance of the certificate were in order."

This is a delightfully vague comment, when some very pointed and specific suggestions of possible violation had been made. For example, it was said that this man had never worked as a motor vehicle repair tradesman. I asked the hon. Minister the question: Had he? And if so, when?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The hon. member might as well listen because I will have to—

Mr. MacDonald: Let me ask one other.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: —draw the file.

Mr. MacDonald: Okay! The second one: That he had never served an apprenticeship period; that he had never attended either the basic or the advanced training courses for apprenticeship. Now if this is the case, he was not entitled to get a licence.

These were the specific questions asked, so I would suggest that if the hon. Minister wants to undercut the growing suspicion with regard to the failure to enforcement, these questions should be answered. If the hon. Minister is not in a position to answer them now, perhaps we will get them some time later.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I will be glad to get them.

Mr. MacDonald: Thank you.

Now let me go further. I want to consider a case with regard to Hume's Transport Limited. In a letter that reached the hon. Minister's department on January 26, 1965, over the signature of, again, Mr. Wolf, it relates, with regard to Hume's Transport Limited on St. Clair Avenue West, the case of an apprentice who had been working for some time under the supervision of a couple of journeymen. But the journeymen left the employ of this company, but that the apprentice continued to work without the supervision that The Apprenticeship Act requires. They wrote to inquire as to what the department was going to do about it. The reply from the assistant director Mr. Lucas, was:

The employer will be advised by letter what is required under the regulation, and what the apprentice will have to do during the time he is registered as an apprentice in order that he may qualify to write for certificate of qualification at the completing of his apprenticeship.

In other words, there was a vague reply saying that this man would have to fulfill the regulations. But was he operating under the supervision of a journeyman? There was no specific reply on this point, and I want to suggest to the hon. Minister when he looks into that particular case he will find an illustration of a general problem, namely, that the apprenticeship branch was provided with specific details of a violation of the Act and an investigation was made by the apprenticeship branch. The violation has been eliminated but no prosecution is made.

We are back to the general pattern that I was illustrating earlier. There is no penalty imposed, so that there is an encouragement not to live up to the Act with regard to having journeymen supervising an apprentice during his training period.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I assume the only difference between York Mills Motors and Hume transport is that Hume's Transport work on and service their own vehicles, they are not in the public garage business, whereas York Mills would be. Yes?

Mr. MacDonald: Right, that is right. Let me take another kind of problem within this department, and I illustrate it in reference to Alliance Dairy Limited.

On January 22 of this year, the Ontario licensed auto mechanics' and bodymen's association wrote to the department, and I will read the beginning of the letter:

It has been brought to our attention that in the right column of page 46 of the Toronto Daily Star dated January 21, 1965, appears the following ad: "Mechanic. For fleet of dairy trucks, licence not essential, steady employment, union benefits, etc."

In other words, a licence was not essential—it said so right in the ad. So the association wrote to the department and asked the department to look into the situation. It received a reply over the signature of the assistant director of the apprenticeship branch, stating that:

In reply to your letter of January 25, 1965, pleased be advised that our representatives have investigated your complaint and during the time of visit at the employer's place of business they found no motor vehicle repairs being done. The employer has been advised of the regulations pertaining to the motor vehicle repairs trade both verbally and by letter, and our representative will be calling periodically. One person who has recently been employed by the company has made application with the apprenticeship branch for an examination for a certificate of qualification.

So what happened? The department looked into this company and it found somebody violating the law. This person now makes application so that he can conform with the law. The comment in reply from Mr. Wolf and his association is an apt one:

From the information which Mr. Lucas has given us, we are under the impression that although his representative found no motor vehicle repairs being done during the time of the visit—which could have been arranged—it may have been found that some person, who was not authorized to work at the trade, was being employed to do so. We further suspect that, as a result, this employer may have temporarily dismissed such a person until he can write an examination for a certificate of qualification without serving any part of an apprenticeship period, which may have been arranged by his representative, and after which the employer will be quite free to legally employ the same person as a motor vehicle repair tradesman regardless of whether he passed the examination or not.

I go back to the case of J. M., cited earlier. He failed to write the examination, yet he was given a blue card and he continues to work. How, under these circumstances, can the hon. Minister expect that his regulations are going to be lived up to when you have this kind of a situation? I do not know whether the Minister wants to comment on this particular aspect of it or not. Do you want to comment on that, or do you want me to proceed?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: No, we will get this material out. You do not expect me to have this information here. My only comment would be that I think this Mr. Wolf has been reading too much of James Bond.

Mr. MacDonald: Perhaps before I am finished the hon. Minister will want to read James Bond so that he can be smartened up to what is going on in the field. I want to suggest to the hon. Minister that the only reason I am presenting this is that I was very much aware that this kind of situation was going on, and had been for years, but I have never been able to document it. I know that you have to document things when you come in here or it will be smoothly pushed aside.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Let me say this to you. I do not pretend to know all of the details of everything that goes on in my department, but I will tell you this: If these things are going on and if the conduct and action taken by the department with respect to the issuing of certificates, whether they be blue or not, is open to question, it will be corrected because I do not approve of it.

Mr. MacDonald: Right.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: But I also remind you that there must be a working arrangement, provided it is reasonable, in all the circumstances.

Mr. MacDonald: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: But if there is something wrong, it is not good enough for me. How is that?

Mr. MacDonald: I commend the hon. Minister. I have commended him before when we have raised complaints since he came into this department, and he has got up and, in effect, admitted that some of the criticism we were making was correct and that he was going to change it. In other words, he would not defend the indefensible. This is one thing about this hon. Minister—at least 50 per cent of the time, he will not defend the indefensible, and I congratulate him for it. He has some hon. colleagues over there who, the more indefensible it is, the more vigorously they will defend it. The hon. Provincial Secretary (Mr. Yaremko) heads that list. However, I do not want to provoke him into action.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: How many—are there very many?

Mr. MacDonald: I want to consider another case here now. This has to do with Gallant Auto Body—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Are there very many of them?

Mr. MacDonald: I have two more batches. On February 2 of this year, the licensed mechanics' association wrote to the department and drew attention to an ad which was headed:

Body man. Experience, licence not necessary.

In other words, here is a company openly advertising that you do not need to be licensed to be able to get a job at their shop in violation of the Act. What happened in this instance was that as usual there was a letter from the department saying, "We are going to look into it." That was from D. C. McNeil, on February 5. Then there was a letter from the assistant director on February 15, saying in the first paragraph:

We have investigated the complaint which is outlined in your letter dated February 2, in connection with Gallant Auto Body, 85 Portland Street, Toronto. We had our supervisor check this complaint and a follow-up was done by our prosecuting officer.

So they must have hit a bit of pay dirt in this instance, if I may interject.

The information submitted to this office by our two representatives indicates that we do not have sufficient evidence to pursue your recommendation and to instigate court action at the present time.

I wonder if these people were advised that they were going to be inspected before the representatives went around to inspect them—because this happens, and do not let the hon. Minister say it does not happen, because the cases can be documented.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, it should not be.

Mr. MacDonald: I agree. Mr. Wolf wrote back. We have not got Mr. Wolf here today, but again he comes into the picture, and let us hear his comments—

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): It was foxes last week, wolves the week before.

Mr. MacDonald: He is replying on March 2, 1965, to:

The Honourable H. L. Rowntree, MPP

Dear Sir:

The information which Mr. Lucas has given us indicates that his supervisor found reason to believe that this employer was violating the Apprenticeship and Tradesmen's Qualification Act, and as a result an attempt was made by the prosecuting officer to obtain evidence of same, but he was either unable or unwilling to do so. For this and other reasons, we are now under the impression that the present policy and practice of the apprenticeship branch is as follows:

1. If a counsellor of the branch apprehends for the first time a person actually violating the Act, the offender is merely warned verbally to discontinue doing so, and if possible an attempt is made to register the offender as an apprentice, or to even arrange for same to write an examination for a certificate of qualification without serving any part of the apprenticeship period, rather than to prosecute the person for the offence. No further action is taken against the offender at that time.

2. Even if the same offender is apprehended a second and a third time for violating the Act, he is still not prosecuted, but merely warned by a regular letter for the second offence and by a registered letter for the third offence.

3. Only if the offender is apprehended for the fourth time, and by the prosecuting officer personally, while the Act is actually being violated at the time of contact, is a prosecution attempted. Very few persons would be foolish enough to allow such an event to occur, and as a result, this is considered to be the main reason why few such prosecutions have been attempted in the past.

If such is the case—and they have provided documentation in at least one instance, and I have reason to believe so, without falling back on the evidence of Mr. Wolf, from my own observations down through the years—

The apprenticeship branch counsellors are considered to be merely recruiting officers for employers—and are being paid by us, the taxpayers—to solicit persons to register with the branch, to provide it with revenue in return for its authorization to work legally at the motor vehicle repair trade, as well as other trades.

A number of times that departmental inspection turns up people who say, “Well, I will write an examination for certification,” or, “I will register as an apprentice,” but do so only when the counsellor has found them. This clearly means that there have been violations of the law up until then.

I come to my final case—and, incidentally, for each one of these I am giving the hon. Minister here, I can give him three or four other cases of the same nature. I am citing one to illustrate the situation, but I could give you correspondence for three or four more. I take this final one, because I want to suggest to the hon. Minister it is perhaps the most conclusive of all.

On February 18, F. A. Holden, president of the OLAMBA, as it is called, Ontario licensed auto mechanics’ and bodymen’s association, wrote to the branch and inquired with regard to—well, let me read the letter:

Will you please notify us of the last date on which a counsellor of the apprenticeship branch called on York Mills Pontiac Limited at 3501 Yonge Street, Toronto 12, to ensure that this company and their employees are complying with The Apprenticeship and Tradesmen’s Qualification Act, 1964. Also please notify us of the name of the counsellor.

Signed, F. A. Holden, President.

A reply came back from the assistant director, Mr. Lucas, dated March 9th:

Re York Mills Pontiac: Our representative, Mr. E. Bowyer checked the above place of business in reference to the certified mechanics and apprentices who are employed in the motor vehicle repair trade. I have spoken to Mr. Bowyer about the investigation and he has assured me that everything is in order regarding this matter. Trusting this information is satisfactory, I am yours truly, H. E. Lucas.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: H. E. what?

Mr. MacDonald: H. E. Lucas, the assistant director. Now, brother Wolf is back into the picture.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: He is here in the gallery.

Mr. MacDonald: Oh, is he? Do you know the man?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, he has been pointed out.

Mr. MacDonald: You should get to know him better, because, I suggest, he knows more about some aspects of your department than you do.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: There is nothing new about that.

Mr. MacDonald: I shall read this letter to document it. Here is a letter now which says—what is the inimitable phraseology?—“everything is in order regarding this matter.” Now, here is the letter that was sent to the department on March 23—this week—and I suggest to the hon. Minister that this is solidly documented from people within this firm. So do not let us be pushed aside on this.

To Mr. H. E. Lucas: re York Mills Pontiac Limited, 3501 Yonge Street, Toronto 12.

Dear Sir:

This is pursuant to your letter dated March 9, 1965, concerning the subject employer in which you have stated “Mr. E. Bowyer checked the above place of business and he has assured me that everything is in order.”

For your information, on March 3, 1965, we were advised that a message had been given by The Department of Labour to employees of this employer specifically for the service manager, G. R. MacDonald to notify him that representatives of the apprenticeship branch were expected to arrive there at 9.30 a.m. on March 4, 1965, to make an investigation.

So they were advised of it before that they were going to be counselled, if I may use your euphemistic term. I continue with the letter.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I do not like that word, euphemistically.

Mr. MacDonald: You do not? I do not really like the word “counselling,” in the light of what is happening. Continuing with Mr. Wolf’s letter:

On March 4, 1965, we were further notified that representatives of the apprenticeship branch, namely Mr. Bowyer and

Mr. Rutledge had made a hit-and-miss investigation there on that same day but they evidently neglected to scrutinize the authority to work at the MVR branch of some of the employees who were working at the trade at the time.

In spite of their investigation and report we still have good reason to believe that everything was not in order at the time and to suspect this employer may still be continuing—

Now, I beg the hon. Minister to listen to how everything was in order.

1. To employ on their day shift two persons, namely, Ed Nuttall and Don Wilson, to make mechanical body and upholstery repairs to motor vehicles as trimmers which are considered to come under the jurisdiction of class B, MVR tradesmen although it is believed The Department of Labour has not authorized either of them to do so and Mr. Nuttall may have been doing so for years.

2. To employ on their day shift a person, namely, Lorne Refforn, since February 15, 1965—and who may have been employed there previously—to paint motor vehicles which is considered to come under the jurisdiction of class B, MVR tradesmen although he may be colour blind and it is believed The Department of Labour has authorized him to do so.

Maybe this is why we are getting so many red cars these days.

3. To employ on their day shift a person, namely, John Barry who may have an assistant named Andy Ferguson, both of whom may be supposedly employed to do lubrication work and whom, it is believed, have not been authorized by The Department of Labour to work as motor vehicle repair tradesmen but who nevertheless may be performing complete predelivery inspections on new motor vehicles and signing the PDI forms for same as well as other work, such as on brakes and tune-ups which are considered to come under the jurisdiction of class A, MVR tradesmen.

4. To employ on their day shift two persons, namely, Jim Hunter and Jim Rae as service salesmen who, it is believed, are not authorized by The Department of Labour to work at the MVR trade, although part of the responsibility of each may be to supervise the work of at least two apprentices and/or certified MVR tradesmen.

Now just let me interrupt here, Mr. Chairman, because hon. members may be losing the implications of this. All of this is in violation of the law, if it is correct, and I have reason to believe it is correct.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: If it is correct.

Mr. MacDonald: Right.

5. To employ on their day shift in their fast service department (a) only three certified MVR tradesmen, namely, Howard Ahrens, Alf McQuigg and Sulo Sopero but (b) as many as five uncertified MVR tradesmen including (1) four apprentice tradesmen, namely, Gordon Weatherington, Brian Hutton, Evan MacDonald, Neils Madsen, as well as (2) a person named Steve Todorovich who may have been working there since 1958 at the MVR trade under the authorization of a blue card issued to him by the apprenticeship branch at that time and who may also have written examinations for a certificate of qualification twice already and failed both times.

Now, just let me pause here, Mr. Chairman, to point to the significance of this paragraph that I have just read. There are only three certified tradesmen and they get five uncertified tradesmen. Now the regulations of the department are that there must be one journeyman for the first apprentice. There must be three more journeymen before you can get a second apprentice in the picture, if I recall correctly. Am I correct on that?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I would have to look at that particular schedule.

Mr. MacDonald: I think you have to have up to four journeymen before you can have a second apprentice. Yet, here you had three certified tradesmen and five uncertified tradesmen.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I did not, they did.

Mr. MacDonald: They did. Right. This is my complaint. But let me draw attention to the latter part of this. They have specific reference to a man here who has been operating on a blue card since 1958. Now, Mr. Chairman, with the care of the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Letherby) for upholding the law, I can see his approach. But here is a man who has been operating on a blue card unauthorized, allegedly having written and failed the exams and he has been operating since 1958. Now what is the purpose of a blue card? I submit this for the hon. Minister to investigate.

The only thing I can say, Mr. Chairman, is that the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) found that all the questions from the hon. member for Downsview (Mr. Singer) helped to get him to know his department. I hope all my questions will help the hon. Minister to get to know this branch of this department.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Oh, the hon. member is not very far ahead of me there.

Mr. MacDonald: I continue:

To employ on their combined day and night shifts as many as 12 apprentices and only 20 certified MVR tradesmen at Class A.

In other words, a clear violation of the law.

7. To employ a person named W. Gallant, who may be supposedly employed to do lubricating and undercoating work on their night shift, and who, it is believed, has not been authorized by The Department of Labour to work at the MVR trade, but who, nevertheless, may temporarily be performing mechanical repairs during the afternoon shift on this employer's used motor vehicles in place of an apprentice tradesman, named Roger Cyr, who performed such repairs until recently when he temporarily left to attend the provincial institute of automotive allied trades at the request of The Department of Labour.

8. To employ on their night shift since February, 1965, a person named Rowan Spencer, who may be making mechanical repairs on motor vehicles which are considered to come under the jurisdiction of class A, MVR tradesmen, although it is believed that The Department of Labour has not given authority to do so, unless they have done so just recently.

9. To give apprentice MVR tradesmen work to perform on a flat rate basis and without a certified tradesman with whom to work while certified tradesmen are idle with no work to perform.

10. To neglect their responsibility to maintain safe working conditions by failing to provide their employees with satisfactory safety glasses to use when operating some of the grinders and machine equipment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is the catalogue of ten alleged violations and I hope they are not going to be sloughed off in the fashion that some other alleged violations earlier were. The rest of the letter reads as follows:

If the foregoing is an example of conditions which may exist when Mr. Bowyer reports that "everything is in order" and an indication of past practices, and standards of requirements of the apprenticeship branch from persons to write an examination for a certificate of qualification in the MVR trade, and the past performance of its supervisors and counsellors, it is little wonder that the standards of our trade are so low.

Therefore, we now request that the apprenticeship branch should make another more thorough investigation as soon as possible of the qualifications of each and every one of the employees who are working at the MVR trade for this employer, including those who are working on the afternoon and/or night shift and those who are working in their recently established body and paint shop. And if any violation of the Act is revealed, prosecute—according to section 17 of the Act which does not provide for warnings—the employer in particular and all of the employees who are found to be violating same, or, ensure that they are not violating same.

We further request that an investigation be made into the reasons why this employer was notified in advance of when the investigation was going to be made on March 4, 1965.

Upon completion of the investigation, and action taken by the apprenticeship branch, we would appreciate being advised of same in accordance with our discussion with the assistant deputy Minister of Labour, Mr. T. M. Eberlee, on January 21, 1965.

Now, I will say this to the hon. Minister: I agree that he has to take a look at the correspondence before he can satisfy himself on this. But when he does so, may I suggest to the hon. Minister that he not deal in the irrelevancies as to the alleged lack of representation of this group? I do not care if they represent only one person. What I am interested in is whether the facts as they are spelled out in their letters—from information close at hand, presumably, with their members being on the spot—is this information correct? Because if it is then my case is solidly documented that your laws and regulations have been honoured more in the breach than in the observance.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I will be glad to look into the matters to which the hon. member makes reference and see what is going on and see what substance there is to Mr. Wolf's report to the hon. member for reading in the House. There are about 33,000 registered motor vehicle repairmen in the province as of early 1965. I think the records should be clear at this point with respect to what we have done on the inspection system from 1962 to 1965. There has been a percentage increase in the number of inspectors and counsellors of 525 per cent, and there has been a percentage increase from the year 1964 to 1965 of 45 per cent.

Mr. MacDonald: What is the number though?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The numbers? In 1961 there were four; 1962 eight; 1963 twelve; 1964 thirty-five; 1965 fifty.

Mr. MacDonald: They have gone up from four to 50?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes. I would think 50, and I am speaking now without a look at the work load, but I would think that a staff, a group of 50 constant people, should be able to direct the proper supervision of this repair trade. I will be glad to look into those matters.

Vote 902 agreed to.

On vote 903:

Mr. A. V. Walker (Oshawa): Mr. Chairman, on vote 903, I would like to say a word on this vote.

First of all, I would feel a little inclined to say that this may come as a little surprise to the hon. Minister of Labour on the basis of some of the discussion which we have had, but I believe in giving credit where credit is due, Mr. Chairman—and I think that first of all I would like to publicly congratulate the hon. Minister on the attempts which he is making in regard to the labour situation in this province.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Why is he surprised at that?

Mr. Walker: I think this is a statement of fact, that I doubt there is any more difficult portfolio to handle than that of the portfolio of labour. Because this portfolio, along with education and health, touches the lives of so many thousands of our citizens. I think that our hon. Minister is making a very determined effort to see to it that our Department of Labour is run efficiently.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): The hon. member might be made parliamentary secretary after that.

Mr. Walker: Now that I have said that, I will get around to the statement I wish to deal with and that is the matter which has already been referred to by the hon. member for Wentworth East. Of course, Mr. Chairman, this is a very important situation as far as the riding from which I come is concerned. I would like to speak for a moment on this business of conciliation boards and particularly as they apply to the major industries and unions of this province.

I would agree, Mr. Chairman, that in the smaller industry field the conciliation boards are no doubt doing a satisfactory job, but it appears to me that in the field of our major industries they leave quite a lot to be desired. I had the opportunity of discussing this situation with a judge who happened to be in the city of Oshawa serving on a conciliation board for one of the smaller industry disputes and he expressed the opinion that I am now dealing with, that the convening of boards in the major industries was quite unsatisfactory and, as he expressed it, was somewhat of a waste of time and money.

Last December in the city of Oshawa, as is well known, we did have a strike with the united automobile workers and General Motors. I expressed some very definite opinions on the fact that we had to wait for 17 days for the conciliation board to be set up, and when the conciliation board was set up the meeting lasted exactly 10 minutes. I must say that naturally enough, as the government member for this riding, I took a fair amount of abuse over this situation.

I would like the hon. Minister to give us his views, and I ask for his views particularly with regard to the major fields. I have already admitted that I think that possibly in the smaller industries they are doing something of value, but it seems to me that among our major industries and our major unions it is a pretty hopeless thing as far as these conciliation boards are concerned. It does not appear to me that they are accomplishing a great deal.

I would appreciate the hon. Minister giving his views on this subject.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I assume that when you refer to large industries, you include large unions, and I presume you refer to, say, the automobile industry or steel.

Mr. Walker: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Those would probably be the two largest—

Mr. Walker: Possibly the mining industry.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes. Here is the situation.

I would agree that the entire conciliation process makes its greatest contribution with respect to medium and small sized firms or industries. I think that is the greatest area of its operation and effectiveness, contrary to what the hon. members for Etobicoke and for Wentworth East said.

The reason that they might not be so effective, or I think it would be accurate to say that their services are not required to the same extent, is that with the experience of large unions and large steel companies and large automobile companies and, indeed, large mines—I am thinking of INCO and Falconbridge—on both counts, whether it be employer or union, you are dealing with a highly experienced group of people who know exactly where they are going.

They are people who, in the broad sense of the word, do not want interference from the government in any way, shape or form. They would rather carry on by themselves.

Now, I would agree that the number of firms in that category would be fairly few, but the number of works involved would be relatively great. I would have to tell you that I have seen no evidence, nor have I heard any debate here today nor since I have been the Minister, that is in the past two and a half years, that would lead me to the view that it would be a desirable thing across the board to withdraw or shorten the present provisions with respect to the various steps in the conciliation process. I say this to you advisedly, because in those large industries it is obvious these people know exactly what is going on at the conciliation board.

I do not think this is the place for me to name names, but we know which groups go through the motions before a board, and that others want to see the board's time period expire and be completed as quickly as possible. But by the same token, I am sure those who have spoken would be aware of the peculiar situation which took place at Stelco in Hamilton during this last round of bargaining. While it is true that that board took a long time, the fact was that the board, by consent of the union and the company, was being used to negotiate the various items that were at issue and had to be determined.

There was another factor having to do with Stelco last fall, in that the pattern of bargaining changed with respect to the subsidiary plant and the position that its affairs were to take in relation to the main plant, as against the previous round at the last contract. These were all things that had a bearing on the length of time that was taken. This was a pretty healthy situation. I did not look upon the Stelco negotiations as being negative in any fashion at all. I think they used the officials of the conciliation board in the sense of mediators, and this is part of the process which we all contemplate. I do not think the hon. member for Wentworth East was endeavouring to fault that particular conciliation board; I think it has to stand on its own feet in the light of the circumstances that took place.

There was something else that happened, and I simply want to make reference to it without going into detail. By the very existence of a conciliation board and the nominees on that board—the labour, union and employer representatives as well as the experienced chairman—negotiation was made possible. It was fortunate that those three men were available and had been sitting as a board, as was shown when that board sent in its report. This report cannot be taken as a pattern or a precedent; this was a special situation for reasons beyond the control of the parties that reported and the life of the conciliation board was brought to an end. It was at the request of the union, with the compliance and the agreement of management, that I was asked as the Minister to request the members of the conciliation board—even though they had sent in this report terminating their official status—to continue in their efforts in a post-conciliation manner.

This is a most unusual situation, but the point is that even in the case of Stelco, those men who ultimately brought agreement between the parties would not have been there if it had not been for the existence of the conciliation process. I put it to you this way.

It was rather interesting that there were some similar special situations at Algoma Steel. No doubt everyone is familiar with that from what they have read in the papers. But when I look at the number of cases that are settled by bargaining through the conciliation officer, and some among the remainder settled at the conciliation board stage, and then a further group settled at the post-conciliation board stage, I just cannot see the overall advantage of abandoning the conciliation board or indeed interfering with the time period factor in any way at all. I am sympathetic to what the hon. member for Wentworth East had to say about this because he is knowledgeable in these matters. But it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the greatest good—and I say this quite frankly—in the interests of achieving industrial peace through collective bargaining can be reached and achieved by leaving the setup as it is at the moment.

On the other hand, if I found in my experience that it was failing, and I do not think it is failing, I would be quite willing to review it at a later date.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chairman: I am sorry, this member has been up a couple of times.

Mr. Sargent: In this vote 903, someone has said that the magic of conciliation can be good or bad depending on the support labour unions have at government level.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I did not hear what you said in the last part of the sentence.

Mr. Sargent: I said conciliation can be good or bad depending on the support labour unions have at government level—depending on the policy of government.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes.

Mr. Sargent: Last night on TV, on This Hour has Seven Days, we saw a sorry sight in the documentary film on the Toronto newspaper strike. In this first test The Department of Labour and the Tory government have had with automation, I suggest they have failed miserably in the last 205 days. Last night, Mr. Chairman, we saw proud Canadian workmen, in effect, begging for their jobs back—for the right to work. Granted the ITU have lost their strike, and in spite of the fine efforts of Mr. Fine and the unknown contribution of the hon. Minister of Labour, as far as I am concerned the owners of the newspapers hold all the winning cards it seems, and again we see that big business has triumphed.

We see here the end result of the Robarts government's way of handling its first real test in automation. For nine months it has failed to solve through conciliation what, in the smallest way, is its first real test in automation, and to handle this Frankenstein's monster that is going to be held like a dagger over the heads of all our people who hold jobs in this province.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I would like to correct the hon. member on one point, Mr. Chairman. The fact is that there were a number of things said on that documentary which were far from the facts. The computer issue is one of the few issues that was settled within the week after the strike, and today remains settled. There are other issues to keep the parties apart. It is not the computer issue, I tell you that, and the documentary was entirely wrong in that respect.

Mr. Sargent: I grant the hon. Minister—that is the mechanical part of the whole business. What we are after is a theme or a policy on behalf of this government on how it is going to face automation in the future. I suggest it is like the fellow who got a job in a lead mine, and asked his boss what his job was, and his boss replied, "To get it out." Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister of Labour was unable last night, by being at fault in the eyes of these striking newspaper men—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I did not hear that on the programme—

Mr. Sargent: They said that the government—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The hon. member is quite wrong.

Mr. Sargent: The hon. Minister speaks for the government; I think that is the problem. I am not too knowledgeable about these things—I have a lot to learn—but I think that this could be handled this way: That the hon. Minister decide that this is going to be settled or the government decide that this is going to be settled. The newspaper owners are called together, and the union; and the government says "This cannot happen in Ontario," that we do protect a man and his family against automation. If it has to be done, I suggest that, together with industry and business, we set up a multi-million dollar fund to work out a programme that will protect every man and woman in this province who has a job.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Just so that I will understand the position being taken, the hon. member wants direct and absolute government intervention in industrial disputes. I want to get this straight because—

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, I am speaking for myself—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Is that what, in effect, he is saying?

Mr. Sargent: I am not saying that. I am speaking for myself.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, that this government should have a policy in so far as fighting automation at the start, because this is going to be a cancerous thing that will grow from now on. The hon. Minister has proved that he cannot handle one strike in this province—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, I cannot accept that kind of irresponsible statement. Automation and technological change have been here since the day the wheel was invented; it has been going on as part of social change for generations and generations.

Automation did not start yesterday, nor did the dispute between the two parties to which the hon. member made reference begin overnight nor was strike action taken overnight.

The two parties represent sophistication at its greatest; they represent experience. There is no union organization that has more experience than the ITU on the continent. Indeed it is the second oldest craft union on the North American continent. Similarly, management is experienced.

These are sophisticated areas to which reference was made earlier by the well-informed member for Wentworth East, in which big business does not want intervention. They want to be left to work these things out themselves in industrial disputes. This is the situation.

Now I recognize the hon. member's right to debate the newspaper strike and I would be the last one to comment on it at all. In view of the negotiations which are currently going on and the meetings which are being held, I myself am not in a position to say any more about this strike at this moment than I have.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the hon. Minister's position; but going back it will be recalled that the former member for Riverdale, Mr. Macaulay, in the past session gave a great and knowledgeable dissertation on automation and what this government plans to do about it, but all the hon. Minister is doing is talking a good game. Nothing is being done about it and this will continue to grow unless it is nailed down. This thing will not go away, Mr. Chairman. It has to be nailed down and I say at this time that the hon. Minister intervene immediately.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Has the hon. member not read the newspapers? Does he know what has happened in his absence from the House? Does he know when the last meeting was held between the publishers and the ITU people?

Mr. Sargent: I am sorry; I do not know that.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I suggest that the hon. member inform himself before he engages in debate on a subject that is so vital and important to the people of this province as this one is.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sargent: If it is that important the hon. Minister has not thought so for the past 205 days. It was a sorry sight to see these fine Canadian citizens, our craftsmen, begging to get their jobs back. I think it behooves the hon. Minister to get up and do something about it.

Mr. Chairman, on this vote 903, I have a number of questions to ask the hon. Minister on conciliation.

First of all, under—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Is the hon. member going to put the questions one at a time or is he going to put them in bulk?

Mr. Sargent: We will do it my way.

There is an item here under "Conciliation Board, $209,000." It covers judges per diem living allowance and remuneration to other chairmen and members. How much pay—first of all, living allowances—are judges receiving now?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: They get $60 a day expenses.

Mr. Sargent: I did not hear the hon. Minister.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It is $60 a day.

Mr. Sargent: How much pay?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: An allowance of $60 a day is all he gets from our department expenses; it has to do with The Judges Act and so on.

Mr. Sargent: It is $60 a day. Last year I was under the impression that they received $100 a day.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I think that the hon. member is under the wrong impression.

Mr. Sargent: Here is a man, W. H. Dickie, a judge—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Sargent: He is not a judge? This $22,230 is at $60 a day? There are not that many days in a year.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The hon. member could not have been at the debate last year because this matter was analyzed in some detail. I will be glad to make reference to it now.

I have the list here of cases during the past fiscal year, from April 1, 1963, to March 31, 1964. The same principle applies: If the per diem allowance is multiplied by the total number of days, and so on, it would be found that there were more days paid for than there were days in the year. This arises from the fact that under the rules of a conciliation board there are automatic allowances to both the members of the board and the chairman with respect to the writing of the actual report; and there are a few days automatically included in his allowances for which he may claim reimbursement. This man is not a judge—Mr. W. H. Dickie is an experienced man much in demand by both labour and management with respect to being a chairman of boards.

Of all the conciliation boards that were created last year, in 80 per cent of the cases the union and the employer agreed on a chairman themselves so that the department only appoints in about 20 per cent of the cases. Mr. Dickie is much in demand by both labour and management, as I have said. For instance, I could go over a lengthy list of 89 appointments in one fiscal year, or 89 cases where he sat as chairman, which indicates the demand in which he finds himself. We are fortunate that we have men of his calibre in this province.

Mr. Sargent: That works out to 366 days he worked last year.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Or more!

Mr. Sargent: Or more! What are the qualifications of a man that will receive this kind of money?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, it is not the qualifications to receive the money, it is the qualification to be in demand. He probably, and I say this frankly, he probably has those qualities of heart and mind, the ability to apply himself, to absorb detail, to listen to both sides of the case and to serve and conduct himself in such a way that the demand for his services is there. I think it is no more or less than that. It is a very great characteristic in this day and age. His Honour Judge Bennett of Owen Sound is a man of similar character.

Mr. Sargent: Thank you. How many of the conciliation boards you speak of have been appointed by the Minister since he took over the functions to administer the conciliation services from the Ontario labour relations board?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I would have to look that up. It would run in the order of several thousand.

Mr. Sargent: How many conciliation officers have been appointed?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: They are all on our staff. Conciliation officers form the conciliation branch, and it is under that area of operation that an officer is assigned to a particular dispute. This is the branch that was formerly headed by Mr. Louis Fine and is now headed by Mr. A. C. Dennis.

Mr. Sargent: Thank you. How many mediators have been appointed?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Are you referring to mediators under the amendment to the Act two years ago?

Mr. Sargent: Does the hon. Prime Minister want to adjourn the House?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): I thought I would give the hon. Minister a chance to answer this question that he was asked.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: You understand the difference between mediation and conciliation, I assume? The mediation function is usually performed in this province by conciliators or by conciliation boards. There is provision for a mediator in the Act, but I do not think that it has ever been used.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves that the committee rise and report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow I would like to deal with some second readings on the order paper and then we will return to the estimates of this department.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Government bills only?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 6.05 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, MARCH 30, 1965

The House met at 3 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are always pleased to have visitors to the Legislature and today we welcome as guests: In the west gallery, a Women's Progressive-Conservative group from Humber riding and students from Rosedale public school; and in the east gallery, students from St. Mary's, St. Vincent's and St. Michael's separate schools, Oakville.

Petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Mr. D. A. Evans (Simcoe Centre), from the standing committee on labour, legal and municipal bills, presented the committee's fourth report, which was read as follows: Your committee begs to report the following bill with certain amendments.

Bill No. 41, An Act to provide for the settlement by arbitration of labour disputes in hospitals.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, before the report is adopted, I should like to make it a matter of record to the House and in the presence of some who were present at that meeting of labour, legal and municipal bills this morning.

It was an historic occasion, to speak from the vantage point of a person who reveres the institution of Parliament—I want to take this opportunity of recording the resentment that I felt about the attitude of the persons of responsible positions who came before that committee this morning in an endeavour, in pursuance of their democratic right, to persuade us to do something other than adopt this bill, the hospital arbitration bill, in principle.

Sir, had you been there yourself, you would have seen the most wretched and the most insulting behaviour by people who came under the guise of being responsible union officials. The capacity to insult really knew no bounds. These people were prepared to go to almost any lengths in an attempt to pillory us, the members of the committee who opposed their point of view and supported the principle of this bill.

I know, having spoken to my colleague, the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Bukator), who was there with me, that he shares the point of view that I now express. I tell you, sir, without going into some of the types of things said, that when it came to the end of the deliberations of the committee and we were dealing with the bill clause by clause we finished with, I believe it was clause 7—which is a lengthy one and the bill contains in its entirety, I think, 15 or 16 clauses. At that point one of the public, one of the persons who came to make representations professing—and to some degree I think he did speak for the rest of those—he got up and in a grandiose gesture made some remark to the effect that it was no use dealing with us at all, that we were nothing but stupid idiots. He started to proceed out and the rest of them walked out of the committee. Then they waited in the hall and we were subjected to further abuse by some of them as we proceeded out.

Little did they know, it was rather sardonic—if the business was not so serious to relate—it is rather sardonic that little did they know that section 14 of the bill was substantially amended after these representatives of their organizations had left and a very striking principle was enunciated in a new section 14 of the bill. I will not go into the details of that. Had they had the poise to stay and discuss the thing reasonably they no doubt would have had some very trenchant criticisms to make of the new section 14.

But I just want to record that it was a shameful episode in the life of Parliament to have to be here as a representative of the people and to be subjected to the abuse that we were subjected to this morning under the aegis of a committee of this Legislature.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Speaker, I opposed the adoption of this bill. Of course I am not going to elaborate at this point; I opposed it in second reading.

But I do not agree in any manner with the sensitivity of the hon. member for Sudbury.

Certainly I think those people, the trade unionists who were there to speak on behalf of the unions they represent and the employees they represent, had a right to feel the way they felt; and I think it is because of the procedures of dealing with legislation of this type.

As we know, this bill had second reading and lengthy debate a week ago today in this House to endorse the principle of the bill and it then went to committee. Many of the trade union leaders were advised that it would be before this committee and of course prepared briefs. Some of them came from long distances, from out of town, and came before the committee to present their opposition to the principle of compulsory arbitration. They found that it was a foregone conclusion, that the members had dealt with it and it had been approved in principle and that they were going to be restricted and confined to dealing with the bill only in the sections of the Act. Nevertheless, they won their point and were able to make their presentation. But they felt from the reception they got from the committee and some of the people who were guiding the bill through that it did not matter much what they had to say; that it was a foregone conclusion that this bill was going to be passed.

Now I know that it is the government's responsibility and the responsibility of hon. members of this House to pass bills in this manner on second reading. But I would think that there should be a change in procedure with bills that are of such an important nature. Where there is a strong protest from a large group of citizens of this province there should be some way that they would have an opportunity to deal with the principle of the bill before it comes before this House.

I remember we had quite a discussion over this particular matter with the police bill where there was an attempt by the government to get the police bill into committee prior to giving it second reading. There was protest against that. I think it is quite right that when a bill is of such importance all parties in this province should have the opportunity to deal with it in principle before it comes before the Legislature, so that the members of the committee would have a real understanding of what the protest is about, and they could better make up their minds.

I had a feeling in that committee meeting this morning that many members of the committee learned something about the intent and the impact of that particular bill of which they were not acquainted before the bill came before them. Therefore I would urge that whoever is responsible, give some consideration to legislation of such an important nature so that all parties are notified ahead of time and can prepare their briefs and can approach the standing committee as to the principle, as well as to the particular sections of the bill.

I do not agree with the hon. member for Sudbury that these people were stupid and—

Mr. Sopha: I did not say that—

Mr. Gisborn: I am sorry, he implied that a particular member of the trade union movement got up and said something that implied that the committee was stupid. That is right. I do not think that there was anything wrong with that because—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Gisborn: I do not think that there was anything wrong with that because that would have been the impression I would have received if I had been sitting in the union's place and the particular piece of business that they were dealing with was getting so little attention from the committee.

I feel it to be the government's responsibility to try to give the public a better hearing when we have legislation of such an important nature coming before this House so that we all know what their feelings are and we can deal with them in an effective manner.

Report adopted.

Mr. H. E. Beckett (York East) begs leave to present the fourth and final report of the select committee appointed to inquire into and review The Municipal Act and related Acts.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, may I get some clarification as to what our procedure is now? Are we debating this today, or are we going to have an item placed on the order paper?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): I anticipated that this might arise and I realize that there will be various members of the committee who might like to speak on this report. I would suggest that the chairman of the committee be allowed to speak this afternoon, and then we will place the report on the order paper so that it can be called as an item of business at the convenience of the House, when other members of the committee may make any comments they wish in regard to the content of the report.

Mr. H. E. Beckett (York East): Mr. Speaker, I first want to thank the members of the committee who have sat during the years for their keen interest in all the various statutes we had before the committee.

The assistance of recognized authorities on various aspect of municipal legislation and municipal government, Ministers of the Crown, the Clerk of the legislative assembly, and many senior civil servants of various departments of the government, is gratefully acknowledged.

The committee also wishes to thank Mr. James A. Taylor, QC, legal counsel; Mrs. H. G. Rowan, CA, secretary; Professors K. G. Crawford and Stewart Fyfe of the institute of local government, Queen's University, Kingston; and Mr. Robert Curtis, BA, for their assistance and advice.

FOURTH AND FINAL REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON THE MUNICIPAL ACT AND RELATED ACTS

In March 1961, the Legislature set up a select committee of the Legislature to inquire into and review The Municipal Act and related Acts for the purpose of modernizing, consolidating and simplifying such Acts and for making such recommendations as may be necessary for their improvement.

An interim report was made to the Legislature in 1962, chiefly asking leave to continue the work. A second interim report was made to the Legislature in March, 1963, and it dealt with The Municipal Act, The Assessment Act, The Planning Act, The Local Improvement Act, The Municipal Franchise Extension Act and The Voters' Lists Act. A third report was made to the Legislature in 1964, and it dealt with all public parks, with the exception of provincial parks, and The Public Utilities Act.

The committee's study of municipal matters brought to light an avalanche of material which had to be sifted, sorted and used in a pragmatic way. It is trite to say that while good legislation may provide the tools and create the vehicle for sound local government, it does not by itself generate well-administered municipalities. The problem is both legislative and administrative. The people who are being governed are of paramount importance and this thought must be kept constantly to the fore.

It is quite obvious that the emergence of a well-administered municipality, in accordance with our democratic concept, is not a simple achievement. The number of persons who avail themselves of the opportunity to participate in the election of their local councils, often bears witness to this fact. The sphere of local government has constantly expanded until now it not only engages in almost every conceivable social activity, but has become inextricably wedded to individual enterprise.

Less emphasis on the importance of property ownership, and extended franchise and a broader tax base are factors that must be seriously considered in the current operation of municipal affairs. The problem of preserving local autonomy, and at the same time raising revenue locally to finance local needs, permeates the whole fabric of municipal government.

Local self-government must be preserved to protect, nurture and further develop to maturity our inherent belief in political freedom and personal liberty. This fundamental philosophy can easily be overlooked in the scramble for efficiency and expediency if too little emphasis is placed on the means of accomplishing a specific result.

Recommendations for amendments in The Municipal Act are set forth in pages 12 to 54, inclusive, of the second interim report, pages 109 and 110 of the third report, and pages 126 and 140, both inclusive, of the fourth and final report.

The committee dealt with the whole of The Municipal Act, and I intend today to deal with only the following:

At present only those persons living in the municipality initiating the applications for amalgamation and annexation are entitled to vote on the matter, and the committee feels that no application for annexation or amalgamation should be permitted until the matter is referred to and voted on by the people in the municipality applying for the annexation or amalgamation, and also the people in the municipality that it is proposed be annexed or amalgamated.

Section 14 of The Municipal Act outlines the procedure for adjusting municipal boundaries, and the Ontario municipal board has the power to do so by making orders for annexations or amalgamations.

Application for annexation or amalgamation may be made by municipalities, by the Minister of Municipal Affairs and in certain cases by at least 25 inhabitants. The committee felt that the Minister of Municipal Affairs is responsible for the effective functioning of the municipal system. He cannot discharge that responsibility if significant matters, such as boundary readjustments, are placed in the hands of an independent board beyond his jurisdiction. It is his department that has day-to-day contact with the municipalities. His officers have intimate knowledge of local administration and should be in a position to advise him in such matters. The committee feels that the power of the Ontario municipal board with respect to making decisions regarding changes in municipal boundaries should be transferred to the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

The committee feels that section 34 of The Municipal Act should be amended to extend the right to sit on council to those persons 21 years of age or over who are Canadian citizens and have resided in the municipality for at least one year immediately preceding the date of the election.

Sections 35, 36 and 198a of The Municipal Act deal with the matter of conflict of interest and disqualification from holding public office. You can no more legislate private conscience than you can public morals, but it is possible to guide and direct persons in public office so that they do not become entangled in the net of self-interest. This is especially important today because of the size and complexity of government, which often obscures a possible conflict between public and private interest.

A person serving in a public office must not permit personal gain to come into conflict with public trust. He should at all times act in good faith and in an impartial and even-handed way. However, the standards must not be so stringent and exacting as to disqualify all but deities from holding public office. An earthly and realistic approach is necessary to attract persons of integrity, enterprise and ability.

At the present time a director, manager, treasurer, secretary-treasurer of a company may be disqualified from sitting on a municipal council.

Sections 35, 36 and 198a should be amended so as to emphasize disclosure, not disqualification. The restriction prohibiting a member of council from having pecuniary interest in a contract with a council should be lifted, provided full disclosure is made of his interest and he abstains from discussion of the matter and voting thereon.

It is recommended that any member of the council, commission or board as defined in The Department of Municipal Affairs Act who knowingly fails to disclose any personal interest, pecuniary or otherwise, in any proposed legislation, regulation or matter, and who does not absent himself from the room during consideration or discussion thereof, or voting thereon, automatically vacates his office and is disqualified from holding any public office for a period of two years therefrom.

Several briefs mentioned the large number of spoiled ballots by the use of a mark other than a cross, and the committee feels that any type of mark placed in an allowed position should constitute a legal marking of the ballot.

Sections 148, 149 and 150 of the Act dealt with vacancies occurring in councils. The procedure for filling the office is different in each section. It is felt there should be a uniform procedure when a vacancy occurs in the office of a member of council and that the council should be able to appoint any person qualified to be a member of a council.

The general principle that municipal councils and local boards should be open to the public is restricted by the exception of certain defined bodies. It is felt that all meetings of municipal councils and local boards should be open to the public except when a resolution in writing is passed declaring that the meeting should not be opened to the public.

It has been suggested that the functions of a board of control might be performed adequately by a committee of council. The establishment of a board of control should be left to the discretion of the council, and councils should be authorized to establish boards of control by bylaw passed by a majority of the members of the municipal council.

The committee feels that legislation should be enacted to enable a council to employ a manager to be known as the municipal administrator.

Section 241 of The Municipal Act deals with judicial inquiries in relation to municipal matters. Section 320 relates to judicial inquiries into financial matters. It is recommended that these sections be combined to provide for uniform procedure for the initiation of an inquiry. The inquiry should be initiated by the Minister of Municipal Affairs, either in his own right or by request of the municipal council or by five per cent of the voters entitled to vote at elections according to the last revised voters' list and/or resident voters' list.

Section 297 provides that the council of each municipality must include in the tax levy the funds required for school purposes and for various boards and commissions. In some instances the council had not jurisdiction over the budgets submitted, and acted only as a collection agency.

The committee believes that the council should be given the right to establish the priority of need for all the services to be provided by it. The committee feels that section 297 should be amended to provide that a local council may amend rates or otherwise alter, with the approval of the appropriate Minister, the estimates of any board, commission or other body for which the council is by law required to levy and rate.

The present law respecting the keeping of separate accounts and special accounts should be clarified to make it plain that not only separate accounts but also separate bank accounts be required.

Part XIX of The Municipal Act sets out the powers for councils to pass bylaws and they are included in sections 377 to 411, inclusive. These sections authorize municipal councils to pass bylaws for specified purposes without being set out in any logical order by subject matter or otherwise, and include the power to license, prohibit and regulate. Certain sections pertain to a certain class of municipality, others to a municipality in unorganized territory, and still others to a municipality having a specified population. The committee recommends that all municipalities be given similar powers under these sections and that the powers be segregated by subject matter.

Part XXII deals with police villages and the committee recommends that the formation and addition of territory to police villages be discontinued. As hon. members know, the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. Spooner) has introduced an amendment to this effect.

The committee recommends that the boundaries of polling divisions for municipal elections be the same as, or as near as possible to, the boundaries of polling divisions for provincial elections; that the present method of preparing the voters' list for provincial and municipal elections be replaced by a system of permanent registration of voters; that uniform election laws apply as near as possible to municipal and provincial elections; and that the co-operation of the federal authorities be solicited with a view to achieving a uniform basis at all three levels.

Sections 379, 395, 399 and 401 of The Municipal Act deal with the matter of limiting the number of public garages and automobile service stations where gasoline is stored or kept for sale; and limiting the number of cabs, buses, motor or other vehicles used for hire, or any class or classes thereof; and limiting the number of victualling houses, ordinaries, and houses where fruit, fish, oysters, clams or victuals are sold to be eaten therein; and limiting places for the lodging, reception, refreshment or entertainment of the public, and limiting the number of licences to be granted and the number of tables that shall be licensed for billiards, pool or bagatelle.

The committee feels that this type of legislation is susceptible to unfair and discriminatory operation and may serve merely to restrict competition in favour of existing business. There is no need to single out these four types of enterprise for the application of a principle of municipal prohibition and these sections should be amended rescinding this right.

Part XX of The Municipal Act deals with highways and bridges. Section 443 sets out the obligation of municipalities to maintain roads and bridges under their jurisdiction. The municipalities are liable for damages sustained by any person by reason of non-repair. Counties and townships must be notified within ten days of the claim for injury and urban municipalities within seven days. The committee feels that notice of the claim should be the same for all municipalities and would suggest ten days notice.

Where there is a dispute between the municipalities as to the liability to build or maintain a highway or bridge or as to the proportion of cost, the committee feels that this should be determined in the county court and tried by a county court judge instead of by a supreme court judge.

Sections 477, 478, 479, 480 and 481 generally deal with the sale and conveyance of an original road allowance which has been closed, and different procedures are therein set up. The committee feels that there should be a uniform procedure for the closing of all highways under municipal jurisdiction regardless of how they became highways and whether or not they had been laid out on a plan of subdivision, and that the bylaw should require approval of the Minister of Municipal Affairs who may refer the matter to the Ontario municipal board.

So much for The Municipal Act.

With regard to The Assessment Act, no local government can function without the necessary funds to carry out the legal obligations and the numerous social responsibilities incumbent upon it, if it is to govern in the best interest of the community as a whole. Representations made to the committee in regard to matters of assessment and taxation far outnumbered any other single subject. Legislation that picks the pocket is quickly felt.

The underlying and persistent fact, which penetrates the whole field of assessment and taxation, is that the number, kind and standard of services that the municipality is now called upon to provide are vastly different from those municipal services provided when the assessment legislation was rewritten in 1904.

The present business tax is an anachronism. The multiplicity of rates currently exists without logic, and the tax itself has no reference to services furnished. Further confusion and discrimination is caused by the necessity of setting two mill rates—one for commercial and industrial taxation and the other for farm and residential taxation.

There has been an increasing tendency to exempt the properties of certain institutions from municipal taxation because of their altruistic objects. Many charitable institutions throughout the province are operated by dedicated and public-spirited people possessing an intense feeling of civic responsibility and pride. It is the feeling of the committee that the local municipality can best judge the public contribution of these institutions, and accordingly the committee recommends that there be no general exemptions from taxation but rather that all future exemptions of properties used by these institutions be left to the discretion of the local council.

A great many of the inequitable assessments throughout the province of Ontario arise out of the reluctance of assessors to employ a current concept of actual value. The present Assessment Act appears to be abundantly plain in this regard, but nevertheless the evidence presented to the committee establishes the unalterable fact that the concept of actual value is seldom employed.

Inequities also appear because of a deficiency of properly trained assessors and assessment commissioners. Common sense and sound business practice may be scarce commodities, but no assessment manual can legislate or impart these qualities. Proper training facilities should be made available to every person who aspires to assess, and the committee feels that it is incumbent upon the province of Ontario not only to provide such facilities, but also to license those persons who become chief assessors in the same manner as municipal auditors are licensed.

Business assessment legislation was enacted in 1904 and has remained virtually unchanged.

The assessed value of the land and buildings occupied is not indicative of either the volume or productivity of the business and it is possible that a tax levied on this base may bear most heavily on those least able to pay. Examination of the assessment statistics in the 1961 annual report of municipal statistics compiled by The Department of Municipal Affairs shows business assessment as 11 per cent of total assessment. By class of municipality the percentages are: cities 12.8;

Metropolitan Toronto 12.6; towns 11.0; separated towns 9.3; villages 8.2, and townships 4.5. It will be noticed that the higher percentages apply to the more urbanized communities. However, the differences in the economies of municipalities of the same class show wide variations. Cities vary from 9.5 to 19.0 per cent, separated towns from 2.0 to 17.4 per cent and the municipalities in the Metropolitan Toronto area from 2.3 to 24.5 per cent.

The tax levied on the business assessment is calculated at the commercial rate. Therefore, the proportion of tax revenue derived from this source is somewhat greater than the proportion of the business assessment to total assessment.

The committee suggests: (a) abolition of business assessment; (b) calculation of business assessment at a uniform percentage of the realty assessment; (c) that businesses be divided into four categories and that the percentages applicable be 30, 50, 60 and 75; (d) that the businesses mentioned be arranged in some logical sequence, possibly alphabetical, with the applicable percentage stated.

The business assessment ranges from 25 to 150 per cent, the latter being assessed against distillery companies.

The committee found that 60.6 per cent of assessments were at less than 35 per cent, the largest number at 25 per cent. I point out that on page 59 of the second interim report we have shown a table for 1961, giving the number of assessments according to the basis of assessment.

The change in the economic status of certain businesses does not justify the present rates and this is particularly valid for the wholesale merchants.

The committee has recommended on page 61 of the second interim report:

- (a) Distillers at 75 per cent.
- (b) Wholesale merchants at 50 per cent.
- (c) Retail coal or fuel oil dealers at 25 per cent.
- (d) All land used for the parking of cars at 25 per cent.
- (e) That every person occupying or using land for the purpose of an apartment building containing more than six self-contained dwelling units shall be assessed for business purposes for a sum equal to 25 per cent of the assessed value of the land occupied or used for such apartment.

Now I would like to deal with the matter of the making of assessments. The committee feels that the making of a yearly assessment is not conducive to equalized assessment and that a longer period of time should be given, preferably three years.

The present right of appeal to the court of appeal on matters of law should be retained, and appeals should be permitted to the Supreme Court of Ontario in regard to questions of fact, as well as law.

Sections 84 to 88 inclusive of The Assessment Act deal with appeals to the Supreme Court of Ontario. These sections reveal the principle that a person is subject to taxation even though the tax is based on an illegal assessment, resulting from the limitation placed on the times for bringing on appeal. Therefore, there should be no limitation for an appeal from an illegal assessment or taxation.

On vacancy allowances, and so on, prior to 1900 a municipal council could authorize courts of revision to refund taxes to persons of poverty; or through sickness who could not pay.

A few years later the law was amended to give to councils the right by bylaw to authorize courts of revision to make rebates as provided in the bylaw. In 1944 this right given to councils was repealed. In 1945 uniform provisions for all municipalities imposed by regulations. In 1953 these regulations were amended and incorporated in the Act.

The abatement or refund of taxes only applies to certain types of property and these properties must be offered for rent. Representation was made that the abatement should also apply to properties erected for the purpose of sale, but vacant and unsold because of insufficient demand. It was also argued that vacancy allowances should apply to furnished premises used only for a portion of the year even though no effort was made to rent them.

On the other hand representations were made that the present vacancy provisions should not apply to apartment units.

The committee noted that while it is true that vacant property does not require school facilities, garbage collection and other municipal services, vacant property as a rule requires more police and fire protection than does occupied property.

Another matter brought to the attention of the committee was the injustice to owners of some types of property as a result of a change in use during the year of taxation due to the variance between the farm-residential mill rate and the commercial-industrial mill rate. The taxes for the following year on commercial property which is vacant on December 31 are levied at the residential mill rate. If the property becomes occupied during the year of taxation and business assessment applied against it under the provisions of section 53 the higher mill rate can be applied against both the real property and the business assessment for the balance of the year's taxes. However, no contrary provisions are in force where a property is used for commercial or industrial purposes and its use changes to residential during the taxation year.

The committee feels that no refund or abatement of taxes be permitted because of vacancy or partial vacancy of the premises and in the case of a pipeline no refund or abatement should be made because of its non-use.

That where the use of a property changes from commercial or industrial to residential during the taxation year, the residential mill rate be levied against the assessment for the balance of the year.

With regard to The Highway Improvement Act, the first six parts of the Act relate to highways under the control of The Department of Highways and the committee did not deal with these.

Part VII deals with county roads and their relationships with The Department of Highways and the powers of the county councils in connection with same.

Part VIII provides for the appointment of suburban roads commissions in respect to cities and separated towns. They designate suburban roads which continue to be county roads under the supervision of the county road superintendent. These commissions have existed for half a century. One important reason for their establishment and continuance is the payment of 25 per cent of their expenditures by the cities.

It is felt these commissions create friction between cities and counties, both because of this mandatory contribution by the cities and because the cities feel, with or without justification, that they have little effective say in their operation. If they are abolished, presumably, the county road grant would be adjusted. Abolition of suburban roads commissions would:

(a) Simplify the structure of local government by reducing the number of special purpose bodies.

(b) Simplify county highway administration resulting in better and more economical service.

(c) Remove a source of irritation between cities and counties.

Part IX relates to township roads and their relationship with The Department of Highways and cities and towns in provisional judicial districts.

Part X provides for payment of subsidies to certain cities, towns and villages.

Part XI deals with development of roads.

Part XII deals with roads in territories without municipal organization.

Part XIII contains general provisions such as powers of road superintendents, sidewalks on provincial highways, trees, set back for the planting of trees.

The committee feels that the provisions of The Highway Improvement Act pertaining to highways vested in a county or local municipality and under the jurisdiction and control of a municipal corporation be integrated with the appropriate provisions of The Municipal Act relating to highways.

That the provisions of The Highway Improvement Act vesting powers in a county or local municipality to pass bylaws in regard to various matters as therein set out be transferred to The Municipal Act.

On The Local Improvement Act it is difficult indeed to entirely divorce all of the statutes dealing with municipal matters so as to render them independent and complete in their own right. The fusion of the various statutes would be equally difficult and extremely illogical. However, the rearrangement of the subject matter of The Local Improvement Act, the adoption of the following recommendations and the consolidation of this Act with The Municipal Act, The Assessment Act and The Planning Act would prove to be of some practical value.

There are four methods for undertaking local improvement work: (a) on petition of the owners of lands affected; (b) on the initiative of council, without being petitioned; (c) by the municipal council on sanitary grounds; (d) by the municipal council without being petitioned—through private connections (4) and forced locals (8).

These are confusing and unnecessary but often ineffective. For example, property owners may petition council to construct a work as a local improvement but there is no onus on council to pass the necessary bylaw to undertake the work. The municipal council, however, can initiate the work, but a proper petition can prevent the council from passing the bylaw. Council may, nevertheless, undertake the work by obtaining the approval of the Ontario municipal board.

The committee feels that a single procedure for all local improvement works should be adopted and that the procedure be on the initiative of a majority vote of all the members of council after advertising its intention to do so and after serving notice, either personally or by ordinary mail, upon the property owners affected, provided that no such bylaws shall come into force and effect without the approval of the Ontario municipal board.

The committee feels that the following recommendations should be implemented:

That The Local Improvement Act be amended to permit the cancellation of an assessment against frontage which subsequently becomes flankage.

That cash contributions toward the cost of a local improvement work may be applied against an owner's share, or in any way that might be agreed upon between the contributor and the corporation.

That section 34 of The Local Improvement Act be amended to include watermains, and to provide that the abutting lands which receive no immediate benefit may subsequently be assessed in an area on a frontage basis, if at some future time they do benefit from these works.

That lands benefited by, but not abutting directly on the work, be assessed either on an area basis or a frontage basis.

That the local improvement procedure be permitted where a sewer or watermain has been constructed other than as a local improvement, but which work subsequently benefits abutting lands, and to provide that these lands may be assessed either on an area or a frontage basis.

The first planning Act was passed 1946 but it can be traced back to 1913.

Our heritage of freedom of activity, sanctity of property and a general predilection against government regulation and control has no doubt contributed to the citizen's suspicion of modern planning technique.

A rapidly increasing population, and the automobile, have forced the horizontal expansion of our communities with the resulting myriad of problems. Distance is now measured by minutes rather than miles in the physical movement of people. However, roads, sidewalks, sewers, watermains and the other public utilities cannot be constructed and financed in minutes. It is imperative that effective planning legislation be available to local municipalities to control and direct the development of their communities.

A planning board's function is to recommend to council—except in the matter of consents to divide a parcel of land—and it extends from official plans to zoning bylaws. The board must rely heavily on its professional staff. The boards do not have the close contact with the municipal inhabitants that the local council has. This is so in spite of the fact that The Planning Act provides that every planning board shall hold public meetings and publish information for the purpose of obtaining the participation and co-operation of the inhabitants of the planning area. Except for joint planning areas, there is little merit in creating a planning board as a distinct legal entity apart from the municipal corporation.

The committee feels that planning boards as now constituted should be dissolved and that the present function of these boards be exercised by the local municipal council, county council or a committee of either council.

The committee feels:

That the adoption of an official plan, its amendment and repeal should rest completely with the local or county council on the basis of a majority vote of all members of the council, subject to approval of the bylaw by the Ontario municipal board.

That before an official plan is adopted or amended, notice should be given to the people of the planning area by publishing a copy thereof in at least one newspaper having a general circulation in the planning area, each week for at least three weeks before the hearing, stating the day, time and place of the meeting at which the plan will be discussed.

That municipalities may, with the approval of the Ontario municipal board, buy, sell or lease land for the purpose of developing any feature of an official plan.

That municipalities may charge a fee on an application for an amendment to an official plan.

The committee feels that the establishment, alteration or dissolution of redevelopment areas by municipalities which have official plans be subject to the approval of the Ontario municipal board rather than the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

The committee also feels that the municipal clerk should not be required to lodge with the Minister of Municipal Affairs certified copies of a subdivision control bylaw, or a bylaw deeming plans of subdivision not registered, and that the consent of the Minister not be required for the alteration or dissolution of an area of subdivision control established by the municipal council.

Mr. Speaker, on page 90 of the second interim report, the committee made the following recommendations:

That the right of the Minister of Municipal Affairs to impose zoning restrictions be withdrawn.

That there shall be a public hearing before the council or a committee thereof after due notice to all persons affected by the proposed bylaw.

That the municipality or any person whose property is affected by a restricted area bylaw be given the right to make application to the Ontario municipal board to extend a temporary approval of such bylaw, and that notice of the application be given as directed by the Ontario municipal board.

That before a zoning bylaw is passed or amended, or before an application is made to the Ontario municipal board to extend the temporary approval of a zoning bylaw, a public hearing shall be held by the council after due notice to all the persons affected.

Local boards of health are administrative bodies charged with the duty of carrying out The Public Health Act. In practice, the duties are performed by the medical officer of health and his trained staff. The board does not appoint the medical officer of health; it is done by the council. The council has budgetary control.

The committee feels that The Public Health Act and regulations be amended so as to delete the reference to local boards of health and substitute the medical officer of health; that local boards of health be dissolved; that the provisions relating to the formation and operation of health units remain, but that the authority to constitute a board of health in a health unit or a separated local board in a separated health unit, be repealed.

There is an abundance of legislation in the province pertaining to parks and recreational facilities. This legislation may be found in numerous different statutes, and it is administered by almost as many different government departments. We have authority for parks under:

(a) The Municipal Act under The Department of Municipal Affairs.

(b) The Public Parks Act under The Department of Municipal Affairs.

(c) The Community Centres Act—Department of Agriculture.

(d) The Parks Assistance Act—Department of Lands and Forests.

(e) The Department of Education provides community programmes.

(f) The Department of Travel and Publicity makes grants for museums.

(g) The Public Health Act looks after the operation and supervision of swimming pools.

(h) The Athletics Control Act, under The Department of Labour.

On page 116 of the third report the committee recommends:

That The Public Parks Act, The Community Centres Act and The Parks Assistance Act be integrated with the appropriate provisions of The Municipal Act—section 377, para. 69.

That a parks and recreation branch be established under the direction of the Deputy Minister or a branch director of The Department of Municipal Affairs.

That all programmes and services afforded to municipalities by the various statutes in regard to parks and recreation be administered by a parks and recreation branch of The Department of Municipal Affairs.

A public utilities commission is authorized by the provisions of part III of The Public Utilities Act.

The function of a public utilities commission is the control and management of one or more utilities, which function is only administrative and is actually performed by its staff. The commission is a statutory agent of the municipal corporation that is responsible for the acts of the employees or servants of the public utilities commission. The municipal corporation provides the funds for the capital works. Agreements with the Ontario water resources commission and the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario are made with the local municipal councils.

It is the local municipal council that plans its municipality and through the machinery of the official plan and the zoning bylaws determines not only the nature of the development of the municipality but also the phasing or sequence of development. The capacity and location of public utilities are therefore determined by such matters as planned population densities, land use and other criteria under the jurisdiction of the local municipal council.

There appears to be no reason why the administration of a public utility should not be carried out by a department of the municipal corporation. Such a step would also eliminate the duplication of staff such as accounting personnel and vehicle maintenance and capital equipment connected therewith.

The committee feels that the functions of a public utilities commission can be performed by the local council or a committee thereof; that the powers given to local municipalities and restrictions imposed thereon by The Public Utilities Act be integrated where possible with the provisions of The Municipal Act relating to similar matters; that the powers given to companies owning or operating public utilities and the restrictions imposed thereon be transferred to The Municipal Act.

We have on the statute books The Trees Act which gives the councils of counties and local municipalities power to pass bylaws for acquiring lands for forestry purposes. The council of a township may enter into agreements with the owners of lands located in the township providing for, among other things, the reforestation of a portion of such lands. Provisions are also made to restrict the cutting of trees under certain circumstances and to penalize persons responsible for the injuring of trees.

The committee recommends that The Trees Act be repealed and its provisions incorporated in The Municipal Act under a new part, entitled "Trees"—I would refer to the recommendation on The Municipal Act, section 473.

With regard to committees of council, the committee gave considerable study to the distribution of the responsibilities in local government between municipal councils and the local boards, commissions and special purpose bodies. In addition to non-elected boards—such as planning boards, parking authorities, community centre boards, boards of park management, public library boards, boards of health—there are the elected school boards and public utility commissions; there are also intermunicipal bodies, such as suburban roads commissions, health units, conservation authorities and homes for the aged boards.

As the population of the province has increased and as communities have grown larger, local municipalities have become involved in an expanding range of functions. One result has been the creation of an increasing number of committees, boards, commissions and special purpose bodies. The whittling away of the responsibilities of elected councils, and the transfer of such responsibilities to those other bodies has had the effect of fragmenting authority and has resulted in a lessening of accountability to the electorate and a lack of co-ordination of the various activities.

The committee is convinced that overall responsibilities should be restored to the elected councils, but at the same time, it recognizes the necessity of delegating certain duties for purposes of practical administration. Although the use of committees by municipal councils is practised generally throughout the province—I refer the House to Appendix M—they are given recognition in The Municipal Act only with respect to the payment of their members. It is paradoxical that councils can create boards and commissions over which they have little or no control which have powers the councils cannot grant to their own committees over which they have complete control.

The committee is of the opinion that more of the municipality's business should be performed by council through the committees thereof. Councils should have authority to decide which of their powers should be delegated to their committees and under what conditions such powers should be exercised.

The committee recommends:

(1) That councils of all municipalities be given the authority to delegate to committees thereof, powers at least equal to those which can be exercised by boards of control and special purpose bodies.

(2) That the requirement for the establishment of boards of control in certain circumstances should no longer be mandatory.

I would like now, Mr. Speaker, to deal with non-elected local boards and commissions.

Municipal legislation provides for the establishment of a variety of non-elected local boards and commissions. Some a municipal council must appoint, as in the case of a local board of health if the municipality does not form part of a health unit; some a municipal council must provide for under certain circumstances, as in the case of a public library board; and with respect to still others the municipal council is free to decide whether or not they will be created.

The number of members appointed to the various boards vary. The council appoints all the members to some boards, but share the appointing with other bodies in the case of library boards and suburban roads commissions. The head of the municipality is a member of planning, parks, library and health boards but cannot sit on parking authority or suburban roads commissions.

There is also considerable variation in the term of office on these boards as we have set out on pages 156 and 157 of the fourth and final report. There is also wide variation in the qualifications required of persons appointed to these boards. In the case of planning boards and suburban roads commissions, no qualifications are specified; for parking authorities and community centre boards, under both The Municipal Act and The Community Centres Act, a member must be qualified to be elected a member of the municipal council. Members of library boards must be British subjects, at least 21 years of age and residents of the municipality. Members of local boards of health and of one type of parks boards are required to be resident ratepayers; while the members of an alternative type of parks board are required only to be residents or ratepayers.

It does not appear logical to have such a variation in the qualifications and the committee is of the opinion that the qualifications should be made uniform for members of all bodies; namely, that the appointee be qualified to be elected as a member of the municipal council. If these qualifications for membership are applicable to parking authorities and community centre boards they would appear to be equally applicable to members of planning boards and suburban roads commissions. On page 159 of the fourth and final report we have set out the council representation other than the head on the different boards and commissions.

It is understandable that over the years the process of piecemeal amending and changing legislation has resulted in anomalies and an illogical pattern which, when looked at as a whole, seems hard to justify. Why, for instance, should members of council be qualified as members of planning boards or health boards but for some unknown reason be disqualified to be a member of a parking authority? Perhaps, more absurd is the situation under The Public Parks Act which provides for two alternative methods of setting up a parks board. If one method is chosen not only may council members be members, but if the number of members is five or more then at least two must be council members.

In the case of the two bodies where the appointment of the members of a board is shared with other bodies, namely, library boards and suburban roads commissions, members of council, other than the head in the first instance, and all members of councils in the second, are disqualified.

If a council is to have an effective liaison with the various bodies in the municipal organization for which it has financial and other responsibilities surely the most effective way is through direct representation on these bodies. The fact that the existing provisions relating to these and other bodies from which council members are barred may have been of long standing is no reason why they should not be looked at carefully at this time to determine if there is merit in removing disqualifications.

There has always been some uncertainty as to whether or not an appointing council has a general power to recall an appointee and to appoint another in his place. This can be done in respect to the suburban roads commissions and maybe by the council in connection with the board of health.

It is recommended that municipal councils be authorized to replace their appointees to all non-elected boards except for educational and courts of revision.

The committee recommends:

(1) That the qualifications of every person to be a member of a non-elected local board or commission be the same as the qualifications of every person to be elected a member of the council of a local municipality.

(2) That members of council be permitted to sit on all non-elected local boards and commissions.

(3) That there be legislation permitting remuneration for all members of non-elected local boards and commissions.

(4) That there should be uniform legislation dealing with conflict of interests which should apply to all non-elected local boards and commissions.

(5) That the provisions of The Municipal Act, section 144, relating to a member of a municipal council vacating his seat, should apply uniformly to all non-elected local boards and commissions.

(6) That permission for prolonged absence from meetings emanate from the appointing authority rather than the board or commission of which the person is a member.

(7) That the authority which appoints members to a non-elected board or commission be given the power to recall its appointees and to fill all vacancies thereby created.

The activities of municipalities are determined not only by what powers are granted to them but also by the manner in which they may be exercised. Powers are often given in a manner which discourages experimentation and makes for cumbersome administrative and financial procedures.

At a time when municipalities are being expected to provide a broader range of services to adapt more quickly to changing conditions, this makes it more difficult to carry out their responsibilities.

It has become common in recent years to specify that certain powers may be exercised only with the approval of the Ontario municipal board, The Department of Municipal Affairs, or some other department or agency.

The committee believes that, while this procedure is essential in some cases and desirable in others, it should be reserved for matters of importance. It should not be used as a device whereby the judgment of a civil servant or a board is substituted for that of a body of duly elected representatives. If approval is required only in matters of importance, there is a greater probability that approvals will be neither given lightly nor arbitrarily withheld. As a result, a source of irritation between the two levels of government will be minimized.

In many cases municipalities employ officials who are at least as well qualified as the civil servants who must approve the decisions of municipal councils. The result is that a great deal of time is spent by provincial civil servants scrutinizing the work of their municipal counterparts, with a proliferation of paperwork on both sides. The effect is to diminish responsibility of the local governing body, and to introduce a further element of delay, uncertainty and inflexibility in what is often already a drawn-out and unpredictable process.

The committee recommends:

(1) That all legislation affecting municipalities be written in as general terms as possible, and that restrictions on, or detailed provisions relating to, the use of powers, should only be provided when:

(a) It is essential that there be uniform practice in all municipalities.

(b) It is obvious that there will be serious undesirable results for other municipalities or the province if powers are misused or abused.

(c) The powers could unjustly affect the rights of individuals if not used properly.

(d) There is a danger that the power of the electorate to control the council and officials would otherwise be impeded.

(e) The provincial government, through a specific grant, is paying a major share of the cost of an activity or project.

(2) That when approval of a provincial department or agency is required, the department or agency responsible should state clearly its policies and administrative practices for the information of both the municipalities and the individuals who may be affected, and where approval is not given the reason should be stated.

(3) That greater use be made of permissive, rather than mandatory legislation, so that municipalities will have greater freedom to work out procedures and arrangements appropriate to local circumstances.

An effective system of local government is essential if the need for services to local citizens and communities is to be met efficiently, at reasonable cost, and in accordance with local wishes. Moreover, government activities today are so complex that many of the programmes of the provincial and even the federal governments cannot be properly carried out without an effective system of local government. Many of the difficulties in carrying out such functions as slum clearance, urban renewal, town planning, pollution control and area development arise as much from the complexities and fragmentation of local government as from any other source.

The provincial government must assume a large measure of responsibility for maintaining an effective system of local government, both in the interest of furthering its own programmes and because only the Legislature has the legal power to change the system. The municipalities—because they are constitutionally subordinate, functioning under and within provincial statutes—have only a limited power to alter the structure and organization of local government.

The growing complexity of local government activities, the extent to which many functions affect or are affected by developments outside the local municipality, the need for more highly qualified staff, the increasing cost of many services and the difficulty of dealing with some problems on the basis of the smaller existing municipalities, all point toward the need for larger units of local government in some circumstances and for some purposes. More particularly, larger municipal units would:

- (a) Facilitate the provision of services that require large areas.
- (b) Facilitate agreement on common policies and the co-ordination of activities.
- (c) Eliminate the justification for some special-purpose bodies that have been created to deal with problems extending beyond the limited area of local municipalities.
- (d) Make it more feasible to employ more highly qualified staff and staff with specialized qualifications.
- (e) Provide a unit that is stronger financially.
- (f) Reduce competition for commercial and industrial assessment.
- (g) Enlarge the tax base, and thereby reduce inequalities in the burden of taxation.

The need for larger units of local government is most pressing in dealing with regional problems and boundary adjustments of urban municipalities. There are many small municipalities that can only be expected to supply a limited range of services to the standard being demanded today. In the long run, the alternatives to some consolidation would appear to be the transfer of responsibilities to larger units of local government or to the province.

Much has been said of regional government. More has been said of regional planning. One cannot function well without the other. While a great deal of lip service has been given to the regional concept, it is difficult to say with any degree of certainty, what is meant by "regional." This is understandable because what may be an ideal unit for one function may not be an ideal unit for another. Thus, while a watershed is a desirable unit for water conservation, pollution control and possibly water supply and sewage disposal, it may not be satisfactory as a unit for highway purposes or town planning. Geographical and topographical features, as well as economical factors, determine in part the physical limits of a community. The solution of regional problems is made more difficult because they are the concern of both the provincial and local governments.

Urbanization of the province has taken place at an extremely rapid rate. At the turn of the century the population was almost equally divided between urban and rural dwellers but now it is predominantly urban. The table shown in the report reveals that the proportion of urban dwellers increased from 52.6 per cent in 1911 to 77.3 per cent in 1961.

It can be seen from these figures that while in 1961 the rural population comprised 22.7 per cent of the total population, only 35.8 per cent of the rural population was a farm population. In other words, 91.9 per cent of the total population was "urban" or "rural non-farm" population.

As the population becomes urbanized, pressures are exerted for types and standards of services never before expected. Economic prosperity makes these demands realistic. Existing municipal boundaries make the fulfilment difficult. Larger units of government are sought through boundary expansion, resulting in annexation or amalgamation proceedings. The committee shows a table in its report that reveals that of a total of 32 cities in the province, 23 have had substantial adjustments in their boundaries from 1951 to 1963.

I would ask hon. members to check the table on page 172, which shows the percentage of acreage increase of the 23 cities mentioned. The increase is from 20.1 to 1,842.7 per cent.

Regions must be studied individually in terms of population, logical planning areas, watersheds, economic and social conditions and other relevant factors, to define suitable boundaries for larger units of local government.

As a practical start, the committee recommends adoption of the county, in whole or in part or with additions thereto, as the basic unit of regional government.

The committee gave a great deal of consideration to the inclusion of cities and separated towns as part of the regional unit. It was thought that they might create a strong nucleus and give added vitality to the whole. The larger area would also give greater scope to planning through the natural extension and co-ordination of existing facilities, and would eliminate the constant threat and fear of annexation or amalgamation.

The table shows that in the 23 counties affected—city of Toronto excluded—the assessed population of the municipalities excluded from the county unit as a percentage of the total assessed population of the county, varied from 17.7 to 80.8. Fourteen ranged from 40.4 to 68.8 per cent.

Cities and separated towns should be included in the larger unit of government and this would bring about an adjustment of provincial grants.

A basic principle of our democratic way of life is representation by population, which both the federal and provincial governments are applying in their redistribution. Representation on many of our county councils is inequitable, as shown in appendix O. For example, in one county comprising 15 municipalities, 37.5 per cent of the total population lives in one municipality, which has 44.7 per cent of the taxable assessment of the county but has only four of the 22 votes in the county council. In another county, a municipality with a population of 70,000 and 61.7 per cent of the total taxable assessment has four votes, while a municipality in the same county with a population of 645 people and 0.2 per cent of the total taxable assessment has one vote.

A member who is elected to a local council is primarily concerned with the activities and affairs of that council. He is sensitive to the wishes of the people who have elected him to that office and has them in mind when he becomes involved in the decision-making process. If at the same time, by virtue of his office, he is a member of another body, that other body is of secondary importance. There is an inherent conflict between the interest of the people he represents directly and the interest of the larger community that he represents indirectly.

Democracy in its best form emanates from the direct election of representatives at all levels of government. This method is adopted in elections at the federal, provincial and local municipal level. If the regional government is to adhere to this pattern, the regional councils should be elected directly by the people, as nearly as practical on the principle of representation by population. This should be accomplished by the use of a ward system. Ward boundaries should follow as nearly as possible the boundaries of constituent municipalities, although it will sometimes be necessary to combine or divide local municipalities to achieve equality of representation.

As the area of local government is enlarged and administration of community services becomes more complicated, members of the regional council should have a longer term of office to understand the complex municipal operation better, and they should be elected for at least three years.

The regional council should elect one of its members as its head who should hold office throughout his term.

The problem of assigning powers and duties to the regional government must be solved by a study of each individual area before any specific allocation could be made. Certain basic responsibilities would be assigned immediately to the regional councils, such as assessment, taxation, planning, arterial roads, public health, hospitals, welfare and policing.

Jurisdiction over storm and sanitary sewers, sewage disposal plants, garbage disposal, pollution control, regional-type parks and fire protection could be assumed by the regional council for all or part of the larger area.

Pages 177 to 184, inclusive, deal with all these responsibilities and recommendations are made for each case.

On page 184 of the fourth and final report, the hon. members for Yorkview (Mr. Young) and Downsview (Mr. Singer), members of this committee, have expressed their respective views on a particular feature of regional government, and I quote:

Mr. Fred M. Young feels that once a regional government is set up present municipalities or combinations thereof might become boroughs or wards of the region. While there might be certain flexibility in financial administration as far as the wards or boroughs are concerned, ultimate financial control should rest with the regional government.

Mr. Vernon M. Singer does not concur with recommendation 5, on page 185 which refers to the text on pages 174 and 175. He feels if a regional government is to include a number of local governments in its area of responsibility, each head of such local government must, in his opinion, by virtue of his office be a voting member of such regional government. To ignore the democratically elected head of a local government in the manner suggested in this report would create from the beginning such a source of irritation that the success of regional government could well be in question.

Now I would like to summarize our recommendations pertaining to regional government:

1. That larger units of local government, designated as "regional," be established with suitable boundaries having consideration to population, assessment, local planning areas, watersheds and economic and social conditions.
2. That as a practical start the county in whole or in part or with additions thereto, be adopted as the basic unit of regional government.
3. That cities and separated towns be included in the regional governments.
4. That the qualifications for election to the regional councils be the same as for election to municipal councils.
5. That the members of the regional councils be elected directly by the people on the basis of wards, which should be, as nearly as possible, equal in population.
6. That the term of office of the members of the regional councils be not less than three years.
7. That a regional council should elect one of its members as its head who should hold that office throughout his term.
8. That the regional council be given the powers of assessment, taxation, planning, arterial roads, public health, hospitals, welfare and policing.
9. That the regional council may assume any storm and sanitary trunk sewer, sewage treatment plant, trunk watermain, water purification plant, regional type parks and fire services and equipment for all or part of the larger area.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention continuing committee activity. The committee is impressed with the fact that municipal problems and the provincial-municipal relations in the province have been under more or less continuous study for many years. There was in recent years a provincial-municipal relations committee studying the problems suggested by its title, which in turn was succeeded by the municipal advisory committee. The select committee on The Municipal Act and related Acts does not feel that it has by any means covered the whole field of municipal law and local government due to its many complexities and ramifications.

The amount of local government activity is increasing rapidly, as can be seen by the increase in municipal tax levies, gross debenture debt and expenditure, shown in the table on the following page. As shown on page 187, hon. members will note that the tax levy of the municipalities has risen from $111,085 in 1941 to $774,938 in 1963, and the gross debenture debt outstanding for the same years has risen from $335,420 to $1,830,909.

The increase in municipal expenditures is due partly to increasing population and changes in the kinds and standards of services expected by the public. These factors have helped to increase the number of urban municipalities and special purpose bodies. They have brought about changes in the responsibilities of local government and changes in the administrative and financial procedures of local government.

It is difficult to obtain an overall picture of the present structure of local government in the province; how it got to be that way, in what direction it is evolving and what factors are forcing changes. Research on matters affecting local government should be intensified and it should not be done solely within government departments.

There should be a continuing study of the legislation affecting municipalities. It is not the kind of study suitable for the committee of the Legislature. Nor is it one that could usefully be assigned to The Department of Municipal Affairs. The department is expected to carry out policies of the government and not to call attention to their own possible shortcomings or the failure of the government to deal with problems. Neither is the Ontario municipal board a suitable body for such study because it is already involved with the municipalities in many aspects of local government and like the department it would be in the position of a judge in his own cause.

One solution might be the appointment of a committee of five or seven members who have practical and special knowledge of municipal affairs. The chairman and committee members should be appointed by the government. The staff of the committee should be attached to the Prime Minister's office and this committee should report directly to the Prime Minister and the Executive Council. Problems in the municipal field are constantly arising and if unattended to will reach a point where drastic action will have to be taken.

It would be better to meet the new problems as they arise and at the same time deal with those problems which, neglected and unnoticed, have accumulated over the years.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

THE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY ACT

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves, seconded by hon. J. N. Allan (Provincial Treasurer), that a select committee be appointed to consider Bill No. 80, An Act to amend The Legislative Assembly Act, and to report to the assembly as soon as may be convenient during the present session; the said committee to have full power and authority to call for such persons, papers and things as the said committee may deem necessary for its proceedings and deliberations; the committee to consist of seven members, as follows: Mr. Bales, chairman, and Messrs. Apps, Farquhar, Gisborn, Henderson, Rollins and Whicher.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, before that motion is put, may I have some clarification, on a point of order? Are we going to debate second reading of the bill before it goes to committee?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: This is the period when motions are accepted in the order of the business of the House.

Motion agreed to.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE WORKS ON HIGHWAYS ACT

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways) moves that Bill No. 66, An Act to amend The Public Service Works on Highways Act, now on the list of bills for consideration by the committee of the whole House, be referred to the standing committee on highways and tourism.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of bills.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I have a question addressed to the hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Wardrope), and it is as follows:

As related in the press, could the hon. Minister enlighten the House how it was that the editor of the Northern Miner got "the very definite impression" that the hon. Minister considered Windfall assays—

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Sopha: —very important last July?

Mr. Speaker: Order! This does not seem to be the question that the member gave notice of to the Speaker's office.

Mr. Sopha: On the contrary, sir, in essence it is exactly the same—

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the member to state the question as submitted to me before 12 o'clock.

Mr. Sopha: With the greatest respect, sir, you will find that the question I submitted will be in essence the same one that I just read.

Mr. Speaker: The member is supposed to state the question that he submitted to me before the hour of 12 o'clock.

Mr. Sopha: I did not draw it; it is not very intelligibly drawn.

How did the editor of the Northern Miner get the very—no, the word "very" is not there—the "definite impression" that the hon. Minister considered Windfall assays very important last July?

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): Mr. Speaker, I got notice of the question from the hon. member for Sudbury. My answer is as follows:

In keeping with my responsibilities as Minister of Mines, I have never spoken to anyone for publication, nor have I ever had any specific particulars to furnish about Windfall drilling results. At the time of our discussion, when Mr. Brown called me on the telephone, to my knowledge no assay had been made, and I so informed him. Any conclusions drawn by Mr. Brown were his own.

His article was apparently written when the speculative fever, against which warnings were issued, was reaching its height and rumours by the hundreds were multiplying overnight. Newspapers and mining publications contained many articles on this speculative mining project. It is reasonable to assume, therefore, that contacts he made with a number of people were, no doubt, the reason for the opinions expressed in the article, for which, in the final analysis, the author must accept the responsibility himself.

Mr. Sopha: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker?

Hon. Mr. Wardrope: If the hon. member gives me supplementary notice of it, I will reply. Mr. Speaker, I would prefer it that way.

Mr. Sopha: Well, that is an interesting rejoinder. I want to know if the hon. Minister contributed to the rumour? Did he contribute to the rumour?

An hon. member: Becoming like the others —arrogant.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Highways, notice of which has been submitted to him.

Will The Department of Highways act on the coroner's jury report that found that buffer guide rails on the median strip of the Macdonald-Cartier Freeway could have prevented a fatal accident?

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the question of the hon. member is as follows:

The Department of Highways will consider the recommendations of the coroner's jury when the inquest report is received from the office of the supervising coroner for Ontario. It must be realized, however, that the amount of construction now taking place on the Macdonald-Cartier Freeway in the Toronto area makes it impractical and impossible to erect a buffer guide rail while this construction is taking place. As sections of the highway are completed, a special type of steel-beam guide rail is being erected in narrow medians.

In locations similar to the location where the fatal accident occurred on December 17, 1964, where the median is wide, we do not find it feasible to erect a guide rail, in view of the fact that most motorists tend to gain control of their vehicles in the event they enter the median. If a barrier were erected in a wide median, practically all cars out of control and entering into the median would crash into the barrier before drivers would have had the opportunity to regain control, thereby increasing the frequency and, in most cases, the seriousness of the accidents, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Newman: Thank you.

Mr. S. Farquhar (Algoma-Manitoulin): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I have a question I should like to direct to the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett), notice of which he has received, and which is as follows:

On what information did the general manager of the Ontario water resources commission base his statement yesterday that detergent foam is not harmful to water supplies?

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Mr. Speaker, the presence of detergent foam on rivers and streams in the province has caused much criticism lately. The commission, for some time has analyzed what it considers to be critical streams throughout the province for the level of detergent, and the results of these analyses indicates that the concentration of detergents is below the limit that is toxic to fish, aquatic or other forms of life.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond). I notice that he stepped out of the House a few moments ago and does not seem to have returned as yet, but I will read the question and he can answer it on another occasion.

When is it expected that the transfer of Sunnybrook hospital from The Department of Veterans' Affairs to the University of Toronto, will be effective?

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

THE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY ACT

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister) moves second reading of Bill No. 80, An Act to amend The Legislative Assembly Act.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): I would like to speak briefly on the second reading of Bill No. 80. I want to say at the outset that the New Democratic Party supports the principle of an increase in the indemnity. There are differences of views on this issue within our ranks and we have always taken the view that on a basic matter on which there is a difference of views there is a right to express that difference of view in this House and it will be expressed. We also have reservations with regard to the procedure that has been adopted in arriving at the size of the increase and I want to reiterate today a recommendation that we have put before this House at an earlier stage on behalf of our group but which this government has not seen fit to consider at least in this instance.

Now, Mr. Speaker, during the last week of the election campaign in 1963, when I was addressing a ratepayers' meeting in my own constituency, my constituents had come out in full force from all parties and among their numbers was a good Conservative who asked me in the question period at the end of the meeting, "What is your stand on the increase in the indemnity?"

I stated then, Mr. Speaker, that in our view in the New Democratic Party the job of a member of this Legislature was increasingly becoming a full-time job, but that what was most needed at Queen's Park was an opportunity to be able to fulfil the duties on a full-time basis. I reiterated what I have said for quite some time regarding the necessity for longer sessions. I mentioned the need for greater facilities to be able to do the job, whether it be on the government side or on the Opposition side of the House, and I said that when and if all of these things are done I felt that a member of the Legislature was entitled to get an income commensurate with what he would get in other phases of life in our country—in industry, for example.

Now, I want to report to the House that in my view many of these items, which we have been insisting were of higher priority than an increase in the indemnity, have now been met, at least in part; sometimes in whole. I just want to detail this, Mr. Speaker.

We have been insisting for quite some time that if the legislative arm of government, was going to fulfil its role in a day and age when the executive arm of government was becoming more and more powerful, then adequate facilities, indeed adequate accommodation, had to be made available for the Opposition members particularly—and I have no objection to saying this to the government members—for them to be able to fulfil their job in an efficient businesslike manner.

I want to say that I think that this government has moved, and here I will say without qualification, ahead of any other province in this country on this issue. I doubt whether it is further ahead than the situation in Ottawa—there is some dispute as to whether or not Opposition parties have adequate research staff, I do not know at what level it is now being provided and whether or not Opposition parties are happy—but I will say that this government has moved to provide the accommodation and the facilities for doing the job, and particularly for research, in a fashion on which I for one am willing to congratulate them.

No doubt in the future, as time goes on, we are going to change our thinking and say that more should be done. One of the interesting commentaries on government in the British parliamentary tradition is the fact that even in the 20th century, when government has become big business, the tendency has been to regard membership in Parliament as being almost like the contribution made by nurses—it is done for public welfare and in the public good, but not to be done on a businesslike basis.

I remember the first time I had the opportunity, for example, of viewing how that mother of parliaments operated, that I was astounded to find members of the House, in some instances men who were distinguished members of the House, sitting in the window-well while dictating letters to secretaries who then went out to some place unknown to type these letters. Now, this kind of situation is a hangover from days gone by that, in my view, is utterly ludicrous. Only now in most of these governments of western countries are we beginning to recognize that government is big business, it is the people's business, and it should be run efficiently, and the members should have adequate office space and they should have the normal requirements for carrying on a business in an office. And as far as we are concerned this is the degree of progress that has been made for which we want to acknowledge our appreciation.

I draw this to your attention, Mr. Speaker, by contrast. The members of the select committee on consumer credit, with whom I journeyed to the United States to investigate this topic a few months ago, were very impressed with getting this up-to-date picture: that in the United States every elected member of Congress, whether it be the House of Representatives or the Senate, is immediately provided with a minimum of $70,000 and up to $200,000 for his own personal staff.

Indeed, I turned on the TV one morning while I was shaving and listened to one of these morning programmes interviewing young Tunney who had just been elected to the House of Representatives in California, and they were asking him how he liked fitting into the Washington scene, and he said he was enjoying it, except it was rather difficult. He said, "Immediately I have to hire a staff of nine."

Now, I am not going to argue that this is what we should have in Canada at the federal level or at the provincial level, but I would just point out, for example, that here in the province of Ontario the amount of money being provided to Opposition parties is about the equivalent of the minimum provided to one Congressman in Washington. So while I am appreciative of the progress made I think this is only a step in the right direction, and a step that should have been taken a long, long time ago if we are going to handle the people's business efficiently.

There is a second item that we have been specifying for years and that is the necessity of this House meeting for an adequate length of time. The hon. Prime Minister said at one point last year that I was interested in long sessions for long sessions' sake. I have said to him before and I repeat now that I think he was in error. I am not interested in long sessions just for the sake of sitting here. But I think the kind of attention that is being given to the business of the House this year—indeed the kind of attention that was not given last year and which created difficulties for nobody more than the government—suggested that we should be sitting for a longer period. I have used the term, a minimum of four months—that is a 16-week period—and I think it is now obvious in the present session that we are going to reach that and I would suggest to anybody who examines it, that the work load of this House is so developing that this is going to become a regular pattern.

Now on these two scores, I would say that the higher priority items that must be considered ahead of, or at least along with, an increase in the indemnity have been considered and have been met.

There is a third item which is not a factual item, therefore it is a matter of judgment and presumably there will be argument in every session as long as this Legislature meets. That is with regard to how the business of this House is handled. We have made many comments before in this connection. I was very interested yesterday to see that the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett) introduced a bill that had an explanatory note on the front of it and the date on the bottom of the explanatory note was December 21—if I recall correctly—1964. In other words, this bill has been ready since December 21, and I have a suspicion that many bills have been ready, and why they were not introduced in the House I do not know. Why so much of the work load is held until the latter part of the session, when you get into the major estimates, I do not know. Now I am not going to detail this any further. My colleague, the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. S. Lewis) did it last week. Interestingly enough, there seems to be some change in the approach in terms of getting more business before the House.

I reiterate this one other point however; I have some difficulty in figuring why the government is so reluctant to consider the proposition of a specified hour, once or twice a week, for private members' bills and resolutions. I am convinced, the more I view and sense the atmosphere in this House, that if there was an opportunity of this kind for presentation of bills, not only by members of the Opposition but by members on the government side of the House, that there would be an added incentive to give thought to new projects, to present them and to lead in public discussion of them. Indeed to do the kind of thing—if I may take one example—that Frank McGee did on the bill with regard to capital punishment in Ottawa. He played a very major role in bringing this issue perhaps to a final conclusion in this country. I think this is the kind of thing that can and should be done, and I am puzzled as to why the government is so reluctant.

I can understand the government's general reluctance to copy Ottawa, because I think what has happened in Ottawa in recent years has brought parliamentary institutions into greater disrepute in this country than any other sequence of events for quite some time. But on this particular item, I suggest to the hon. Prime Minister it is worthy of emulation.

Now while supporting the proposition of an increase in principle, Mr. Speaker, I want to conclude by moving an amendment. I am suggesting that this House should give consideration to the proposition that the decision as to the level of the indemnity should not be a decision of those of us who are going to benefit from it. We have presented our views on this. I think I am correct in stating that this is a new idea that has not been tried in any other Legislature or Parliament of which I am aware. For precisely the same reason that, generally speaking, governments across this western world are now moving to have redistribution considered by independent committees—and I trust considered adequately when they are—for the very same reason, I think this issue, which is essentially a political issue. It involves us personally, and therefore we have some conflict of interest. I think it is highly appropriate that it should be referred to some independent body. Indeed, I suggest to the House that it is invidious that we should be deciding the level of our income which we are going to take out of the public Treasury.

This could be done very quickly, this is not a lengthy procedure. I made this proposal privately to the hon. Prime Minister some three weeks or more ago. I am convinced it could have been done in the interval, it would take no more than a week or ten days. It was made publicly in the House, but I want to put it on record again because I suggest that, if not now at some time in the future, this is the procedure that should be adopted for deciding on what the level of indemnity will be.

I agree with the hon. Prime Minister that in the final analysis we have to take responsibility because we have to pass the bill; just as in the final analysis we are going to have to take the responsibility on redistribution because the bill will have to go through and have the support of this House. But that does not mean that you cannot have an independent assessment of it. I think it would be in our interests, and for our good, that this should be done, as well as for the public interest in light of the growing tendency for rather a cynical attitude towards those in public life.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Freeman) that the motion be amended by striking out all the words after "that" and substituting the following:

In the opinion of this House the question of the indemnity and expense allowances of members should be referred for study and recommendation to an independent committee consisting of representatives of agriculture, labour, industry, under the chairmanship of a Justice of the Supreme Court of Ontario.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that this amendment is out of order on second reading and any amendment that is to be made in the bill would have to be made in the committee stage.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, speaking to the point of order, I would point out to you, sir, and to the hon. Prime Minister, that this does not make any amendment in the bill. This is an amendment that I think is quite well covered by May's description of a reasoned amendment; it is not directed to any specific provision, it is directed to the principle of the bill.

I do not happen to have May with me because I did not anticipate that a point of order would be raised, but if anyone takes the trouble to consult May I think he will find that under the heading of "Reasoned amendments" May indicates that one type that is in order is the type that asks for further study of a matter by committees or commissions, and so on. This is exactly what this amendment asks for. It proposes that the House get further information before making a decision on the principle of the bill. That is entirely in order under the heading of "Reasoned amendments" and I submit, sir, that it should be so ruled.

Mr. Speaker: I am of the opinion that the amendment is out of order on the grounds that there has already been a motion placed before the House that this bill be brought before a select committee of the House, which has already been named. In view of the fact the bill is to be presented to this committee for further study I am of the opinion that it is not necessary to have it referred to another committee as suggested in the amendment.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, this is a rather interesting piece of reasoning in that I rose when the Prime Minister's motion was put with regard to the setting of a select committee and said; "Does this preclude second reading? Is it going to this committee before second reading?" The hon. Prime Minister assured me that second reading would come in the normal course of events. Therefore, I would suggest to you we can do as May has traditionally laid out in the normal course of events, on second reading.

Mr. Speaker: This is my ruling at the present time, and should I wish to reverse it after looking at May, I shall make a further ruling on the matter.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, may I ask then if the vote on the matter will be deferred until such time as you have finally made your ruling?

Mr. Speaker: Yes.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, may the debate now continue on this matter or would you rather have everything deferred until—

Mr. Speaker: I think perhaps it would be in order for the member to continue if he has some remarks to make on second reading of the bill.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that when the hon. Prime Minister moved second reading of this bill he might have seen fit to give some explanation of what seems to me to be the headlong speed with which it is now being moved through the House. It was introduced—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I must say that I consulted with the hon. leader of this hon. member's party in connection with the procedure to be followed with this bill and if there was any suggestion that it was being hurried through the House, that suggestion could have been made to me and it would have been delayed. I really do object to this approach.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, I would point out to you and to the hon. Prime Minister that the bill was introduced for first reading yesterday. It comes up for second reading today. It has been rare in my experience—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the member must remember that we are on the second reading of this bill and I would hope that he would confine his remarks to the principle of the bill, as to whether this increase should be made or whether it should not, and not to delve into matters of procedure.

I think perhaps he should stick to the principle of the bill in whatever remarks he has to make.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, this strikes me as an unusually narrow interpretation of what is permitted in discussion of the principle of a bill. Surely the manner in which it moves through the House relates to the principle of it and is a matter that is suitable for comment. Whether or not the hon. Prime Minister or anybody else in this House agrees with my comments is not the matter at issue.

I suggest to you, sir, that surely it is appropriate for me to note that this bill is moving ahead with much greater speed than most bills in this House. In fact it has been unusual for bills to be printed and distributed immediately after receiving first reading. This has happened in this case. It is therefore quite in order, I concede, to move ahead today if the government so desires, but I had hoped that there might be some explanation of the urgency. However, I will not pursue that point any further, Mr. Speaker. I would like to turn to another aspect of the matter.

I think, sir, that in considering the principle of the bill it is appropriate to put the question of indemnities into its proper setting. We will all recall that in the summer of 1963 the Parliament of Canada passed legislation increasing indemnities and allowances of that body. I do not consider it proper or necessary for me to comment on the decision Parliament made. It is well known, however, that the decision caused a great deal of public concern and objection and it became a factor in the Ontario general election campaign of 1963, which followed almost immediately after.

I can certainly say for myself, that when I was campaigning and trying to persuade people to vote for me I ran into this question of the increase for the federal members, and more particularly the size of the increase, more than any other issue I have ever encountered in all my experience. When speaking to people at their doorsteps, as I do frequently, I have never had an issue raised so often as that one.

It became an issue in the campaign. We could not in any way be held accountable for what the federal Parliament might have seen fit to do but the question was raised, I suppose not unnaturally, as to whether or not we in this House, assuming we were re-elected—or those of us who might be re-elected along with members elected for the first time—would upon our election put through an increase in pay. This matter I imagine was put to a great many politicians.

As my hon. leader has already indicated, it was put to him at a rather critical time in the campaign. He indicated the answer he gave. It was also, I judge, put to the hon. Prime Minister during the course of the campaign. He made a statement about it that was widely reported in the press: I asked the clipping service to get me a press copy of the statement attributed to him.

It is rather interesting that when you ask for a specific item from our very efficient clipping service, they usually give you a whole page of clippings, many of them not particularly related. In giving me the particular one, I was interested in the service followed the same procedure and I found right next to it a rather interesting item which I think provides a background for the item to which I am particularly interested in referring. This preliminary item appeared in the Toronto Telegram for August 30, 1963, under the headline: "Robarts Kissing and Missing." The concluding portion of the story stated:

A retired school teacher welcomed the Premier with a remark that he had worked for him when the London lawyer was Minister of Education.

"When did you retire?" asked the Premier.

"In 1954," came the reply.

"Well, you did not work for me," retorted Premier Robarts, "I was not in the Cabinet then."

Aides winced. "He is just not a politician," one complained, "he is too darned honest."

Mr. Speaker, against that background of suggested excessive honesty on the part of the hon. Prime Minister I would like now to refer to the item in which I am primarily interested. It also appeared in the Toronto Telegram the next day, on August 31, 1963, and the headline on this occasion was "No raises for MPPs in Ontario." This story was datelined Barrie, and was indicated as a staff story. The first two paragraphs read as follows:

Premier Robarts has no intention of letting MPPs vote themselves a pay increase if his Conservative government is returned to power September 25. "I have no plans at all to increase members' salaries after the election," he told newsmen last night, "nor have I made any commitments."

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: Various and sundry hon. members are asking me what is wrong with that. I have not suggested that there is anything wrong with it at all.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: I do not read things just because I think there is something wrong with them. There was quite a lot I liked about that item when I read it at the time. I thought it was a fair and honest statement by the hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. R. M. Whicher (Bruce): What date was that?

Mr. Bryden: That was August 31, 1963. The hon. member for Bruce will recall that all of us were engaged in an effort to persuade the electors that we were worthy of election to this House, and some electors at any rate were raising the question as to whether or not we would, upon our election, vote ourselves an increase in pay. In answer, I presume to a question by a newsman or someone, the hon. Prime Minister made a statement which was reported as I have just read in the Toronto Telegram and was reported in similar vein by most of the newspapers of the province.

The hon. leader of the New Democratic Party has already indicated the way in which he answered the same question. I may say his answer also was featured in the press, and perhaps from the political point of view it was not as expedient an answer, because it indicated that under certain circumstances he considered an increase in the indemnity would be appropriate. He did not say: "I have no plans" or "I do not believe that an increase is in order." He said that he thought that if certain other conditions were met an increase might be in order.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Would you read my comments again, please? I have not got that particular clipping; I just want to hear what I am reported as having said.

Mr. Bryden: Yes. Well, the first paragraph I read is not attributed as a statement to you, but the second one is and I will read only that part:

I have no plans at all to increase members' salaries after the election—nor have I made any commitments.

Now then, Mr. Speaker, I do not care to get into any semantic argument as to the meaning of those words.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: You just misquoted me three minutes ago, that is why I asked you to read it again.

Mr. Bryden: When did I misquote you?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I will check it in Hansard.

Mr. Bryden: At any rate the statement was on the record. I had already put it on the record so that there could not be any possibility that anyone would misunderstand what I was attributing to you. I am not going to get into a semantic argument as to the precise legal meaning of the words. I am going to suggest, however, that the public of Ontario took those words to mean—and I believe quite legitimately took them to mean—that there was not going to be any increase in the indemnity as far as the hon. Prime Minister was concerned until a long time after the election.

I will say right now that I do not think a person is held forever to a statement he makes. Circumstances change in time, and after a lapse of time it may be that a commitment or statement could be reconsidered. However, I think that the people of Ontario believed and were entitled to believe that there was to be no action for a long period of time, certainly for a couple of years, anyway, on the question of indemnity. I will come back to that in a moment but I think it is at least fair to say that much, whether one reads any more into the Prime Minister's statement or not.

I think also, Mr. Speaker, that it should be borne in mind that when the members now sitting in this House were running for election in August and September of 1963 none of them were dragooned into running. They all knew, or certainly were in a position to find out if they did not know, what the indemnity and allowances for elected members of this House were. That is a matter of a public statute, the information is available to everybody. So all of us knew, I knew, and I submit every other member of this House knew, what the pay and conditions of this job were at the time of the election.

I will say for myself that nobody forced the job, if you can call it that, of MPP upon me. On the contrary, I actively solicited support. I asked people to make me an MPP, I appealed to them to send me down here so I could serve under the pay and conditions set forth in the statute with which I was fully familiar; and I believe that all other hon. members did the same thing. I do not think any of them were forced by the electors to come down here at the time of the last election.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): We still have hopes though.

Mr. Bryden: One hon. member says that they still have hopes. I presume that some of them thought that the statement made by the hon. Prime Minister, which I have referred to, was made with tongue in cheek. I do not believe it was; I certainly thought at the time he meant what he said, and I must say that I had thought so right up until quite recently. However, I am in some doubt now.

The hon. Prime Minister, in describing the bill yesterday on first reading, made reference to the fact that in his opinion some highly qualified people may be discouraged from running for this House by the amount of indemnity and allowance that is now provided for in The Legislative Assembly Act. I do not know where that leaves those of us who are here. Certainly, we were not discouraged. I do not know that a higher indemnity will encourage a higher quality of candidate to run, but at any rate those of us who are here now, whatever our qualifications may be, apparently were satisfied with what was proposed—or I think that was the impression we gave to the electorate.

As I said at the beginning, I do not see what is the great rush about this matter. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that although I certainly have never suggested that the indemnity should be increased, I know there are a great many hon. members—in fact, I would say an overwhelming majority of them—who have a different view. I will concede this much to them, that I think arguments can be made in favour of the principle of an increased indemnity and expense allowance for members of this House. I would say that some pretty strong arguments can be made in favour of that principle starting as of right now, or approximately a year and a half since the last election. I can see arguments in favour of it. I am not even going to try to dispute the arguments; I think that fairly strong arguments can be made.

But I have very grave doubts, Mr. Speaker, whether legitimate arguments can be made to support the amount of the increase proposed in Bill No. 80. The increase in the indemnity proposed in that bill is 60 per cent. The increase in the expense allowance is 50 per cent for members in Metropolitan Toronto, and 100 per cent for members outside that area. I do not know whether there is any possibility that secession moves might be started to have certain constituencies secede from Metro Toronto, if and when this bill should go through. But at any rate, whether the member is in Metro Toronto or outside Metro Toronto, the bill proposes that he should get what I would consider to be an extremely large increase in both his indemnity and his expense allowance. I think with regard to most members, that if we let the facts be known, the expense allowance to a very considerable degree is merely an income-tax-free supplement to the indemnity.

However, I am not going to make a big argument as to the appropriate amount of any increase that might be considered, Mr. Speaker. I have indicated my doubts about it, but I do not think it is necessary or appropriate for us to debate that particular point here, because I believe that the proper way to deal with the matter is along the lines that my hon. leader has already suggested.

I put forward a statement on his behalf when he happened to be unable to be here two or three weeks ago, suggesting the manner in which it should be handled. Our hon. leader has now moved an amendment to the motion for second reading, which would give this House an opportunity to vote on that principle. I hope that you may in your wisdom, Mr. Speaker, see fit to rule it in order, because I believe that it is in order. But whatever your ruling may be when the time comes, I would suggest to the hon. Prime Minister and other hon. members of the House that this is the proper way to deal with the matter—both the question as to whether or not an increase is justified at all, and the question as to how much it should be if it is justified.

After all, we in this House are in quite an unusual position when it comes to the delicate question of remuneration for our services. There are very few people in this country who are able to determine unilaterally what their remuneration should be. We, as matters have been up to now, are in that position, and until now that is the only way we have been able to devise to determine this question. But the people who are going to get the increase, obviously have an interest in the amount of the increase. They may look at it as dispassionately as possible; they may be honestly convinced that a particular figure is appropriate.

That may be, but they are still in a most unusual position. It is not usually considered good practice for people to make a decision from which they alone will be the beneficiaries, or indeed from which they will benefit in any way.

So what is wrong with the proposition of seeking the advice of an independent committee, whose members will not in any way benefit from any change that may be made in The Legislative Assembly Act? It could include representatives of the major producing groups in the province—one of each from farmers, labour and industry, say, with a judge of the supreme court as chairman. Let them review the whole question; and let them give us their advice as to whether or not they think a change in the amount of indemnity is justified in all the circumstances, and if so, what amount of increase is justified.

That surely is a reasonable and sensible way of handling this type of question. It gets us out of the position where we are simply making the decision by ourselves, and a very invidious type of decision I think it is to have to make. It may be that the committee would decide that under all the circumstances no increase is justified, and I would say that if it made such a recommendation to us we should accept it. On the other hand, it may suggest that an increase of the full amount proposed by Bill No. 80 is in order, and in that case we would accept that; or it may suggest that some smaller amount is in order. I think we should refer this to an outside body and accept its recommendation. I do not think the committee should have any power to make a final decision in the matter, but we can accept its recommendation, whatever it may be, and to act upon it, in our responsibility as legislators.

I think that only if procedures of this kind are developed with regard to the indemnification of members, will the public feel genuinely satisfied that any increase that may be granted is fair and reasonable. There is far too much cynicism with regard to parliamentary institutions among the people of this country at the present time. I am not saying it is particularly the fault of this House or of any body, I am merely reporting it as a fact. I am alarmed at the cynical attitude that many people take toward their elected representatives. Heaven knows, none of us is an angel, but I think most of us are honestly trying to do a job. Yet there is a considerable degree of cynicism with regard to elected members and one attitude that one frequently hears expressed is, "Oh, well, just leave those fellows alone and they will look after their end." That is exactly the impression we are going to create here if we proceed with this bill through this House without any outside advice—that now we are safely removed from an election we are looking after our end and making sure that we get a nice melon for ourselves.

I think it is unfortunate to contribute to that impression. I think the impression could be eliminated almost entirely if the procedure proposed by my hon. leader in the amendment which he has put before the House, sir, and on which you are reserving judgment at the moment, were followed. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand why other—

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question. I was wondering whether he was speaking personally now or whether he was speaking on behalf of his party.

Mr. Bryden: Well, Mr. Speaker, when I speak, I speak always for myself, but I do not think there is any conflict between what I have said and statements that have been made on behalf of my party. One statement that I had the privilege of making myself, on behalf of the leader of the party and the party, was that this matter should be referred to an independent body of exactly the type described in the amendment proposed by my hon. leader. I think what I am saying is quite in line with any statements my party has made, but as always I am speaking for myself. I take responsibility for anything I say and I do not hold anyone else responsible in any way.

Now, then, Mr. Speaker, although there seems to be a little restlessness among certain hon. members of this House and I would take it a certain degree of disapproval of what I have said, I was under the impression that I had been stating my opinion in about as mild a way as possible. I even conceded to my colleagues that in my opinion there are good arguments in favour of an increase, and I stated what I think is the reasonable proposition that some independent body should be asked to advise us as to what might be an appropriate increase. I think those are reasonable propositions and were stated, I think, very mildly. I now want to go on, Mr. Speaker, to say that one feature of the package that is put before us is, in my opinion, totally objectionable. I am not prepared to make any compromise on it at all and I am now speaking for myself. I am not saying I am not speaking for others, but I am certainly speaking for myself.

Under this bill, if it passes in the form in which it is now before the House, the quite large increase in indemnity and in expense allowance will not become effective when the bill passes or at approximately that time. One could say, at least in my opinion, a reasonable time would be for it to come into effect on April 1, 1965—the beginning of a new fiscal year. But no, it will not come into effect at that time at all. That is not the proposition that is put before us. It will, if this package is accepted, be deemed to have been in effect as of April 1, 1964; one year less one day ago.

Mr. Speaker, I think that is a thoroughly objectionable proposition and I think it is one that will greatly contribute to such public cynicism as may exist with regard to legislative assemblies and the members thereof. If the government and other members had felt that the pay increase contemplated in this bill ought to have come into effect a year ago, I submit they ought to have brought the legislation in a year ago and to have let it then be considered by the House and by the people. But of course a year ago was only about six months after the last election, so it was rather a ticklish issue then. We had a statement from the hon. Prime Minister that—and I quote him as he was quoted in the Telegram:

I have no plans at all to increase members' salaries after the election.

No plans at all. Well, I will think that the public could be persuaded that if he develops plans a couple of years after that time, these would not be affected by the statement he made. But only six months after he said, "I have no plans at all," I think it would have looked rather peculiar to the public that he had suddenly developed plans. It would have looked to the public, and it would have looked to me if it had been done at that time, that the pledge stood, or the statement stood—it was not really a pledge—the statement stood only until after election day. That is the way it would have looked and I would think it regrettable that the people of the province should develop the attitude that any statement by the Prime Minister of this province or any other responsible spokesman for any party in this province would be subject to revision so quickly, so soon after the embarrassing situation had passed away. But that is the way it would have looked if it had been brought in at this time last year, about six months after the election.

So nothing was brought in last year. There were some rumours in the press, I do not know if there was anything in them, that there were rumblings among some of the back benchers for a pay increase. I do not know if such things took place at all. I certainly participated in no conversations of any kind relating to a pay increase. But nothing was done. There was no proposal put to the people or to us that the pay should be increased. So now, a year later, we accomplish the same thing, if this bill is passed, as if we had passed the legislation a year ago. But we take the action, we make the overt move, a year and a half after the election and two years or so before the next election. In other words, we give people time to forget about the statement that the hon. Prime Minister made during the election campaign and then we go ahead and do what he said would not be done.

Mr. Speaker, I simply cannot accept that principle under any circumstances. I object strenuously to this feature. I would believe that if we did adopt a procedure of referring this matter to an independent committee, no committee would recommend what amounts to retroactivity for a full year. Trade unions always try to get retroactivity in their union contracts when there has been a long delay in negotiations, and this is reasonable when one is negotiating a contract. If the negotiations are protracted and delayed it is obviously desirable to try to get any benefits that may be provided made retroactive to the time when the negotiations ought to have terminated. But this is not the situation we are in here. There have not been any negotiations, at least none that have been open and above board and out where everybody can see them, there have no doubt been discussions as to what the government should do, but there have been no negotiations.

We unilaterally decide that we are going to raid the public Treasury for an increase for an entire fiscal year that has now passed. None of us starved to death during that year, we are still alive, we are still carrying on, there is no reason to believe that we need the increase for a year that has now passed and we have now got through. This, in my opinion, is nothing but a raid on the public Treasury by people who ought to be the watchdogs of the public Treasury. I, personally—speaking for myself—will not participate in it. I want nothing to do with it.

One of the newspapers said today that “the members of the Legislature”—note the tone of cynicism that is already creeping into public comments—“The members of the Legislature are providing themselves with a $3,000 Easter egg.”

This is a sheer windfall. We certainly did not anticipate it when we embarked upon this year and I may say the newspaper concerned understated the case. It is not a $3,000 Easter egg, it is a $4,000 Easter egg for members in Metro Toronto and a $5,000 Easter egg for all others. I am sure that there are many people in the province who would like to receive such Easter eggs, but I do not think there are any in the position where they can get them out of the public Treasury.

In past years, Mr. Speaker, we have had a relatively small group of superannuated teachers and widows of teachers appear before us proposing that something should be done to assist them, and I may say that their need is very much greater than ours. I think their income as far as pensions is concerned is something like $600 a year.

They have made proposals which were estimated a few years ago as costing in the first year $1 million, and declining amounts thereafter since these ladies are elderly and a few of them die off every year with no new ones joining their ranks. I will give credit to the private members of the House, I think they invariably agreed with the proposals from these ladies, and the proposal they made to assist them in their dire need, calculated a few years ago, would have cost $1 million, in the first year, and declining amounts thereafter.

This Easter egg that is proposed by Bill No. 80, by my calculations will cost approximately $500,000. I would suggest to the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) that if for the current fiscal year terminating tomorrow he has $500,000 he did not anticipate spending but he feels he can spend notwithstanding, then perhaps it would be better if he gave it to those elderly or retired teachers and widows who served this province so well in the past and who are now being treated so shabbily. I would certainly be happy to see anything proposed for me from this melon go to them.

It seems to me that there is no excuse at all for any member of this House to accept this completely unanticipated windfall, whatever justification there may be with respect to the rest of the bill, and as I have said, my views on the parts of the bill are not strong. I think there are arguments in favour of the general principle of the bill, but I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, the specific feature I have just mentioned makes a mockery of the statement that the hon. Prime Minister made during the election campaign and which I have already read to the House; it makes a mockery of it. I for one would not like to see the hon. Prime Minister placed in that position.

As he knows, and as everybody knows, I do not usually support him. But I think we should consider the office and public respect for the office. I would say that I do not like to see the office made into a mockery, and that is what is happening by this proposal for a pay increase, retroactive for a solid year.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): It is not retroactive.

Mr. Bryden: The hon. member for Sudbury now wishes to get into a legal tussle with me. I do not think it is necessary to bother with that, Mr. Speaker, I will leave any reasonable person to decide what it amounts to. We are to get an additional amount, 60 per cent extra on our indemnity and 50 to 100 per cent extra on the allowance. We are to get it on the last day of the session and we are now discussing it in principle on the second last day of the session. I do not know when it is going to be paid to the members, but we are now at the end of the fiscal year. Is that not for all practical purposes, the same thing as what we refer to when we talk of retroactivity?

I do not believe there has ever been anybody in the world who has been so fortunate as to get a 60 per cent pay increase made retroactive for a solid year. If there are any people that fortunate, I would like to know who they are. None of them are in my constituency, I can tell you. I do not think that we by virtue of our capacity to vote public moneys in this House should put ourselves in such a favoured position.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in concluding my remarks I would like to appeal again to hon.

members to follow the procedure proposed in my hon. leader's proposed amendment, whether or not it is in order.

What is wrong with it? If hon. members plan to vote against it, I would like to hear them explain why they are voting against it. What is wrong with it in principle? It does not remove from us the ultimate responsibility of passing on this matter. All it does is to refer it to an independent body for advice, for recommendation. Now that surely is a practice that is frequently followed and is particularly applicable in this case; so why not?

If hon. members are not willing to accept this proposition, I suggest to them they should get up and say why they do not think it is acceptable. Are they afraid that the independent body would decide that the amount of the increase proposed in this bill is not appropriate? If they are afraid of that, then I would submit that is all the more reason why the thing should go to a committee. Let us have somebody make an independent assessment and report their views to this House for such action as we may subsequently wish to take.

In particular, Mr. Speaker, and this is the point on which I really object to the principle of this bill, I am unalterably opposed to the attempt to make the increase effective for the whole of a year that is now in its second-last day. I cannot see how that principle can be justified at all. If there are any hon. members who think it can be justified, I would suggest that they should get up and state their views to the House.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence (Russell): Mr. Speaker, I was not planning to speak but I would like to make a few remarks in reply to the hon. member for Woodbine.

The first thing that occurs to me is this, I think the only thing that would satisfy him would be if he were paid by the word.

The second point, Mr. Speaker, that comes to my mind, and it has been made before, is that as I see it in essence we are not being remunerated here for services rendered, rather we are being indemnified, as I understand it, for loss of income to ourselves. It would seem to me that when we come to the question of whether this should be turned over to a committee of experts or not a fine distinction, but a very important one, I suggest, between remuneration and indemnity might be borne in mind.

It seems to me that there is no group of men, 108 or less or more, who are as sufficiently aware of what we are losing individually as we, comprising as it were a committee of ourselves. We know what it costs us to be here. I doubt if there is any group of experts that could be put together that would know more intimately what we are losing by being here than we do ourselves.

Now, sir, beyond that there is another thing that concerns me slightly about this committee approach, and I am going to be brief, and it is this. If we have a committee taking over the question of what our indemnity is to be and if we are necessarily to have a much longer session, there seems to me something akin to a civil service atmosphere gradually encroaching upon what I think ultimately are the liberties of the members of this House. We are not civil servants.

There are a group in the House who comprise the government and are members of commissions. There are a group in the House who by virtue of their talents carry the load for the Opposition parties. But there is also another group in this House which is entirely different, a group of which I am a member. I would call this, if I might, the jurymen of this House, who are not civil service workers for dollars and cents on a daily or annual basis. We are essentially, as I say, in my opinion akin to jurymen who sit and listen to the wisdom or otherwise of those in Opposition in leadership and those in our own party in leadership. Therefore I would suggest that the civil service approach, the salary approach, is not the proper one that should be tagged upon us.

The other is the indemnity approach, and it is a practical one.

I can honestly say the only comments I have had from constituents of mine are as to the ridiculously low figure that the indemnity consists of.

Finally, sir, I should like to speak on the question of the retroactive effect. If I am right on the first point—and there is nothing original in it—that this is, and should be kept in mind as being an indemnity for loss, then I see nothing wrong at all in indemnifying us for the loss which began to run when we picked ourselves up from our businesses and our homes in January, 1964. We started to need indemnity, if indemnity is needed at all, to replace lost income as of January, 1964. On that basis, I think it logical and not improper to have a retroactive effect built into the Act.

Beyond that, and in closing, sir, I hope I speak for other members in this House when I say that phrases such as "raid on the public Treasury," and "splitting up a melon," lie very ill with some of us. I can simply say that, as one elected representative, I resent them, sir.

Mr. N. Davison (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on this bill. First may I say I support the decision of my hon. leader, that I feel that this should go to an outside committee. I do not feel that we should be the people who raise their own salaries. I do feel that this should go to a committee and I hope that the people on the other side would send it there.

But I would like to take a look at some of the things that have gone on even since I have been a member. I was elected in 1959. When I came here in 1959, the first year that I was in the House, the then Prime Minister put a raise through—and that would be in 1960. I did not hear anybody, not a soul in this House, oppose it at that time.

If hon. members want to call it retroactive—I do not call it retroactive—but if they want to call it retroactive, I think everybody in this House accepted retroactivity at that time.

As a trade unionist, it is something I have always fought for in negotiations. I think it is something that is needed. I mean, if we need the raise, and no matter how much the raise is, do we need it for tomorrow and not for yesterday?

I feel that as far as the members of this House are concerned, they have been underpaid for quite some time. I feel that opportunity should be here for anybody in Ontario to run for a seat in this Legislature, and I do not feel, Mr. Speaker, that they should have to go out and take another job to be able to do that. I have a feeling that this is pretty well a full-time job, and I am quite happy to see it.

Again I am not saying that I am satisfied or dissatisfied with the amount, but I am quite happy to see that there is a raise going for the members. The only thing that I do object to is that I do not think we should be putting that raise through ourselves. I think it should go to a separate committee.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we in this House have to make decisions, and I believe strongly that one of the decisions that we have to make is in connection with this legislation, because in the final analysis we are the people who are going to have to decide what the pay increase or otherwise will be. We can come up with approaches and suggest that we will pass it over to independent commissions, or to do other things, but it comes down to us having to decide ourselves what it will be in the final analysis. The people who are going to decide whether we made the right decision, are the electorate, and they will decide.

I believe very strongly, sir, that the role of the person in this House today has increased. Those of us who have been here for six years or for 40 years, all recognize the enormous complexity of government that is developing. This requires time and energy on the part of the members, increasingly so. It requires knowledge by the members, so that from our side we can present penetrating and incisive suggestions and questions to the government in order that the business of the House will be examined fully and accurately for the public.

One of our concerns on this side was: would we get the tools by which we could do the best job that we can for the people of Ontario as an Opposition? I want to say, sir, that we have discussed both the indemnity increase and also the need for research staff with the hon. Prime Minister on a number of occasions. We have told him, from our point of view, that before we would accept an indemnity increase, we would want to have the tools of research so that we could play a more efficient part in this Legislature. The hon. Prime Minister agreed to this, and I would say, sir, that I want to congratulate the hon. Prime Minister, because I think he has taken a forward step in connection with the recognition of the Opposition role, which is away ahead of any other provincial government across Canada.

We now have the tools to provide research. We now have increasing complexity of government, and therefore an increasing time that the members have to take for the affairs of government. Some people may suggest that we are here for only a certain length of time, but let me assert again that all of us know if we are doing the job that we are sent here to do, and if we are doing it properly, it is becoming more and more a full-time job for us. Because of that I think we should be looking at the need for an increase in the indemnity.

But I think paramount to all of us on this side, and I am sure to every member of this Legislature, is that fact that this should be a democratic House and any citizen should have the opportunity to be here—despite any financial position that he has, if he has ideas and he has a capacity to be represented in this House. I suggest that today there are young men with families who would think very seriously about coming here. They do not want to make a lot of money, but they want the privilege of not having to make such personal sacrifices that it would be onerous on their families if they became a member.

We want to get representation from every segment of society in this House. Therefore, I think that it is valid that we should be looking at an increase in the indemnity.

There is one hon. member who considers that an increase in the indemnity is an Easter egg or a watermelon. I know that he is a man of principle and I appreciate that he has stated that he will not take the increase—and that is his privilege—but as far as I am concerned, I believe that this is a full-time and an honourable job and I think the people of Ontario expect that we should get a reasonable compensation, and expect that we re-examine the amount of compensation periodically, and they expect us to be man and woman enough in this House to recognize that it is our responsibility in the final analysis, and they want us to have the courage to make the decision with respect to whether we will raise the indemnity or not and not shilly-shally around trying to pass the buck to others.

It is because of this reason that after having consultation with the hon. Prime Minister of this province, and the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party, and after talking with my caucus, that I say that we support this in principle and we feel that this is a proper move at this time.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to support the amendment put forward by the hon. leader of our party, hoping that if you rule that the amendment is in order, hon. members of the House will give it consideration and also support it.

In regard to the need for an increase in the indemnity, I have always felt, sir, that a member of the Legislature should be able to represent his riding in a manner that would make sure that all of his constituents got the most prompt attention, and that problems of the province in general got the most prompt attention, without the interference of the necessity to supplement one's income.

In studying the amount of money in the bill I personally think that it is a reasonable amount to allow one to do this. Of course people live in a manner commensurate with what income they have and I would be the last to start to talk about what that ratio would be. There are hon. members of this House who are professional men and legal men that are high in the esteem of their office and I have some knowledge of the income that is necessary to carry out their responsibilities. So one lives based on his income, I think in all sense.

Certainly I have felt in my term in the House that there have been times when I have had to give less attention to the problems of my constituents because of the need to supplement my income. I would hope that all hon. members of this House would realize that when one is accustomed to a basic income in an industry that there is very little to give and take on. Certainly I have looked at this situation. I have looked at the amount specified in the bill and I think it is reasonable.

If the motion of our hon. leader to send this to an impartial committee is defeated then I will in turn support the bill, as has been specified by our leader. Certainly in regard to the term "retroactivity," as long as I have been in the Legislature there have been, I think, three increases—or perhaps it was two. This will be the third, and they have been passed in the same fashion.

I have not had time to do research in regard to how hon. members have been paid since we have had a Legislature in this country. To the best of my knowledge it has been done in this fashion since we have had a legislative assembly and it has been the responsibility of the members to deal with a bill brought in by the government. Nevertheless I think there is always room for change in any kind of a system, and because there has been a great deal of cynicism arising out of increase in the members' pay, both in the provincial Houses and in the federal House, it is appropriate that we give attention to trying out some new system. I think that the proposition put forward by our hon. leader that it go to an impartial committee would, once and for all, take out of the hands of members the political implications of members dealing with it themselves.

One might say in a sense that it will not do that because regardless, I would think, whether we send it out to an impartial committee, what we could then base our actions on would be their opinions. We would still have to vote on a bill in this House to bring the decision to a conclusion. Certainly there are cynical people in my riding, but I also have a lot of close colleagues with whom I have discussed this problem and the reason for an increase and they have agreed with my own feelings to this point on it.

Mr. Speaker: Before leaving the chair, I should like to inform the House that I have had an opportunity to look at May's Parliamentary Practice, 17th edition, during the debate, and I will, if the debate is continued after 8 o'clock, on second reading, give my ruling then on this point.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Grey South): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair, is this not an unusual procedure for a debate to have continued for an hour or two, awaiting on the Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I am of the opinion that some members still want to speak in this debate.

Mr. Oliver: As I understand it, there is an amendment moved by the hon. member for York South, and that the decision of that amendment, as to its relativity, as to its soundness, is held in abeyance by the Speaker of the House. Now surely we cannot proceed with the debate on an amendment when the Speaker has not ruled if that amendment is in order or not.

Mr. Speaker: I permitted the debate to continue at the time on the main motion together with the amendment. If it is the wish of the House, and no other member wishes to debate the bill, I am prepared to give my ruling at this time.

Mr. A. W. Downer (Dufferin-Simcoe): But Mr. Speaker, no one adjourned the debate, so the debate is over.

Mr. Speaker: I promised to give a ruling and I would like to follow that procedure at this time. I find in the 17th edition of May, on page 526, chapter 21, with regard to proceedings and passing of public bills, the following on reasoned amendments. I quote:

It is also competent for a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move what is known as a reasoned amendment. This amendment is to leave out all the words of the main question after the word "that" and to add other words; and the question proposed upon the amendment is, that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question.

Then May enumerates three subsections which such an amendment may fall into, and I shall only read the third subsection which is applicable to this proposed amendment. I quote:

(3) It may seek further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence.

Therefore, on the basis of this information, I rule the amendment in order.

I shall now put the amendment, moved by Mr. MacDonald, seconded by Mr. Freeman—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I understood that you were to leave the chair. I wanted to say a few words before the vote was put.

You have now given your ruling. I am a little confused as to whether the debate that has taken place has taken place on the main motion or on the amendment.

Mr. Bryden: It is the same thing—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: It is not the same thing from the point of view as to how many more speakers there may be. That is you can speak once to the motion for second reading and you can, of course, speak to the amendment. Perhaps the Whips could sort out between them how many people want to speak on either side of the House.

Mr. Speaker: I shall read the amendment at this time and anyone who wishes to speak to the amendment may then do so. I will then have put the amendment before the House.

Moved by Mr. MacDonald, seconded by Mr. Freeman, that the motion be amended by striking out all the words after "that," and substituting the following:

In the opinion of this House the question of the indemnity and expense allowances of members should be referred for study and recommendation to an independent committee consisting of representatives of agriculture, labour and industry under the chairmanship of a justice of the Supreme Court of Ontario.

It being 6 of the clock I do now leave the chair and will resume at 8 p.m.

It being 6 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, MARCH 30, 1965

The House resumed at 8 o'clock, p.m.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to the amendment to the motion for second reading of this bill, I have no intention of repeating the position I put before the House yesterday on its first reading. I would like to answer perhaps some of the allegations that have been made and some of the imputations as to my motives and my reasons for doing what I have done.

Prior to the election of 1963, in August, I said at that time that I had no plans at all to increase members' salaries after the election, and I had no such plans. It had never been discussed. I made clear to the public that I had no commitments—in other words, it had not been discussed with any of the men who were allowing their names to stand for election.

I can only say that the hon. member for Woodbine (Mr. Bryden) does more to bring this House into disrepute with his imputation as to motive on behalf of every hon. member in this House. And I will leave it at that.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: In speaking to the amendment to the motion, I would simply say that, as I said yesterday, we must accept responsibility for the decisions that we must make. There are many areas in which we have to make decisions in this House. In my view it is right and proper that we accept opinions and have the benefit of opinions from outsiders, but I for one refuse to attempt to move the responsibility for a decision such as this to someone else. We have within our own group here in the Legislature, and I am speaking about all hon. members, a method by which these matters can be examined in detail, and I have already moved a motion to establish a select committee of this House to examine this bill and its particulars. I think the hon. members who have been appointed to that committee will discharge their responsibilities in that regard, and I will be satisfied with what decisions they may make when they examine this bill and its particulars. Therefore I would ask all hon. members of this House to vote against the amendment to the motion for second reading of this bill.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment, will please say "aye." All those opposed, will please say "nay."

In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

Call in the members.

Clerk of the House: Mr. Speaker, the "ayes" are 8, the "nays," 81.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. All those in favour of the main motion—

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order! If the member has a point of order he may speak.

Mr. Bryden: Yes, sir. I think there is no question that the rules provide—that when an amendment on second reading is defeated, the motion is automatically carried. This is well established in May, but I will refer you to perhaps a more immediate authority—the rules of this House, rule No. 56, as published in Lewis's Parliamentary Procedure in Ontario which I will read, if I may, sir.

If on an amendment to the question that a bill be now read a second time or the third time, it is decided that the word "now" or any words proposed to be left out, stand part of the question, Mr. Speaker shall forthwith declare the bill to be read a second time or the third time as the case may be.

The motion, Mr. Speaker, was that Bill No. 80 be now read a second time. The proposed amendment was that all of those words, the word "now" and all the other words be struck out and certain words be substituted. That amendment has now regretfully been defeated. That means that the word "now" and the other words stand as part of the question and the motion. I merely say this is the procedure—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Bryden: —followed in this House. It has regularly been the procedure. It is not only in accordance with the rules, but it has regularly been that the procedure followed has been that when Mr. Speaker declares that an amendment on second reading has been lost, the second reading is automatically declared adopted.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the member's comments on procedure, I know he is an authority on the rules, but I think perhaps the motion submitted by Mr. MacDonald did not mention that the bill be not now read a second time.

Mr. Bryden: It struck out all the words.

Mr. Speaker: I shall read the motion. Moved by Mr. MacDonald, seconded by Mr. Freeman, that the motion be amended—

Mr. Bryden: By striking out!

Mr. Speaker: By striking out all the words after that and not that it "not be now read a second time."

My contention is that the amendment did not move that the bill be "not now read a second time."

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Order order!

The amendment did not move that the bill be not now read a second time but only that the words be struck out and others substituted. The defeat of the amendment merely decided that the original words stand part of the question, and therefore the question must be still put to a vote. I therefore call for all those that are in favour of the main motion to please say "aye."

All those opposed please say "nay."

In my opinion the "ayes" have it.

Call in the members.

Clerk of the House: Mr. Speaker, the "ayes" are 90, the "nays", 1.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

Clerk of the House: The seventy-ninth order, House in committee of supply; Mr. W. E. Sandercock in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

On vote 903:

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey North): Mr. Chairman, following up the questions to the hon. Minister (Mr. Rowntree) I must confess to the House that it is a good job the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) came in when he did last night because I think I was out on a limb.

On this vote 903, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister how many conciliation officers employed by the department have training in economics and industrial relations.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Before you get to that question I would like to answer the one that was put to me last night. Let me say I will answer it as I understood the question to have been put.

I think the question was: Since you took over, meaning as Minister of Labour, how many times have conciliation services been granted until now. I am glad that the question was asked because it is many more times than I thought. It is 3,111 times from November 1, 1962, to February 28, 1965.

The breakdown in periods of time is as follows: November 1 to December 31, 1962, 245; 1963, that is the entire year, 1,229; 1964, the entire year, 1,364; and for the period January 1 to February 28, 1965, 263; for a total of 3,111.

Mr. Sargent: How many of these reconciliation officers, Mr. Minister, are university graduates?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Quite frankly, I did not know that the activities of the department had extended themselves into the field of reconciliation. Ordinarily, that is a domestic matter. There are a good number of people throughout the province who think The Department of Labour includes a lot of things it does not.

Mr. Sargent: I will rephrase the question.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: As to the qualifications of conciliation officers—

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Do not be so smart; do they not reconcile two parties?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: They are not known as that.

Mr. Troy: It does not matter what they are known as.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: They are known as conciliation officers.

Mr. Troy: A rose by any other name would smell as sweet.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Oh, cool off now, my friend.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Where were you for dinner tonight?

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, on a point of privilege.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, to go on with respect to this—

Mr. Troy: On a point of privilege.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The qualifications of conciliation officers have to do with those qualities of personal characteristics affecting their ability to bring people—

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, for the benefit of the hon. Minister, and all the members of this House, you do not have to take the saliva test on me after dinner.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I accept his word for it.

The selection of persons to be conciliation officers in this branch involves a consideration of certain attributes, and probably dedication of the individual toward this phase of our economy. There are many people who would be successful in an administrative job, and there are many who would do well in engineering, but it is in the area of qualities required of a man to be able to be patient and bring parties together and assist the department in establishing an atmosphere wherein conciliation efforts can be effective, and where the points of view of either side can be advanced with a view to securing the greatest consideration by the opposite party, that persons would be selected according to their qualifications for the type of thing I have mentioned.

I do not think there is any training in any school or college that would establish this type of personal characteristics. I think the person either possesses these qualities or he does not. On the other hand, if a person does qualify, and we have to learn by experience, it is true that his capacities and his abilities may be developed in themselves.

In the last year, I determined that we should take a look at the specialist training in some fields covered by our conciliation officers. One man was selected who was interested and seemed most eligible for this extra training and we sent him to take a course in systems and new production techniques, having to do with computers and data processing equipment and so on. It is a little early to evaluate how worthwhile this extra training is, but my own observation is that it is worthwhile, and I think that in the immediate days ahead the branch will be offering extra training in some of these fields to acquaint the members of the conciliation branch with certain techniques and special situations applying to certain industries.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, realizing the growing importance of conciliation and reconciliation in the industrial relations field, I would like to ask the hon. Minister whether the estimates on the salary of personnel include increased incentives to university-educated employees of the conciliation services? Are there incentives?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes, the university-trained people can qualify for higher starting amounts.

Mr. Sargent: Do the estimates in this vote include any grants to enable conciliation officers to obtain necessary higher education.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: We have an item in our estimates of some $5,000, which is available for the upgrading or uptraining of personnel in the entire department. I think that the additional knowledge that we are talking about in the conciliation field could be acquired at minimal expense.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Chairman, when we adjourned the last sitting in which we were dealing with the labour estimates, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Walker) raised the question of the conciliation procedure, based on some experience he had in the Oshawa area involving the united automobile workers union. The hon. Minister answered, endorsing the conciliation procedure, and he used as an example the negotiations last year of Stelco and the steel workers union. He implied, and he might be right to a point, that the conciliation board in the final analysis was responsible for the bringing about of a collective agreement without a strike.

I had said in my opening remarks that I felt that the conciliation board stage should be made voluntary, where both parties would agree that they would entertain the conciliation board stage to try to resolve their differences, and I am convinced that this is the proper procedure.

Though we all agree that the board we had in the Stelco dispute comprised experienced and able men in the field of conciliation, and though the committee itself may have agreed with the chairman that his time should have been extended and he should have made further efforts to bring about an agreement without a strike, I should say that once a committee is established and it is in the conciliation board stage, the question as to whether or not it continues in conciliation is not entirely in the committee's hands. The committee in a sense is trapped in the conciliation board, unless the chairman himself makes up his mind that he should let go and cut the committee free to wait for his board's report and then take its economic action seven days after it gets the report.

I say this because I have had the experience of working with negotiating committees for about 15 or 16 years. We spent almost seven months on that set of negotiations. There were ten men on the union committee and they were out almost full time. As the hon. Minister knows, we were locked up, in a sense, in the Royal Connaught hotel in Hamilton for some four weeks and then brought to Toronto and kept locked up in hotel rooms in the Royal York for another period of almost four weeks.

I say "the committee is trapped," Mr. Chairman, because to really understand what transpires in a set of serious negotiations, you actually have to go through that set of negotiations from start to finish. You have to know what kind of strategy your committee is going to use to wheedle out of the company the best kind of an agreement. You have to try to analyze what kind of strategy the company is going to use to get away with the best type of agreement that it can get away with.

What you have to realize in a set of serious negotiations with a plant the size of Stelco—some 11,000 employees—but the union are dealing with people and the company are dealing with money. The delay and frustration is harder on the union committee than it is on the company. The hon. Minister infers that the committee often have as much to do with the delay of settling the dispute and the extension of conciliation board procedures, that the committee agree wholeheartedly with the extension, but this is not the case. What you have to realize is that the committee chairman—if they have the type of chairman that we had, Mr. Dickie—is well experienced, very capable and knows his work.

When he has a problem in his teeth the chairman does everything he can to resolve that situation, for more than one reason. He has a dedication for doing the job of a conciliator and, of course, he wants to maintain his prestige as a top flight conciliator in this province.

Either side takes a chance with their strategy if they try to impress upon the board chairman that they no longer want his services. The board chairman can make it fairly uncomfortable for one side or the other by accepting the opinion that he no longer can be of any use, or by stating the situation to the press and, of course, he can report to the Minister that one side or the other has broken off. When the union breaks off, public opinion turns against them; and if the company breaks off, public opinion turns against them.

Very often headlines in the paper read that this side or that side has terminated negotiations. This puts you in an untenable position and makes it look as though you no longer want to continue to bargain when all you have in sight is a strike situation.

I do not think that it would hurt the situation where if a union and management felt that a conciliation board stage could be of help they could apply and go through the process of a board. But I do not think that where both sides do not agree that the conciliation board should be forced upon them.

It is common knowledge that the UAW in many instances has aborted the conciliation board stage and having had just one meeting have been able to convince the chairman that their services could be of no more help. They have set their deadline and away they go.

As I mentioned before, in large organizations such as Stelco, the UAW, and in the electrical and rubber industries, I think that they could be better served if they had their choice as to whether or not they want to go to a conciliation board stage. I do not think that they should be hamstrung. It has been our experience, and I think it is the experience of the UAW that they have found that once they get to the board stage management will delay as long as possible. Very seldom do we find in the large industries that they do not go right to the deadline. When we are convinced that the deadline must be reached, at one stage or the other, then it should be as soon as possible after the conciliation officer stage. Then they have to get down to business and make up their minds.

A large amount of money was spent in the last set of negotiations, as I say, on the union side with men almost full-time for almost seven months. Of course management had a battery of some 15 officers locked up in hotel rooms for almost the same period of time.

There were days upon days when nothing at all happened. The membership was frustrated to the point where, when we did reach a settlement basic, they had forgotten about the demands. They forgot about what might be a reasonable settlement and as far as money and conditions go. They just said that they were going to have a strike regardless of what kind of a recommendation the committee was prepared to make to them.

As I said before, we came out of the conciliation board with one of the best contracts that we have been able to negotiate in the Stelco plant since it has been unionized, and with the highest monetary gain. We also came out with a good training programme—in fact, on a two-year basis, we have one of the best agreements that has ever been written in the Canadian industry. But when the membership heard the recommendations they did not want to listen at all; all they wanted to do was to set a strike deadline. The only thing that put them in this mood was the long drawn out frustrating delay of the conciliation procedures.

I thought I should put it on record again that this is not good. Management knows where it is going, but it is certainly determined that it is going to exercise every stage and drag it out to the point where a strike deadline has to be set. Only when the deadline is set, will it start to talk some sense and get down to business.

Mr. Troy: Unfortunately the leading critic for our party, the hon. member for Etobicoke (Mr. Braithwaite) has a very bad cold and cannot be here tonight, but he asked a question of the hon. Minister in his address to this House. It is to be found on page 1649 of Hansard, and I quote:

It would be a fair question to ask the hon. Minister how many Ontario firms will be taking advantage of this federal legislation in the current year.

The hon. member was referring to schedule 4. It was his opinion that not enough advantage had been taken of it, and that if there had been planned in-plant training, the present unfortunate strike in the newspaper union of this city could have been prevented, and so could others in the future. That was the reason for the hon. member's question as to how many firms had taken advantage of schedule 4.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, the question that was raised yesterday and to which reference is now made, has to do with the new programme of on-the-job training. Since this matter first was negotiated in some detail with the federal authorities to get us a shared programme under programme 4, I would say—and this is my own estimate—that about 100 inquiries have been received from firms indicating interest in participating in the scheme as soon as the programme becomes effective.

To get at this programme and to make it practical and effective, it is necessary to do a fair amount of studying of the industries concerned, and the area in which the industry or the plant has problems, and I mean labour problems by way of labour shortages, or shortages of skilled personnel.

It is against this background that I am unable at this point, to give any figure as to the number of firms that will be participating in the new programme. However, we have considered the immediate need, and there seems to be a high priority in connection with the garment trade—the needle trade. We have gone ahead in that industry, and on-the-job courses in training have been arranged and are not far away from being started. I would think that in six months I would be in a position to give a pretty detailed report on this matter.

We were talking yesterday about an information programme, and the need for information. The publicity given to the new programme last fall brought forth what I regard as a highly satisfactory response from industry. It is most encouraging from that point of view and I am satisfied that this on-the-job training programme will be very successful.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, are we still on vote 903?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: No, he was referring back to an earlier vote arising from a question yesterday.

Mr. A. J. Reaume (Essex North): Are we on it now?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes.

Mr. Troy: Further to what the hon. Minister said: Is the department conducting research with industry to find out just what are likely to be the needs of industry within the next ten years? I know that you published and distributed population statistics, but there was nothing about the needs and what skills we should be training.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Manpower requirements?

Mr. Troy: Yes!

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Under the heading of manpower requirements, we are aware of the importance that this has on the establishment or continuation of any training programme. If you are going to be realistic, you have to be training for a craft or a trade where a job is going to be available at the end of the training scheme, and not in the reverse where you would be training somebody uselessly.

This relates directly to the subject of research, which is under another item. However, this research is directly related to this present vote 903. I think the study in relation to population estimates and forecasts, education qualifications and standards leading up to that final phrase, manpower requirements, is one in which our department—there are other departments concerned with this, education, economics and development—but I would think that The Department of Labour would be in the forefront of those three because that information is one of our working tools and without this immediate, accurate information a good part of our efforts would be futile.

Mr. Troy: I am glad to know that you have already said that your department is working closely with The Departments of Education and Economics and Development, because they also are pretty much involved.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: This is right.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, do you want me to wait on this? I am interested in how you co-operate with the national employment service.

I am sure you have noticed there have been several recent editorials declaiming the fact that the national employment service which should have its fingers on the pulse not only of the immediate working requirements of the labour force but also should be able to categorize the labour force to some extent, apparently have one economist. Surely this is a vehicle that could be used much more.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Who has one economist?

Mr. Thompson: I read a statement in one of the editorials that the national employment service, in looking at one area of particular need, are using one economist. Yet in other countries, I am thinking of Sweden, there is a much closer relationship.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: This situation is with respect to the national employment service. Now the national employment service is a federal agency, it is an employment agency just as its name says. It has to do with the operating technique of interviewing potential people interested in securing jobs, or having jobs, other jobs. The national employment service, in its localized operation, records all of the qualifications and experience of the individual and then attempts, apart from statistical uses of this information, to relate those people to those industries seeking workers.

I do not think it would advance anything if I were to go into some aspects of this matter, but in the ultimate policy-making area the national employment service is a branch of the federal Department of Labour.

By a unique—and I neither comment one way or other on this because I am not interested in getting into a debate about the federal operation, I am simply making reference to the facilities which are available—but by a most unusual term of reference the national economic council apparently does not report to any department but rather to Parliament itself and has power to in fact almost declare and establish the economic policy for the whole of the Dominion of Canada, without reference to government. I do not comment on this because we understand, I think, our debate takes us elsewhere.

Mr. Thompson: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The national economic council does have a very substantial research operation. Then we have the federal Department of Labour which obviously has a primary interest and administers all of the shared programmes dealing with Departments of Education and Labour, on the provincial side, across Canada.

Coming to research, I do not know what facilities each of these operations have in Ottawa; but I do know this, that we endeavour to keep in very close touch with them, both at the federal level and at the local level within the province, in order that an exchange of information can be accomplished so that jointly—and I say this quite frankly—jointly through our combined efforts some positive results can be achieved in these fields. I have never felt that our provincial Department of Labour would be limited or restricted by any constitutional aspect. It has been my view if there was a job to be done that was in a field that was not presently being covered, if we were able we would go into that and assist the overall effort; bearing in mind one qualification that I do not think the federal and provincial departments should duplicate and create a waste in their services or expenditures.

As a result of this, I think I would put it fairly and squarely that out of these discussions with our Ontario Economic Council, with the federal Department of Labour, with the federal Department of Trade and Industry, with The Ontario Department of Economics and Development, our own Department of Education and Department of Labour, there is a very great need and a gap in the research analysis to establish what those manpower requirements are.

Observing the entire picture as it exists, and as I have tried to qualify the debate because it is not a debate where any point is gained by laying off one against the other, I think that the area of ascertaining manpower requirements for five years hence, or six, seven, eight, nine, 10, 15, 20 years hence, is a very real and vital aspect of research and information without which I do not think we are going to go anywhere in dealing head-on with this matter.

Accordingly, as I see it at the moment, we have reorganized our department of research. We have a competent director—a well-known man. We have money in our budget. I would think that in this analysis and determination of manpower requirements against which educational courses and other courses, on-the-job industrial training that can be established, I would think that we probably are the ones that will be leaders in this particular area of research. We are ready to go, I would think. We are already recruiting members of our staff against the increased complement.

We do not need all economists. I think there are certain types of statisticians and other types of qualified people who would be in a position to contribute to this effort under the proper guidance and direction. I will have a little more to say about this research branch, because by the same token it must supply the department, for the people of this province whether they be employers or employees, with all kinds of information which should be available but is presently not available. I think that probably if I were to assess the advances into what I like to call our "Blueprint for Labour" probably there is no other area more important than that covered by the new research branch.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the hon. Minister's emphasis on this and I would agree with him. I still have a concern about the national employment service. You say this is strictly an employment service where they are replacing people. I think it is unfortunate that it is just that, because here is the corridor through which many people wanting to secure jobs have to go, and there are an awful lot of statistics to be gained from those people as they are going through.

I think that as they are going through this corridor, knowing the number of the services which you provide, the department provides, or the provincial government provides in retraining and so on, that if this NES was really on its toes and they were doing more than just placing in employment, but doing counselling as well, they would be assessing the referrals for retraining and would be sizing up areas where perhaps retraining is sufficient, Mr. Chairman.

I think there are many areas in which the NES could be doing work jointly with you. I feel not only that perhaps the department considers, well this is just doing a placement job. I am not sure that even many industries do not feel they fall down in doing a placement job. Instead of going through the NES—as I notice also in this article—one man would say, "Would you not feel embarrassed standing in line to get a job at an NES office?"

I think that is unfortunate that it has gone down in prestige in the area of job finding, but I am not sure that we could not give a clarion call to industries—because we need this research that the hon. Minister is talking about. We should ask them about the possibility of some central bureau either at the department or else at NES so that any industry that was placing a man, even if it did not go through NES, could let the central bureau know what kind of jobs were being placed. I have a feeling that we do not know in this province how many skilled men we have, and we do not know how many men with potential to get skills. Because of this, then, I think that we have to get more co-ordination.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Chairman, I am quite interested in manpower, employment and training policies, as many other

hon. members are, but for the life of me I do not know what they have to do with conciliation service. It seems to me that it would be—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, we are covering a lot of ground under this vote.

Mr. Bryden:—more appropriate perhaps to discuss it under the research branch or something like that. I cannot see that it has any relevancy here at all.

Mr. Reaume: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask the hon. Minister if, at the time of the appointment of a board, does he have to have the application from both parties or just either one?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The appointment of a board arises from the report of the conciliation officer—when he says he has got to the end of his rope, as it were, and the conciliation service of an officer will not produce further results and it is time to get on to the next stage.

Mr. Reaume: Yes, that is how I understood it.

I wanted to speak for just a moment. We had a strike of automobile workers in Oshawa, and then we had the Ford strike at Oakville, and then following up that one we had the Ford strike at Windsor, and then after that one was finished we had the Chrysler strike. I think my hon. friend from Wentworth East mentioned that one of the reasons that these strikes are occurring is because of the real awkwardness and the slow movement of the boards. I think that if a union cannot get on with a board it might as well set a deadline, and then, if it has to, it can strike. But after a deadline has been once set, is there not any means of the hon. Minister intervening at that time with the union and the company and using the good influences of his office for the purpose of trying to head off a strike? That is question number one.

I am informed that we now have in the province about 80,000 people unemployed, and when we ask questions about the Drury plan—that is the plan that has to do with the auto parts exchange agreement between the United States and Canada—we find that the province does not know anything about it at all. I am one of those people who feel that the province ought to know all about it, because if the big three are for it, there are many of the small auto parts plants that are not for it. A statement was made the other evening in the House in Ottawa that people who would be unemployed eventually by reason of small automobile parts plants going out of business—it was made by a member of our party, too—would be taken up in other plants. But if we take the instance of the Ford company at Windsor, we find that these men average around the age of 45 to 50 and probably upwards of that. I really do not think that any of the larger auto plants really are going to hire these men at that age.

I am not quite certain whether this is a question that I ought to be asking this hon. Minister or the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall), but it is a very important one, that if the federal government, which is really spearheading this plan, has not taken our province into its confidence, I think it is nearly time that it did, because our province is the most highly industrialized by far of any province at all, and if we find ourselves now with 80,000 people unemployed, God only knows how many people will really be unemployed when this Act is finally passed in the United States.

I noticed that in the instance of the Chrysler strike in Windsor, the plant was closed down tight, but the company was bringing Chrysler cars from the United States, even though the bill had not been passed in the United States as yet. I do not know when this bill will finally pass, but in any event the only promise that was made by the people of the United States was that for every car that was brought over and finally sold here, one more car would eventually be built in Canada by our people. It was only a promise, and I do not know how far that promise will be kept, but in any event I am just wondering if there is not some real pressure that might be brought to bear by the people in power in our province upon the government in Ottawa—in order that every step it makes in this plan that is going to affect auto workers, or any other kind of workers—so that the federal government invites our government, if it has not—and I cannot say really whether it has or not. I think that at one stage of the debate the hon. Minister of Economics and Development said that he had been left out of it. If it is true, I want to say that I think it is wrong—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: How right the hon. member is.

Mr. Reaume: I am just asking the hon. Minister, then, if there is anything that he can do. I want to make this firm statement, that as a member of this party, if there is anything I can do in order that I might help him or the hon. Minister of Economics and Development in order that we might safeguard the jobs of these people—because there is a great apprehension—I will do it.

I rode the other evening on the train from Windsor with a man who is the head of an automobile parts plant that employs about 400 people. He is not quite certain how long his company is going to be in business or whether it is going to be out of business. I was told by that man that there is a firm in Oshawa—and I mentioned it to the hon. member for Oshawa—which has already mentioned the fact that about 400 of its people were going to be unemployed because of the fact that automobile plants in the province were going to buy bumpers and other things from plants across the border.

If there is any information that the hon. Minister has on this problem, I would be very happy indeed to hear it.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, this would relate, so far as The Department of Labour is concerned, to vote 902 of my department, which has to do with industrial training.

Mr. Reaume: I agree.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: However, I think the matter is of sufficient importance and I am glad the hon. member has raised it. I would like, with the permission of the House, to direct a few observations in the light of the hon. member's present remarks.

Before doing so, I would just like to make a reference to this question of conciliation which is on this vote and to which the hon. member made reference. Of course, it is a well-known fact that the UAW, insofar as the big three or four automobile industries or manufacturers are concerned, does not like to go through the conciliation process. They want to get to the strike situation. This would apply to the big three of the automobile companies, the next two would apply to some farm implement manufacturers with whom the UAW has contracts. They want to get through that conciliation process right up to the point where they can get into a strike position as quickly as possible.

Insofar as that kind of industry and that kind of contract is concerned, there is no question that they do not like the conciliation process. The leaders of that union, all of them, are instructed and directed to take whatever steps are necessary to shorten up that phase, to go through the motions to get to the strike position.

Now, there is another situation, however, that the same union adopts. This is a characteristic which must be well known to the public; and that is to take a strike vote while legitimate bargaining is going on. Most unusual; but there it is! I had it, and there is the situation.

So you have it at both extremes.

We had a debate on this yesterday and I said at that time that large industries and large unions—sophisticated, self-reliant, able and competent in their own right—want to look after their own business of collective bargaining without intervention by government.

But, down the line, the benefits of the provisions of the Act, The Labour Relations Act, are largely then to the middle- and small-sized firms. In those areas, wherever that same union, and others of the same policy, wherever they are concerned with medium- and small-sized industries they use the facilities of the Act, including the conciliation process and including the use of a conciliation board; and they use it enthusiastically. They exhaust its process with the hope that they can get settlement through those provisions.

This is a bit of an anomaly. I cannot explain it, I can simply lay it before you and there it is.

By virtue of the knowledge that we do have on how the conciliation process is used and adopted in medium and small industry, there is not evidence before us, the department or me as the Minister, to justify advancing the abolition of the process itself. I say that to the hon. member, frankly. This is the way I see it.

However, let us come to this other matter.

Mr. Reaume: I was just wondering at that point now, having in mind—and I agree with everything the hon. Minister has said—but I was wondering at that time, having in mind that the hon. Minister can tell or we can all tell that within, say, 30 days, we are going to have a strike on our hands: Is it then not good business on the part of the department, the hon. Minister himself as head of the department, to offer his own personal services, going between the union and the company for the purpose of trying to avoid the strike?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I would think that it is a proposition that sounds reasonable, but in actual practice it is not supported. The fact is that management and labour in industry, that is, in industrial disputes, do not want government intervention. During the past few weeks I would think I have had a thousand communications arising from the hospital bill saying: "Whatever you do, keep out of industrial labour disputes. No matter where the chips fall, we will take it."

I am sure the hon. member will understand.

Mr. Reaume: I do understand, but I know of instances where both the company—you see, it all depends who happens to be over the barrel when!

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I think that is right.

Mr. Reaume: That is absolutely true!

I have noticed many instances where the union or the company would love to have the government intervene at a certain point if they at that point found themselves over the barrel. That is why I use the expression that the important thing is who happens to be over the barrel when.

But going on from that point: If you were to offer your help to both the union and the company, what would they say? "Mind your own business, we will handle this!"

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, you are into this almost double-entendre situation. Take the facts as the hon. member has outlined them; if they are the facts that is what happens. One day one party is over the barrel, and the next day they are not. So on both occasions, on subsequent days or subsequent times, the same party is arguing against itself according to the exigencies of the situation as they see it. It puts us all in a pretty difficult position.

I think that the maturity of the parties to this kind of economic bargaining, the senior people, are aware of it. The fellow over the barrel, I guess, is permitted to shout, but he really does not mean it. He would not want it applied as a broad principle; although in the exigencies of that individual situation he might.

It is not easy, I do not think we will solve it. The hon. member for Essex North has had a lot of experience in this field, living in Windsor, and I have a great regard for his knowledge in this field. I suppose as long as human nature and mankind have different characteristics some of the problems of labour and management will always be with us.

Mr. Reaume: I think this is quite true.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Let me refer to this item, which was on a previous vote but which the hon. member has now raised. In making these observations I do not raise, as I did not in the debate with the hon. leader of the Opposition earlier this evening, I raise no question of motive; I simply state the facts. In connection with the automobile manufacturers' importation of trucks and parts, as between Canada and the United States, the first knowledge of that agreement came to this government via the automobile industry; in other words, by hearsay. I say that as a fact.

The next point that I think worthy of attention has to do with the fact that under our Canadian law the Cabinet or the government can file an agreement on behalf of Canada, whereas the United States has to go to Congress. Whatever is in that agreement, implementation is not only being demanded by the United States on the part of Canada, but Canada's part of the agreement is actually being performed; and yet there is no guarantee whatsoever that agreement will ever be ratified in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. Reaume: I think that is a very important point.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I think the hon. member and I are in agreement on this. It is important. It is more important, I say, Mr. Chairman, than most people in Canada appreciate.

Mr. Reaume: I wonder if I may intervene at this point, Mr. Chairman?

If this were in the province to the east of us and if the government of Canada was signing any agreement with any foreign power that may have a tremendous effect upon them, you would hear a man by the name of Levesque hollering clear across this country.

Now this is the point I want to make: The government of Canada, I think, has acted in the automobile field by working out an agreement with the United States without taking our province into their confidence. Why they did not do it, I do not know. But I think that the time has arrived when the hon. Prime Minister of the province, the hon. Minister of Economics and Development and the hon. Minister himself, ought to say to the men in Ottawa: Inasmuch as this thing affects us, our province, because it is here in this province that automobiles and automobile parts are made, and if hundreds and thousands of people are going to be put out of work by reason of parts plants going out of business, it is going to be in our province where those people are going to be unemployed. We have 80,000 people unemployed now and the good Lord knows that we do not want any more.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Let us just take this situation—I am sure that the hon. member will understand that the hon. Minister of Economics and Development is the Minister probably most connected with this overall picture.

Let me tell the hon. member how this affects us in The Department of Labour. Prior to this agreement we had problems and trouble enough to cope with in trying to seek a resolution of those problems having to do with the shortage of skilled labour in Ontario; having to do with the fact that there is a lack of desire on the part of unemployed labour, in whatever location it is in Ontario, to move from one part of the province to another. Mobility is a difficult situation, due to family and other ties. There is a problem there of sufficient magnitude to attract my attention as far as industrial planning is concerned.

Under this automobile contract, here is the situation: Instead of manufacturing 20 different parts, under this agreement we are going to manufacture 10 of those in Ontario and 10 of them will be in the United States. So that manufacturers of 10 in Ontario are going to go out of business. Now this is the broad situation as it is.

Now it remains for those present parts supply manufacturers to retool themselves, re-equip their plants and start producing those extra quantities of the parts that are being left for Ontario or Canada to produce.

This involves refinancing of these firms, to begin with. Who is going to put up this financing? Is the federal government, or are they going to come to us and say that is part of The Department of Labour's programme? I do not know. But I put this to you in those words, because this is how serious it is, how far this thing runs.

Now let us talk about the retraining of employees. This is an added burden upon us that I did not bargain for until the fact of what was being negotiated by the federal government was disclosed. I am simply agreeing with you that this is a serious problem. I have attended meetings with my colleagues and with method officials from Ottawa in an endeavour to approach this problem calmly, if I might put it that way, in order that an effective solution and retraining programme can be instituted insofar as my department is concerned. I am sure the other hon. Ministers will speak insofar as they are concerned. It is a vital matter. I do not think, however, that it is a time for us to be throwing stones through plate glass windows at people in Ottawa. They have got trouble enough. I say that in the sincerest way there is. There is enough trouble in Ottawa at the moment without us—with the very efficient government that we have here—jiggering it up any further for them.

The point is that there are several departments in the federal government that are concerned with this matter, and I do not know the answer. I will simply pose the question and say, let me phrase it this way, do all of the federal departments concerned with this automobile agreement see eye to eye with each other? It is my fervent hope that they do, because if it were otherwise, and it has been suggested that it is, the confusion that is going to emanate from this grand contract is going to be compounded beyond our present imagination. They have troubles down there, they are endeavouring to sort them out on this particular subject. I think the day remains in the immediate future, and I do not mean a month or two months, but in the next two or three weeks, where our hand will be shown in the kind of effective way that you suggest.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a brief comment on this. I agree with the hon. Minister that this is a matter of some delicacy. I do not think, to borrow his phraseology, we should start throwing stones through plate glass windows.

I have a suggestion for a very quiet behind-the-scenes solution. I think the hon. member for Essex North should sit down with his federal running mate from Windsor and put a few words in his ear—if he is on talking terms with him—so he can carry the message quietly to Ottawa. Then maybe Ottawa will start to communicate with this government and you will not be left out of the negotiations. I think this is a way in which it can be handled very quietly.

Mr. Reaume: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to carry anything quietly.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: We do not want to bring Mr. Martin into this.

Mr. Reaume: There will not be anything quiet about it. I think really that the matter is of vast importance. This is the problem that I think affects all parties. I do not think it is one that party lines get into at all.

Mr. MacDonald: Why do you not talk it over with—

Mr. Reaume: I am talking it over with the hon. members of the House of which I am part. I am saying this, I hope that we as a House, as a Parliament, not as a party, that we can say to the people in Ottawa that this automobile parts agreement that you are effecting now with the United States, may have a tremendous effect on the people of our province and we think it is pretty near time that you invited the officials from our province down to Ottawa and explain to them what it is all about. I do not think this has been done and I do not think it is your fault. I think that you do not know anything about it because you have not been told anything about it. I think where you have failed, and where the people in this Parliament have failed, the hon. Prime Minister has failed, and the hon. Minister of Economics has failed, that you should have made a demand upon Ottawa that they take you down and take you into their offices and say now look, inasmuch as you are the major auto making province in the country, we want you to understand, and we want you to understand the whole story. I am not going to sit down with Paul Martin, or Pete Smith, or Drury in a place that is quiet.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: They are all in the same boat.

Mr. Reaume: We will talk it over here in the open, in a place where it is wide open, and then I think it is up to this province, to act. It is obvious that Ottawa is not going to invite you, so we ought to invite ourselves.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Let me say this, and I think we should wind up this debate because it is on a previous vote and out of deference to my learned friend we have engaged in it, but I would say this, I think I would assure the House that by adopting the approach and the method of dealing with Ottawa that I indicated, we have established effective liaison with the federal government in such a manner that the results you are seeking and that we seek, are going to be obtained.

Mr. Reaume: Well now, that is—

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, we have had meetings here with The Department of Labour, The Department of Economics and Development and The Department of Education, which are the primary departments involved in this whole matter. We have had several meetings here in Toronto with officials from Mr. Drury's department.

The real fact of the matter, sir, is at this stage of the game, nobody really knows where anyone is going. But as far as the thing has progressed, we are dealing and attempting to assess what this is going to mean to us in this province; what it is going to mean to our industry; what it is going to mean to us in terms of an assessment for retraining; what it is going to mean in the way of displaced industry, if I may put it that way, as well as displaced workers. All these matters are presently in a process of discussion and it is not negotiation. It is discussion at this stage of the game in order to know what has been done, how far it has gone, what its effects are going to be and when those effects are going to make themselves felt in this province.

I can assure the House that these discussions are presently going on.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, under vote 903, the labour safety council. Back in December, 1963, the hon. Minister appointed a committee apparently, to undertake a comprehensive study of educational aspects of accident prevention in industry.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Is that not vote 906?

Mr. Newman: Under conciliation services, vote 4, conciliation boards, commissions and labour safety councils.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Oh, yes.

Mr. Newman: So I assume that would be dealing with this aspect.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: What is the point?

Mr. Newman: Am I in the right vote?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: We can deal with it here.

Mr. Newman: Now the board has come down with a series of recommendations found on page 30 of the report. I do not intend to read them, because the hon. Minister has all the recommendations, he knows about them. Has the hon. Minister implemented any of them or is he planning on introducing legislation?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: This report has been received by me from the labour safety council. It is one of the best reports I have received from anybody since I have been Minister in this department. The report involves some very excellent suggestions. The bulk of them, in fact I think all of them, can be effected and implemented without any change in legislation.

There is a major reference to the workmen's compensation board, and when this report was received I had it printed and distributed about 2,000 copies—I think it is in its second printing now—to all interested parties across the province so there would be complete tabling, as it were, of the report. The report is being studied at the moment by the officials of the workmen's compensation board, and I am presently awaiting comments from them, as well as comments from the safety branch of my own department. I am very much impressed by this report and as soon as it is possible to tie together those various elements that go together to make up our safety network, if I could put it that way, that is the enforcement branch, the inspection branch, the compensation board itself, the safety association and bring them together, I would think that this report and its implementation would enable us to give a total picture to this House and to the public. This is under way as quickly as possible and there will be no delay in moving on it.

Mr. Newman: We can look forward to implementation of the report.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes. Some are practically all—

Mr. Sargent: An important point that I would like to draw to the hon. Minister's attention is, can the labour safety council act on its own volition, without the permission of the Minister of Labour?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The labour safety council is an advisory body to the Minister of Labour and acts on matters which are referred to it. We refer certain types of legislation—proposed legislation—to the council; we refer specific studies such as the one on safety education and matters of that sort to them as well.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. Minister explain why he has the safety council lumped in with the conciliation board? What is the relationship?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It is only a matter of accounting. It does not have any bearing on conciliation boards, but there is a—

Mr. Sargent: I think that is a very important point to establish later on in the vote. We are going to be talking safety and technical service and the very serious developments. The hon. Minister says this is a matter of accounting.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: As to the vote—

Mr. Sargent: They slash this very important item to all of us. I would not like to suggest there is any problem going on, but the conciliation figures, by including expenses of the labour safety councils, commissions, have no relationship whatsoever to conciliation. I suggest to you that this should be put in its own slot. Further, in this conciliation into safety—that comes out of the next vote, “Safety and Technical Services.”

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, before we leave the question of the labour safety council, I would like to make one or two comments. Since the hon. Minister has indicated that the subject matter of the report is now under consideration, I will not comment on it any further, except to say that I agree with his commendation of the report, and I hope that both The Department of Labour and the workmen's compensation board will see fit to carry out its recommendation. The major point of this recommendation directed to the workmen's compensation board is one of the old issues that has been up for many years in this House, as to whether or not employees should be represented on safety associations and so on. I think the council has an interesting way of solving that problem and I hope that it may be accepted.

I rise mainly to congratulate the hon. Minister on having published this report for the information, not only of this House, but of the public generally. When the question of the establishment of a labour safety council was first dealt with in this House, some of us on this side had quite a battle with the hon. Minister's predecessor over the question of publication of reports. The original idea for a labour safety council came from the report of the McAndrew commission, as I recall it. The McAndrew commission attached great importance to the publication of the reports of the council. In his recommendation, the Minister of the day accepted the idea of setting up a council, but it was to operate entirely behind closed doors with its information and advice going only to the Minister and not being made available for the benefit of the many other parties who are interested in this thing.

I hope that the hon. Minister's decision to publish this particular report may be an indication of things to come, and we can look forward to the publication of reports of this council as a matter of course. I think that is an important part of the general attack on safety.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, I would like to comment briefly on the question of conciliation services, particularly in the area after the formal conciliation procedure has been followed and the result has not been successful. A strike has been called and the department's conciliation services, as I understand it, continue to be available to the parties should they wish to make use of them.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It is technically called “post-conciliation conciliation.”

Mr. Renwick: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. In that particular period of time, as I see it, nothing should be done to exacerbate the situation between the parties in the hope that further conciliation would result in the solution of this dispute.

One of the matters which certainly, in my opinion, militates against further conciliation, is the very broad terms in which injunctions are granted against unions which have gone on strike in the period following conciliation, in the exercise of the right which they have to do so. I would like to take a few minutes of the hon. Minister's time to comment on the very wide scope of those terms and ask him whether he has given any consideration to framing, in some way, appropriate wording for injunctions in labour disputes.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I can answer that right now. This matter, which has been before me as the Minister of Labour and the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart), is repeatedly and regularly raised from time to time; the most recent event at which the hon. Attorney General and I dealt with this matter was with the Ontario federation of labour last Wednesday. At that time this matter was discussed in depth and at length and I might say that we are quite aware of the positions taken by some of the unions. The matter is not new to either the hon. Attorney General or to me.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the hon. Minister's remarks. I would like to take a few minutes of the time of the House to point out the problem, as I see it, in this area.

I have here an injunction which was granted in a labour dispute, in which the judge who granted the injunction specifically pointed out that the picketing involved was perfectly peaceful; that there was no indication of any kind that the picketing was other than an information picket; and that there was no apprehension of either a breach of the peace, or of injury to anyone's property or to any person involved. There was no intimation at any time during the course of the argument before the courts for this injunction that there was any act of any member of the union which was contrary to the law in any way. The members of the union were simply engaged in the exercise of their right to picket peacefully.

The result of it—and I am not arguing the merit of the granting of the injunction at this time—was that an injunction was granted in these terms:

From watching, besetting, or picketing, or attempting to picket at, or adjacent to the business premises of the plaintiff in the city of Toronto, in the county of York, and from improperly interfering with the employees of the plaintiff by preventing, or attempting to prevent, by the use of force, threat, intimidation, coercion or persuasion, of said employees from entering or leaving the plaintiff's said premises.

My comment on that paragraph is simply that the intimation, and certainly the inference drawn by a person who was unaware of the formal nature of such a document, would be that in some way the members of the union were engaged in unlawful activity. I think that is a reasonable inference that people would draw from such a clause.

The second clause in the injunction states:

From intimidating or threatening harm to, or in any way interfering with, the servants, agents, employees, patrons or customers of the plaintiff, or any other persons seeking peaceful entrance to, or exit from, the said place of business of the plaintiff, in the city of Toronto.

Again, my comment is that the inference which any person would draw, other than, I think, a lawyer who is familiar with these particular clauses, is that in some way the union or its members were engaged in that particular type of unlawful activity. The third clause is:

From inducing or attempting to induce owners, drivers or operators of motor vehicles to abstain from entering into the plaintiff's place of business in the city of Toronto, or delivering goods and supplies to, or picking up goods and supplies from, the said place of business of the plaintiff, or to refuse to enter into or deliver supplies to or pick up supplies from the said premises.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that the inference that any person reading those words would draw is that the union or its members were engaged in attempting to induce the people named from doing something that they were lawfully entitled to do. The fourth clause is:

From inducing, or attempting to induce, conspiring to induce or continuing to induce breaches of contract by watching, besetting, picketing or attempting to picket at or adjacent to the said premises of the plaintiff in the city of Toronto—and so on. Again, the inference is the same—that the union or its members are engaged in doing something which is unlawful, namely, inducing breaches of contracts by persons who have a lawful right, under their contracts, to enter the premises or to carry out their obligations. The next clause is:

From inducing, or attempting to induce, breaches of contracts and agreements between the plaintiff and its suppliers, or any of them, or from interfering with the employees of the suppliers of the plaintiff, and from forcing or attempting or continuing to force the employees of the suppliers of the plaintiff not to deliver supplies to the plaintiff.

And, again, the inference, I think the hon. Minister would agree, is the same. The last item is:

From ordering, aiding, abetting, counselling or encouraging in any manner whatsoever, whether directly or indirectly, any other person or persons to commit the aforesaid act.

My concern, and I believe the hon. Minister would agree with me, is that it is about time that if injunctions are to continue to be granted in labour disputes, at least the orders which are issued granting the injunctions should be specifically appropriate to the act which is to be enjoined, and specifically appropriate to the act which is leading to, in the eyes of the law, an illegal result. I would put forward, not on the question of the substance of injunctions in labour disputes but simply on the form of these orders, that they do not conduce in any way to establishing a climate in which the post-conciliation procedures of the Minister's department could come into force and operate leading towards solutions of the disputes which have already led to strikes.

I would like to have the hon. Minister's comments if he would see fit to do so on the archaic language in which these injunctions are granted.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, I do not know that the language is archaic. I would think that any well-informed lawyer would know what they mean, because it is a matter for lawyers to be concerned with: it is also a matter for the lawyer to inform his client, which, in your case, would be the union, or in these circumstances would be a union.

Let me assure you that I know of no responsible or senior labour leader in this province who is not familiar with all of the aspects and involvements of injunctions and injunction procedures. I think it is their duty to communicate them to the members. However, as a rule, my practice is to refrain from interfering in the internal management of a union. This is part of the internal management, but I comment on it.

Injunctions themselves arise from The Judicature Act; the operation of that Act I leave to the hon. Attorney General except to say this: There are no permanent injunctions issued in this province without an argument being heard from both parties—a good deal of argument. A point is made of the involvement of an interim injunction or an ex parte injunction, but that is a matter of a day or so until the matter is argued, when both parties are present. Those involvements and the pros and cons would be well known to the hon. member, but insofar as any amendments to The Judicature Act are concerned, I do not think that I, as a lawyer, nor even as Minister of Labour, would suggest to the hon. Attorney General that he make an amendment to make special cases for the area of labour relations. I put that to you because you would want me to tell you where I stand; no doubt you will be hearing from the hon. Attorney General at a later date on this very point.

Now to the climate of post-conciliation, or those efforts made after routine conciliation efforts have failed to bring the parties together—or, as I think more accurately I should say, after the parties themselves have been unable to come to an agreement. It is their contract. It is not yours; it is not mine. We did not create the issue. These are always difficult matters and there is nothing new, I suggest to the hon. member, in the fact that negotiating a settlement in a dispute where a strike exists becomes increasingly difficult as each day of the strike goes by. There is no question of that whatsoever, and the department is aware of that.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Chairman, I think I might say a word at this time on the matter of the interim injunction, which is obtained ex parte; I am sure that is the situation to which the hon. member for Riverdale refers.

As the hon. Minister of Labour has said, this matter has been before us for consideration frequently. It has been considered and discussed at length recently with a very full representation of the Ontario federation of labour. I think it should be said that The Judicature Act, which provides for the obtaining of an interim injunction on an ex parte application with only one of the parties present and making the application, can only be obtained—and The Judicature Act was amended to this effect—it can only be obtained on notice of at least two days of the application being given, can be in effect for only four days, when it must be returned for hearing with both parties present, and can only be obtained where damage to property, injury to persons or a breach of the peace, has occurred. These things must have happened; injury to persons, damage to property, or a breach of the peace must have occurred, or the interruption, and I think I am quoting the language correctly, but I am doing it from memory, of an essential public service has been occasioned or is likely to occur.

Now those are the conditions which must exist before a party in a labour matter may obtain an interim injunction on an ex parte application. Two days' notice, to endure for not more than four days, and those conditions must have occurred. I think the section—I am sorry, I have not got The Judicature Act before me; I was not aware this matter would arise at this moment or I might have been prepared with it—I believe it is section 17, Mr. Chairman.

The Judicature Act was amended. The amendment came about as a result of a report of a committee studying the matter of labour relations. I am not sure of the year, but it was five, six or seven years ago. It was recommended that there be notice that the time be shortened from the ordinary procedures in an injunction; these recommendations were adopted and implemented into a change in The Judicature Act.

Now, I would like to say that the interim injunction is not a new thing in our law and in our administration of justice. It is there for the benefit of both parties, not just one.

Mr. Bryden: It is of no benefit to the workers. It is just used as an instrument against them.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, I am not going to go into a great debate with my hon. friend on that subject. The interim injunction is there in our law and it has existed for many years as a means of protection for both parties in a dispute in order that they may retain and maintain their positions until they have an opportunity to come before the courts—if necessary to receive a decision, or to work out their settlement by negotiation by all the means that are provided, particularly in labour matters, through conciliation, and so on. It is not something that is specifically designed or was put in there for labour matters; it is something that we have had in our law for many years.

Mr. Bryden: That is the point—it should not apply to labour matters.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: To say that it should not be there in a labour matter, I think, is a position that cannot be justified. As I have been at pains to point out, it is only obtainable where damage has occurred to property, injury to some person or a breach of the peace; or where an essential public service has been interrupted or stopped or is likely to be stopped.

Now it is urged that the parties should be left to the criminal law for a breach of the peace, injury to person or where damage to property has occurred; that the parties should be left to the remedies that are available under the criminal law and that a charge be laid, an information be laid and a prosecution proceeded with against the individual who has done the wrong, who has committed a breach of the peace, who has broken somebody's arm or who has destroyed somebody's property. I point out to this House, Mr. Chairman, that that procedure only deals with one particular individual, if he can be located and found; but it does not cover, it does not effectively in any way deal with, the situation where there are many individuals concerned, and where there are two parties made up on both sides of individuals. A single prosecution, or a number of prosecutions, of individuals who have committed breaches of the law does not maintain or keep in balance a situation so that negotiation and discussion can take place.

I think any responsible labour official or leader would not suggest—would not seriously suggest—that this remedy, this procedure which is in our law, which is time-tested and proved as to its value, should be removed. I am sure that if they did and if it were removed, they would be the first to regret it, although the hon. member may say to me that it does not work always to the benefit of labour.

Mr. Bryden: It never does. It is an instrument against them, that is often made available frivolously and with little basis; but I will make my comments later.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: This may be the opinion of the hon. member, but it is something which I am sure, if it were removed, would work a hardship on labour and they would soon come to realize it.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, I am glad the hon. Attorney General interjected into this debate because the point which I was making was that this was not an ex parte injunction application. This was an interim injunction in which both parties were heard, so there was no question in this particular instance of any breach of the peace, any injury to person or any injury to property.

The judge who granted the injunction specifically stated that the members of the trade union involved were simply engaged on an information picket. There was no evidence, indeed not any sign of any evidence, that they were engaged in threatening anyone, inducing any breaches of contract, trying to prevent people from entering the premises of the plaintiff in this particular application at all. Yet despite the fact that they were engaged in what they considered their lawful activity of peaceful information picketing, they were for reasons other than any apprehension of any breach of the peace at all, subjected to an injunction in the identical terms in which an injunction would have been granted had there been a very serious apprehension of a breach of the peace, had there been evidence before the court of threats of violence to persons, had there been evidence before the court of inducing breach of contract, had there been evidence of any number of serious offences against persons or property or their rights. My whole point is that when an injunction is issued in this particular situation—in an interim injunction situation where both parties are heard—it is issued in the identical terms in which it would have been issued in the situation of a threatened breach of the peace. It is then published widely, as we all know, and the inference in the newspaper to the member of the public who read or hears about such an injunction and see this kind of language quoted, the inference which an ordinary person—and I grant what the hon. Minister of Labour says, that we are not speaking about the trade union leaders or about the lawyers who are involved—the inference of the ordinary citizen of the province is that the trade union or its members have been engaged in matters which are very serious offences under our law. All I am suggesting is that the hon. Minister of Labour and the hon. Attorney General, with whatever advice they could obtain, should see to it that when an interim injunction is granted, it is granted in terms which are specifically appropriate to the particular act which they are being directed to cease from carrying on or doing.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I might say to the hon. member I would be glad to take the matter up with the hon. Attorney General and discuss it with him and examine it in the light of the hon. member's observations.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, now that the matter has been raised, I think perhaps a few more observations might be in order. I do not expect that the hon. Attorney General would be familiar with all the nuances involved in a labour dispute. I was, however, surprised to hear the hon. Minister of Labour say a few minutes ago—he may have departed from this position, I do not know—but a few minutes ago he said that he would not recommend that labour disputes be treated in any different way under The Judicature Act than any other kind of dispute or happening of a similar character.

If that position had been taken consistently with regard to them all, we would not even have a labour relations Act. The reason we have a labour relations Act with special procedures in many areas is because over the years we learned, in every jurisdiction in North America pretty well by experience, that the ordinary law is just not applicable to this type of situation in many cases. What was happening was that grave injustices were being wrought upon working people under the guise of an impartial application of the law.

In theory the application was impartial but because the law itself was not properly applicable to the situation, the law itself operated in a way that was disadvantageous to the workers. Now I am not going to get into a discussion of The Labour Relations Act, but it exists because of a recognition that that was happening and that something should be done to redress the balance, and certainly the Act does redress the balance to some degree.

But the regular law, as the hon. Attorney General points out, still applies in this question of injunctions. As the hon. Attorney General said, the whole practice of procedure relating to injunctions dates from the law further back—I do not know how far back it dates—but it dates from a time when labour disputes in the modern sense had not even been heard of. We take this ancient legal remedy, which is vitally important in some situations and undoubtedly contributes to justice in some situations, but we take it and apply it to a situation to which it has no relevance.

I am not suggesting that there is no place for injunctions, but I am suggesting there is no place, or mighty little place for them, in labour disputes. In actual fact, notwithstanding the amendment to The Judicature Act to which the hon. Attorney General refers, injunctions are handed out as if they were sausages coming out of a machine on the basis of affidavits on which the deponent, or whatever his title is, says: I verily believe that something or other is going to happen!

Now the hon. Attorney General says this works equally for each side. It does no such thing. I bet you he cannot cite one case where a trade union ever applied for an injunction in a labour dispute. I doubt very much if he can cite one case. But you can cite them by the carload involving employers who have applied for them and have got them on the most frivolous ground. Why? Because they are a useful weapon to them in beating down the workers.

They get an injunction that can be forced for four days. The hon. Attorney General says four days is not very much. In most things it would not be very much. If I were wanting to build a road over property that somebody else owns and he got an injunction to restrain me from doing it for four days, it would make no difference to me at all. It would not matter if I did it this week or next week or the week after. That is where an injunction could probably be used.

But in a labour dispute, four days can be critical. The employer can go in and get this interim injunction ex parte on the basis of practically nothing, and can use it as a weapon against his workers, to break their solidarity. You take workers who are not trained in the law, who may in many cases not have too much education—some of them may not even be terribly familiar with the English language, they may not be too familiar with the ways and customs of this country—they are presented with this sort of a document and it is a most formidable thing to them and can certainly have a real effect on their morale. That is why employers go and get them.

There may be some cases where interim injunctions have been obtained where there was a genuine apprehension that serious damage to property or injury to persons might result. But most of the time they are obtained purely and simply as an instrument in a conflict between two parties. It is an instrument that is for the benefit of one party only. It is used by him only, never by the other side, and it is used in order that he may get an unfair advantage in the dispute with his employees.

The hon. Minister of Labour says he will discuss the matter with the hon. Attorney General. Well, I would hope that he would discuss it from the point of view of labour relation situations and the inapplicability of much of the general laws of those situations, and discuss it from the point of view of working out procedures that are applicable to this type of situation just as The Labour Relations Act in general has worked out special procedures for this special situation that exists with regard to labour relations.

I heard about—I was not present—I heard about the government's encounter with the Ontario federation of labour with regard to this matter and the impression I got listening to the radio accounts was that they got very short shrift. There was no indication at all that they had made the slightest impact on the government. I think this is regrettable. I think it indicates that the government has failed to understand the nature of the problem that was put before it. I hope they will look at it with an open mind, not with the idea that this is an ancient remedy that has existed for a long time, but with this question in mind: is it a remedy that is appropriate for this quite special type of dispute, namely, a dispute between an employer and an organization representing his employees? I think if they look at it from that point of view they will come to the conclusion that whatever its merits might be in other situations, it is not appropriate for a labour dispute.

I would hope that there will be further amendments made in The Judicature Act, and that labour disputes would be treated as quite distinct from other disputes. The amendment that the hon. Attorney General referred to all of us I hoped would be of some benefit, but as far as I can see from my observation of the situation, it has made absolutely no difference at all. It is as if it had never been passed. It does not change the situation or the ease with which an employer can get an interim injunction, or the ease with which he can use the courts as a weapon against his employees. And that is exactly what happens now under the provisions of The Judicature Act.

Vote 903 agreed to.

On vote 904:

Mr. N. Davison (Hamilton East): Mr. Chairman, I have a couple of questions I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Labour on this vote.

We have a problem in the Hamilton area at the present time. We have plants there that are laying people off and they are transferring people from one department to the other while they are still carrying on overtime. I would like to know from the hon. Minister what is the ruling regarding the 100 hours per year per man? Do they have to apply for some special permit and does the department send inspectors in to see if this is needed? I know in one plant in Hamilton at the present time they are definitely working overtime while they are laying people off.

Is there some ruling laid down? Does the department check to see if this is really needed, or can they just apply and get it on their own?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: No, they make application. The 100-hour rule is there. They make application to the industry and labour board and the board investigates the circumstances surrounding the application, the need for it, what gave rise to it, the conditions in the plant and so on, and give the thing a thorough going over before any approval is given.

Mr. Davison: In a case like this where they have allowed the overtime and a union applies, does the department go in and check on this? Has the hon. Minister in any case sent his men in to check after the union has asked you to do it?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes, I think we have.

Mr. Davison: Also, can the hon. Minister tell me how many plants in Ontario applied for this overtime permit last year?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: For the year ended March 31, 1964, some 1,480 permits were granted.

Mr. Davison: 1,480! And how many workers would this include?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I could not answer that, but I would be glad to compute it for the hon. member.

Mr. Davison: The other question was on the minimum wage. Of course I disagree with the minimum wage of $1, but what I would like to know is why in the tourist industry you are allowing them to work outside the minimum wage. We know now that the tourist industry is one of the biggest industries in Ontario. Most of the big camp owners, I think, are making plenty of money as it is. They seem to have enough time to go to Florida in the winter. The small owners, of course, have their problems, but with most it is a man and wife who run it; they hire very few people. I would like to know why they are out from underneath the Act?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The answer is they are not out from underneath the Act, but they were out from underneath the Act because the Act came into force on July 1, I think it was, of last year. At that date, the effective date of the legislation, the contract arrangements for summer help had already been completed and in most cases the summer employees had commenced their contracts. Now that was No. 1.

No. 2; we used the time during the summer to complete our investigations and study of that particular industry, and to gain some additional knowledge and information which has since been done.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, in this morning's Globe and Mail the story appeared with the heading; "Man Killed in Explosion, Firm Fined." And the sub-heading is; "Frightening Violation of Industrial Safety Act." I do not know whether this is under the right vote or not. This leads into the labour safety council—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, we are past that.

Mr. Sargent: We are past that? We are on 904 now? I thought the hon. member had spoken there before the vote passed.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, there are a couple of items under the labour standards branch. The first one is rather small, but I am wondering why the department has come to a decision it has. This is a case of a man who notified the department four years ago that he had lost his vacation with pay stamp book and it has not turned up in the intervening four years. The department deems this to have been a personal loss. In the instance of, for example, children's allowances, when a cheque is lost and the department is notified that a cheque has been lost, I believe they leave a specified time lapse at the end of which the first cheque in effect is going to be rendered null and they will issue another cheque. If it turns up, they can conceivably reconcile their accounts.

Why cannot that procedure be followed in the instance of a vacation with pay book, particularly when you have a four-year lapse and it is certain now that if it is lost it is lost for good?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: This matter gives me a great deal of difficulty. We have taken counsel both from banks and those types of people who have had experience in negotiable instruments, as these almost are, and for our purpose of discussion they are negotiable. The problem arises around this point, that a cheque can be stopped and it has to be endorsed or some further step taken before it is completely negotiable. Anyone who wrongfully endorses is guilty of fraud. The document is voided and is of no worth, in any event, and whoever cashes a cheque under a forged signature must bear the loss. The fact is that the vacation with pay books with the stamps in them, I would say, are completely negotiable as they stand, just as cash. It is that essential difference that has led to a difference in policy.

This gives me some concern. I have seen a number of instances of the type that the hon. member mentions, and indeed, instances where some hardship would appear to result. My own view is that we should give back, wherever possible, a straight two per cent, or whatever the factor may be, leading to a vacation entitlement, to a straight cheque at the time of vacation or at the time of leaving your employment. I think, as far as I can see, that is the most satisfactory solution to the whole matter.

Mr. MacDonald: Is the hon. Minister contemplating that change?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes, I am.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, the second issue that I wanted to raise, and perhaps I can just put it bluntly as a question and if the hon. Minister's reply is satisfactory, then we will have nothing more to say. What is the department's conclusion after months, with regard to whether or not employees in a nursery come under the Act for minimum wages?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Those in the field do not, those in sales or internal do.

Mr. MacDonald: I realize that, but the problem is that they work inside one day and they are outside the next day and the department—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It has to be at the determination of where the principal or main employment is. I think that is the only test.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, Mr. Chairman, I could read quite extensively from correspondence in connection with one nursery down in Port Burwell, but I would suggest that the time has come—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: You are referring to the McConnell nursery.

Mr. MacDonald: Right.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I met with Mr. McConnell a week ago. There was a meeting last week and Mr. McConnell is not necessarily speaking on his own account. It may be, I think, largely on account of the nurserymen's association, if I can put it that way. I am hoping that a satisfactory solution will be worked out, bearing in mind the practicalities of just what you have said. I think any legislation like this that is borderline, when you are dealing with the borderline, incidents of it, you have got to work out the practicalities of it in the name of common-sense, or else toss out the legislation.

Mr. MacDonald: If the hon. Minister is looking into it and if he was meeting with Mr. McConnell only a week or so ago, presumably this is still a live issue.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Very much.

Mr. MacDonald: It has been alive for many months. I remember some years ago, when the members of the lumber and saw union reported they were getting into difficulties because some of the pulp and paper companies were resorting to the argument that those of their men who worked in the nurseries planting the little trees, the treelets, were farmers and not therefore eligible to be considered as members of the lumber and saw workers.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I think I remember that.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, they resolved this. I do not know whether it was the labour relations board or who rendered a decision on it and ended the nonsense. Surely the incidence of a big nursery, where you are working inside and outside, is not farming in the normal sense at all? This is an industry. The fact that they happen to be working on land is irrelevant to the fact that it is really an industry and these people are employees in the normal sense of industrial employees.

I want to suggest to the hon. Minister that if he wants to resolve this, in view of the practicalities of the legislation, you just change it so that nurseries come under the minimum wage, plain, pure and simple, whether they work in the fertilizer end of it, or inside, outside, or where.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, one year ago I asked the hon. Minister if he had undertaken any studies as to the effects of overtime and the creation of employment. Has the hon. Minister anything to report? I notice in my own community that Chrysler, rather than go into actual overtime, now are setting up another shift and are going to employ 1,000 extra people. That is a real substantial advantage to the community.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I think the hon. member was here during an earlier debate with the hon. member from one of the Essex ridings. This has to do with the demand for skilled labour and the fact is that there is a shortage of skilled labour. Now in certain industries, and particularly with respect to certain employers, they prefer to do their own training. At the same time, they cannot train fast enough and they look for qualified people. This is all part of the rate of employment factor that exists in this province today. We are enjoying a very high degree of prosperity which reflects directly into the area of qualified people for employment. We are down to almost a rock-bottom position and this is what gives rise to a consideration of bringing in immigrants, new Canadians, to our country to help solve this shortage in a quick way. Not solve it entirely, but partially, because the training process is one that takes time.

This is part of this overall picture and it is a pretty major one.

Mr. Newman: Well, Mr. Chairman, I understand that quite well. My actual question is were overtime not allowed, what substantial effect could that have on the overall employment picture? Would it increase employment?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Studies are being conducted on these points that you raise. As a matter of fact, I would think we will be publishing them. We have started to publish, now that we have certain of these matters underway during the past year or year and a half in my department. These will be published when they are completed.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, of the hon. Minister, are you taking these for specific industries or just an overall picture of the effects of overtime?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: We are doing a broad sampling: It has to be done by sampling and study. We are doing it by industry and, in some cases, by districts.

Mr. Newman: Thank you, Mr. Minister.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Chairman, I would like to bring before the hon. Minister, the problem of the employer who avoids the minimum wage law simply because his business year happens to be in a certain season. The best way I can show you this is by a letter I received from a worker.

Incidentally, this letter was written on March 4 of this year and the expectation was they would work until March 15. It says this:

We have worked from September 14—that would be 1964:

—until December 23 and then from January 4 until the end of next week.

That means March 15.

After we had worked 16 weeks and we still got 80 cents an hour, we wrote to The Department of Labour and they wrote back and said they had looked into it, but because we had not worked 16 weeks in one calendar year they could do nothing.

I believe that is the law, that the 16 weeks must be in one calendar year. Is that correct?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes, I am instructed that is correct. There is a certain minimum which does apply. You are talking of what industry?

Mr. Trotter: This would be a seasonal industry. I do not want to say who is writing.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Food processing?

Mr. Trotter: Yes, food processing.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, it would apply there.

Mr. Trotter: Yes. Here is the trouble, whether it be food processing or some particular industry where they could begin work, let us say, in September and go over into the next part of the year, just as you have here. They are able to avoid the minimum wage law. I know that you can live a lot more cheaply in smaller towns than you can in the large cities, but 80 cents an hour in any town in Ontario is far too low.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I agree.

Mr. Trotter: I am glad that the hon. Minister has agreed and I wish that they would take into consideration this problem of an employer making a good profit and being able to avoid the law, simply because of the seasonal business. It must apply in a number of businesses, and I am asking the department and the hon. Minister to look into this to see if we cannot have a proper amendment at the next sitting of this House.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The point you raise is one which interests me personally. If you would care to talk to me privately—I can understand your reluctance to reading the correspondence into Hansard—I would be pleased to look into that particular matter with a view to bringing it into line, seeing that there is an advantage being taken.

Mr. Trotter: Fine. Thank you, sir.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, with regard to vote 904, I would like to raise a couple of matters relating to the orders under The Minimum Wage Act.

First of all, Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest that here is an instance that proves the necessity of some kind of committee of this House comparable to the committee in Great Britain which, I think, is called the select committee on statutory instruments—a committee that reviews the exercise of delegated legislative power.

The Minimum Wage Act of this province enacted by this Legislature does little more than say that another body has power to make laws relating to minimum wages. It has little more than that in it. It has provisions with respect to penalties, but so far as the substance of provisions of the law are concerned, all it says is that somebody else has the power to make laws.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: There is no secrecy; the industry and labour board is the instrument through which the legislation is applied.

Mr. Bryden: Yes, it is the body that has the power to make laws.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That is right.

Mr. Bryden: We have delegated to that body the power to make laws. I am not objecting to that in principle, but I think this case brings home better than any other, or should bring home to this House, the realization of what we are doing. It is quite necessary to delegate the power, but it is not so necessary to delegate it and then let it go forever so that we never have any control over it. I would suggest that in legislative powers that we delegate to other bodies, we should have a power to review. It is up to us to retain that power, but in view of the importance of minimum wage orders—I mention the point in relation to them—they really bring home the validity of the point.

Here is a great body of labour legislation in this province, enacted by perfectly reputable and competent body—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: You ought to see the list in Quebec.

Mr. Bryden: If it is anything like their order No. 4 of the old days it would be about half of our statutes and then they had a whole lot of other orders as well. But the point is that it is an important law and I think that after it is passed, or while it is in the process of being passed by the industry and labour board, it should be reviewed by a committee of this House to consider whether it carries out the intentions of the Legislature.

This should be applicable with regard to minimum wage orders in all regulations issued under statutory authority. As I say, I think the minimum wage orders really bring the point home, because they are extremely important laws. We have just delegated our authority, given it away without any strings attached, and we have no control over the situation.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Oh, no, we have not! I could not agree with that. Let me tell you a little bit about it.

This has been one of the vehicles for educating small businessmen in many ways, right across this province. I tell you that! It gets into good bookkeeping methods and ways of doing business and so on. This minimum wage legislation has made a very worthwhile contribution to the business life, and the health of our business life, across this province.

Now, as for the workers, I think I should report to the House that we are averaging just a shade under $30,000 a month in collections on behalf of employees who have been bilked in $2, $3, $4 items by their employers.

Mr. MacDonald: A lot of bilking.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes, I agree; but by the same token this is a very useful instrument, and I tell you that the bulk, the most, the vast preponderance of our employers—I will not say they are innocent, that is not the word—but it is largely ignorance of the law, if I can put it that way, and having been corrected the vast preponderance of them, the records show, fall into line and proceed in the way that this House hopes and expects them to.

This collection of arrears is a very worthwhile thing, because smaller amounts of dollars mean a lot to some people.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman; everything the hon. Minister said is very interesting and informative, but it has absolutely nothing to do with the point I was trying to make, which is that we have delegated legislative authority to a board; and I think we should reserve to ourselves, having failed to do it, we should now take steps to reserve to ourselves the right to review what they do.

I quite agree that they have done excellent work in educating employers. They have done a good job, certainly in the last year or two, in trying to enforce these orders. I think that is all good, they are to be commended for it. But I still think that the principle I have made is important.

There is one reason why I think it is important. To stress why I think it is important, I would like to suggest that good as the orders may be, there are some quite serious defects in them. Now if we had a bill before us with points in it that we thought needed improving, we would be able to talk about them in this House. But of course these orders go through, they become law and they are never discussed in public while they go through the legislative mill. They simply are dealt with by a board and then are issued.

We establish a minimum wage, essentially, of $1 an hour. I think that is inadequate, but that is a different matter. I am sure the board was acting under government policy and not in its own discretion there. But then we immediately leave loopholes where various people can get through so they do not have to pay the $1 an hour. I think this is a bad principle. I do not think it should be done.

This is the only place I can raise the matter. We do not have any bill before us and never will have; but I would refer the hon. Minister and the board to clause (c) subsection 3 of section 3 which provides for seasonal workers engaged in plants processing perishable food or vegetables and employed to work in the processing of perishable food or vegetables for not more than 16 weeks in a calendar year the minimum wage can be 80 cents. I would say that people that worked that short time should be paid more, if anything, than the basic rate; but certainly not less. So it is a minimum wage of $1, except that it is not for people who happen to be working in certain classes of fruit and vegetable canning plants or for certain periods of time.

Then we go over to another one, to section 5, which provides that for learners, so-called learners, the minimum wage may be reduced.

Now what conceivable justification is there for that? The minimum wage is the basic rock-bottom wage that is payable to a person with no skill. On what theoretical justification can the board propose that a lower rate should be paid to people who, on their description, are learning to have no skill? You do not have to learn anything to have the rock-bottom job requiring no skill and the jobs that are covered by The Minimum Wage Act have no skill, or such a small amount that it would not take more than a few hours to learn them.

There should be no learning rate. This is just a loophole through which employers can escape with respect to 20 per cent of their staff. So again, we have a minimum wage that is not a minimum wage. It is a minimum wage for 80 per cent of the staff, but for 20 per cent it can be less.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, there never was any secret about the fruit pickers situation.

Mr. Bryden: I have not said there was any secret about anything.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I will give you an example of where there should be an allowance at the other end of the line, and that has to do with handicapped workers.

Mr. Bryden: I am sorry, I did not quite catch what you said.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I said I could give you an illustration of a case where I think there must always be an arrangement available, and that has to do with providing employment for handicapped persons.

Mr. Bryden: Well, I am not talking about handicapped workers. At the moment I cannot put my finger on the place in the order where they are referred to; if they are that is another matter. I am talking about certain exceptions from the basic provisions of the order which affect substantial numbers of people and for which there can be no conceivable justification.

The exception with respect to so-called learners can affect 20 per cent of the employer's payroll; and if he has less than five employees it can affect more than 20 per cent. So this is a significant loophole in the order. I certainly do not suggest there is anything secret about it; of course it is in a published order. It is quite public, but it is quite wrong. That is why I think it is regrettable that we cannot review some of these matters in the House before they become law.

Then, Mr. Chairman, I would also refer to what I think—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: On just this point, I think I might refresh the hon. member's memory of many discussions that we had when minimum wages were first introduced in the sense that we are discussing them in this province. One of the factors that it was essential that we keep in mind was the state of the minimum wage orders and law in our neighbouring state, the province of Quebec, because of the competitive aspect. Industries that are competitive on a provincial basis, and the canning industry is certainly one of those, where due to climate and growing conditions and with overnight transportation the crop from here could be taken overnight into Quebec and canned there and we would lose the canning industry.

Mr. Bryden: Personally, I think an industry that is based on sweatshop wages serves no useful purpose and if the canning industry cannot pay $1 an hour then I do not think they should bother trying to can vegetables; let somebody else do it who is more efficient. There is no justification at all for an 80 cent minimum for employees in the canning industry.

There is even less justification for the argument the hon. Minister was making for this great loophole whereby 20 per cent or up to that number can be treated as learners. There is still less for the other huge loophole in the regulations, and that is under section 8, subsection 1 that provides that where an employer is paying his workers on a piecework basis he only has to pay the minimum prescribed by the law to four-fifths of them. You might just as well say he can thumb his nose at the law.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I would not go quite that far.

Mr. Bryden: Well, you might as well, because this makes—the most effective enforcement of this type of legislation is through complaints that come from employees. I am sure that you catch more infractions that way than almost any other way. It is impossible for an employee in this situation to know whether or not the law is being violated. It is absolutely impossible.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I might say on that particular item, I remember this being discussed when it was brought into effect. Our inspectors look at those piecework operations and the payroll and the books very carefully.

Mr. Bryden: I am glad—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: They may not get them all, but if you look at the increase in complement, I think it is 13 extra inspectors—I thought the hon. member would be happy about that because he likes inspectors and I have 13 more in this branch just to do what the hon. member is talking about.

Mr. Bryden: For years I have urged the hon. Minister to get more inspectors. I urged his predecessors, too. The urges did not seem to have any effect on them. Whether they have had any effect on this Minister I do not know, but at any rate he is getting more inspectors, and I think that is satisfactory. I think it is most desirable that there should be regular inspections. I am glad to know that his inspectors are paying particular attention to these piecework houses, because it certainly is true that there is no possibility of an employee making a complaint. An employee cannot possibly know whether or not the law is being complied with. That employee may be getting less than a dollar an hour, but she—and I use the word “she” advisedly, because it is mainly in places employing women—she does not know whether 80 per cent of her fellow employees are getting a dollar an hour or not. And unless less than 80 per cent are getting it, then there is no violation of the law.

At any rate, apart from the enforcement difficulty that this curious provision provides, I would suggest again to the hon. Minister that there is no excuse for it. If employers want to pay people on a piecework basis, that is their business, but not to the extent that they pay them less than we consider to be a desirable minimum wage. Our public policy now says the minimum wage should be $1 an hour. No person on piecework, unless a person under an apprenticeship agreement or something like that, should—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Or a learner?

Mr. Bryden: Well, not the learner as you talk about him in these orders. If he is under a proper apprenticeship agreement it is a different matter, but not somebody who is learning to be an unskilled worker.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I think we are both talking about the same thing, but there are areas in these on-the-job training situations.

Mr. Bryden: I quite agree with that, but leaving aside those special cases, why should a person get less than $1 an hour just because the employer has seen fit to put in a piecework system? Let him guarantee a dollar under his piecework system, and then if the employee earns more, all right, that is fine, that is his business. But he certainly should not be permitted to pay less.

One final point I would like to make with regard to these orders, Mr. Chairman, relates to the manner in which information about them is posted. As I understand it, the orders are printed exactly as they have been enacted by the board, and must, in that form, be posted on the premises to which they apply. In fact, it is stated on page 3, I guess it is, “These orders must be posted where they can be easily read by the employees.”

Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the hon. Minister that it is impossible for these orders to be easily read. They are extremely difficult to comprehend. I would just like to give the House a sample, one at random. I do not think it is any worse than the general drafting, but here is one. We can see how easily they can comprehend it.

Every employer may, during the first four-month period of employment of an employee other than an employee in the hotel and restaurant business, who is employed by that employer as a learner and is not paid on a piecework basis, pay to that employee a minimum hourly rate of wages of not more than ten cents less than the minimum hourly rate of wages prescribed in section 3. Every employer may, during the first one month period of employment of an employee:

(a) Who is employed by that employer as a learner in the hotel and restaurant business.

(b) Who is a student other than a student to whom clause (a) of subsection 3 of section 3 applies pay to that employee a minimum hourly rate of wages of not more than ten cents less than the minimum hourly rate of wages prescribed in section 3.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. member lost the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions (Mr. Crossman) half way through it.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The only thing I can say about that notice is that it obviously indicates the high degree of intelligence of the people of this province to be able to understand it.

Mr. Bryden: There are undoubtedly many people in this province with a high degree of intelligence—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I will tell the hon. member what I will do. I agree with the hon. member, I think it could be simplified and made more direct, and I will have a look at those matters myself with a view to making them more understandable for him.

Mr. Bryden: I can see that at this time of night the hon. Minister cannot take it. If I might just make a suggestion to him on this point that he might consider, it could be that the notice that is posted could be a summary of the main provisions rather than an actual reproduction of the regulations. I realize when you are drafting a document that has to stand up in court you have to be careful about your words. But perhaps with employees in shops and offices and so on it could be simplified without being misleading.

Mr. MacDonald: Leave that for the lawyers—

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to raise a question with the hon. Minister. The hon. Minister recalls the UAW strike at Chrysler's was almost over and they almost had a settlement. One of the issues holding up settlement was the overtime issue. I understand that they wrote to the department and asked for an interpretation of the overtime section of the Act. The answer they got back was that the labour board could not take the position of giving an interpretation of the legislation because it was an administrative body. This left the union in a state of not knowing what interpretation they could put on it before the courts, or what they could get out of the company.

So they set out in this press release the wording of the Act. The Act states that working hours of an employee in an industrial undertaking must not exceed eight in a day or 48 in a week. The industry and labour board may grant permits authorizing companies to work 100 hours of overtime a year, but this does not preclude an employee from refusing to work the overtime.

Now, there were two questions that I think were really bothering the UAW, and, of course, it bothers most of the industries which have an overtime problem and they are trying to do away with it. Could the hon. Minister interpret the Act by telling the House as to whether they can crowd the 48 hours on a week basis into less than the six days, or must it be confined to eight hours per day?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: In the first instance, in a situation such as the one the hon. member mentioned, such as Chrysler, I would assume that the very experienced labour organization, namely, the united automobile workers, and the management, which is also experienced, and both have worked with each other closely over many years, they would be able to work out something that would meet the needs of both the plant operation and of the principles of the labour union. I think that has come about. My information is that they have negotiated together and they are both entirely happy with it and there will be no overtime against any individual's wishes.

This is my understanding of it. I think this is a healthy type of situation for the two parties to bargain out together.

Mr. Gisborn: I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that they worked it out, because they brought the strike to an end and this was the last issue they had to thrash out. But this does not answer my question: Can the hon. Minister interpret his own Act in regard to the—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: We do not interpret it against a hypothetical situation.

Mr. Gisborn: The Act states:

The working hours of an employee in an industrial undertaking must not exceed eight in a day or 48 in a week. The industry and labour board may grant permits authorizing companies to work 100 hours of overtime a year, but this does not preclude an employee from refusing to work the overtime.

Now the question I asked—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It is just as the hon. member read it; just as he read it.

Mr. Gisborn: But it cannot be eight in the day or over—and that is 48 in the six days. They cannot crowd the 48 hours into five days.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Just as the hon. member read it; his interpretation is straight English. Let us be realistic about this. In these matters where you get into a tight situation, there are certain areas that might have the appearance of being in violation of the Act.

On the other hand, the labour leaders in charge of the union say: "We think it is fair, having in mind the circumstances, and our men want the overtime"—which is a major factor, too, which is not always disclosed.—"But in the circumstances we think this is all right and we want to bargain it out on this basis and we want to tell the department that we are satisfied to handle it ourselves."

I do not think that this is the place for me to intervene, and this is about the situation. On the other hand, there have been cases where the union worked out a situation with a company, but individual members of the union objected and the union came to me and was embarrassed and said: "Here we made a deal with the company, but our members will not go along with us. They are objecting."

These are matters that I come across from time to time, and the example that I have just given is a true case.

Mr. Gisborn: I do not know how anyone else can interpret that Act when the hon. Minister does not know what it means himself.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Now, look. There has been a nice debate tonight; let us not bring personalities into it, because you know that when you have no sound argument one invariably turns to personalities.

Mr. C. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Chairman, I have watched the hon. Minister of Labour operate since 9.30 this morning; that makes about 13½ hours. Being a patient man, I have spent all that time listening, but I would like to ask one question pertaining to the summer resort areas' amusement parks. They do not come under this minimum wage of $1, and since they do not, when does the hon. Minister expect to bring them into line?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I think we discussed this a little earlier in the evening. I think the hon. member is talking about tourist operations and minimum wage—

Mr. Bukator: In amusement parks, yes.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes, this was discussed, but here is what I said: The minimum wage law came into effect on July 1, 1964 and at that point in 1964, the summer tourist operators and summer hotel operators had already made their contractual arrangements for the season and, indeed, many of the employees were already on the job. So for last year that industry was exempted. It is now covered for the coming year in ample time so that the brochures and advertising material soliciting applications for student employment and that sort of thing were able to take note of the legal conditions.

Vote 904 agreed to.

Vote 905 agreed to.

On vote 906:

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, I know at first hand that the hon. Minister has been very patient and I know the positive steps that his department has made in industrial safety so far as municipalities are concerned. But there are a lot of gaps. For instance, in this morning's Globe and Mail there appeared in the first paragraph of a story headed: "Man Killed in Explosion, Firm Fined"—the words "a frightening violation of The Industrial Safety Act."

In vote 906 the hon. Minister is asking the House for $2,050,000 and my colleague, the hon. member for Etobicoke, for whom I am pinch-hitting, put on record in Hansard, I think very ably, the position of this party, insofar as safety in labour in this province is concerned and he said, and I quote from Hansard of March 25, pages 1656 and 1657:

The labour safety council of Ontario, reporting in January of this year, recommended plant safety committees.

Earlier in the debate the hon. Minister stated that the safety councils could not act on their own volition. This is a high level of approach to sort out the area for more concentrated vigilance in this field.

I refer again to the words of the hon. member for Etobicoke—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Just so that we will be clear—I did not understand what the hon. member meant—did he say that I said that someone said that the labour safety council or safety association could not act on its own volition?

Mr. Sargent: That is the question I put to the hon. Minister and he said that they did not have the power to act themselves, they could act only with the Minister's permission.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The hon. member does not mean the safety association—

Mr. Sargent: I am sorry. I am going back to the labour safety council in conciliation—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: They deal with matters I refer to them.

Mr. Sargent: We still must establish the point that the labour safety council in the conciliation slot was given. The hon. Minister does not seem to think that this is important—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Oh, no. The labour safety council is an advisory body. It is not to be confused with any of the safety associations, the labour safety inspection branch of the department or anything else.

Mr. Sargent: I agree. Mr. hon. colleague goes on to say:

—through which management and labour would jointly direct their efforts for the promotion of safety.

That is, within the organization. I continue:

There is no question but that labour has a vested interest in plant safety in addition to management; it is the workman who suffers most in an industrial accident.

If the hon. Minister of Labour was truly interested in improving the standard of safety legislation in this province, then it would seem that he would long ago have taken into account this recommendation and provided a vehicle whereby, in any particular plant, both management and labour would have an opportunity to direct requests or complaints to the inspectors involved.

However, Mr. Chairman, our submission is that if the hon. Minister is truly worried about the safety of the citizens of Ontario, one would think that the fines and penalties levied would be so severe that an offending employer would be dealt with as sternly as is the drinking driver in the criminal court.

I pose the question, Mr. Chairman: How often has the hon. Minister of Labour called for jail terms for offences under the safety laws? In that regard, Mr. Chairman, there are many who feel that those who are charged with the enforcement of safety regulations and laws, as well as many magistrates, look for reasons not to prosecute. And, further, these people give one the impression that they think, once the accident has happened, the matter is just left to die, often along with the victim.

If the hon. Minister wished to do something really constructive, and he has done a lot, I give him full marks, he might have given some thought to giving safety a more vital factor in Ontario and in this small way he could contribute to generating a better relationship between labour and management, which in itself can only be beneficial.

Now for this report in this morning's Globe and Mail.

A fatal explosion at Canada Packers Ltd. on January 13 resulted from—and I underline this, quoting:

—a frightening violation of The Industrial Safety Act—

the vote we are now on:

—Magistrate C. W. Guest said yesterday as he fined the company $1,000 and costs.

The firm pleaded guilty to a breach of the Act and was given two weeks to pay the fine.

This is Canada Packers we are talking about. Two weeks they get to pay the fine.

The magistrate said there was no way in which the violation could be condoned.

Going along and telling of the mechanics of the accident, it is a clear case of sloppy operation and negligence along the line and in the summary:

At a coroner's inquest last month Donald Barker, industrial safety inspector for The Department of Labour, said the company had violated The Industrial Safety Act in several ways.

He went on to tell how it failed to give protection to this man who lost his life and the other man who is now near death in the hospital.

The point I am making, Mr. Chairman, the stand of this party is that there is not enough consciousness on behalf of the leaders of industry of the need for safety. They get a $1,000 fine, and now we read in tonight's paper it has been jacked to a $2,000 fine, and I submit that fines and penalties levied like this should be so severe that an offending employer would be—going back to my hon. colleague from Etobicoke—as firmly dealt with as a drinking driver in a criminal court, with jail terms as part of the penalty. To draw a parallel, a man convicted of manslaughter by drunk driving may get five years in jail; but a big enterprise like Canada Packers can be lax and sloppy and evade the laws and save money and they get a tip of the hat from the judge. Where he gets his penalty guidance I do not know; do you give it to him? No one seems to know.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: You do not give me a chance to answer. I am sitting here waiting to answer.

Mr. Sargent: But this is so serious, that men lose their lives and a firm is fined $2,000. The bonding company pays the fine and they go merrily along their way—well, they may get caught again later.

Granted, I say, great strides have been made by the government in appointing safety inspectors across the province, but the courts should be aware, Mr. Chairman, of the need to pinpoint and focus attention by heavy fines and jail terms.

I would hope that the department and the hon. Minister would agree that the Act be amended, as I asked before, to permit the labour safety council to act without permission of the Minister, on its own volition. I would like to ask the hon. Minister why this cannot come about.

Mr. L. Letherby (Simcoe East): He will tell you right now.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: In the first place, you must understand that some of us, including the Minister himself, are very much concerned when these accidents take place. This is the kind of thing that, when you pick up the paper before you go to sleep at night, sometimes makes you feel as though you have been stabbed in the back yourself.

I put it to you this way, because this is the way anybody, who is sincere in his work and is connected with safety, feels. Whether it be in highway safety, or industrial safety, or indeed with respect to safety in the home, these matters are of vital concern to us.

Now, as far as industrial safety is concerned, there is about—I think I am close to right on this, I have not got the figures in front of me—but a figure of about $4 million in the budget for the safety associations, which comes out of the assessment against the employers and which is spent in safety educational programmes through the safety associations.

Now, whether or not a big company, as you I think somewhat lightly referred to Canada Packers, is always negligent in its operations, I just cannot accept that and I do not.

Mr. Sargent: I did not say always.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, I know, but it was a pretty fast reference—

Mr. Sargent: Oh, come on now, a man lost his life.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, that was a pretty fast reference in what you said now and I just want you to stay with it. I cannot accept that as a steady diet.

This man died. Our inspectors followed it up, the enforcement branch. The departmental solicitor prosecuted the case. I think he is here sitting under the gallery. The company was convicted on two counts and fined $1,000 each, which is $2,000.

Regardless of what the punitive penalty provisions of the statute are, the department responsible for the Act cannot be held responsible for the penalties awarded on a conviction by a court. That is in the hands of the magistrate or the judge—this is a matter which gives me concern, but it is none of my business.

If there is a flagrant aspect to a violation and the evidence indicates that type of conduct, then the prosecutor would draw it to the attention of the magistrate or the court and ask that a heavy penalty be awarded.

Now, I assume that the hon. member for Grey North is familiar with the recent amendments to The Trench Excavators Act and The Construction Safety Act, because you will understand there in the detail just how we have attempted to deal with the question of corporations. It is a very difficult matter to get around because you cannot put a company in jail, but I am sure you will agree with me that what we have attempted to do will go a long way to meeting the points that you have raised.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, I think my hon. colleague has a point that perhaps the hon. Minister could explain a little further. I do not think in mentioning Canada Packers he was singling out any particular industry, he was talking about the same treatment for big people as for little people. And he expresses, I think, a very valid concern that since—and I was not aware of this until the hon. Minister gave his answer—that since apparently these prosecutions are handled by the hon. Minister's own solicitors they should be anxious to bring it as forcefully as they can before the particular magistrate who is dealing with the charge.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: You are not suggesting that we do not, are you?

Mr. Singer: I am not suggesting that you do not, but I am suggesting that perhaps—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, I am suggesting that you do not know.

Mr. Singer: I am suggesting that the hon. Minister could whisper very loudly into the ear of his departmental solicitor that when these occasions arise, that they do their utmost—as I am sure they do, but in case they do not—that the hon. Minister whisper loudly into their ears, that they do their utmost to draw to the attention of the magistrate the seriousness of this sort of thing. I think with that, that over a period of time, and I hope it does not take too long if proper representations are made as fully as possible to the magistrate, both when big corporations are before the courts or when individuals are before the courts, the magistrates will become increasingly aware and levy penalties in accordance with the seriousness of the offence.

There is another point which comes under this vote, the question of all these inspections that are done by the inspection safety branch and the industrial safety branch and so on; and the task or the burden that is put on the shoulders of the municipalities. Now, this is a point that has been talked about many times in this House since these bills were first introduced. These statutes have become a part of the law over what, the past three or four years? I would think that is about the length of time.

It is a very serious problem in so many cases to have a municipality properly administer the various Acts that they are charged with administering, by local inspectors. Some municipalities just have not the financial resources to do it properly and in some municipalities you get inspectors inspecting their own superiors and it makes it very difficult for a local inspector, a municipal inspector, to go around and inspect the man who hired him and the man to whom he is really responsible, even though the statute says he is not responsible to him.

This point could be argued about at very great length, but it is certainly obvious, as you read about these horrible tragedies that take place from time to time, that one of the serious deficiencies that we are still suffering is the lack of adequate inspection in so many cases when the inspection is the main responsibility of municipalities. As I say, this matter has been raised for several years now, and rather than taking any concrete steps to correct it, we seem to be establishing this more and more as an integral part of the method of enforcing these various statutes. I think each year as it goes on, the municipalities, probably through no fault of their own, are less and less able to cope with it and serious tragedies result because the enforcement of all these statutes—

Mr. W. D. McKeough (Kent West): Nonsense.

Mr. Singer: It is not nonsense at all. The hon. member would know this if he wants to read the whole history of accidents, and there are hundreds of them a year. The biggest failure is the lack of adequate inspection on the part of municipally appointed and municipally controlled inspectors. The hon. member can say "nonsense" from today till next year.

Mr. McKeough: I said nonsense when the hon. member said that each year the municipalities are getting in a worse position to handle this.

Mr. Singer: Well, they are. I say they are and I will tell the hon. member why I say they are. I say they are because they go through the motions—well, they start off trying to do it to the best of their ability. There is no responsibility coming from here to increase their efficiency. They recognize there is no more money coming from here and they recognize there—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I must correct the hon. member—I think there is the fallacy—when he said that they come to the point or recognize that there is no more money coming. That is the point. These inspectors on construction safety are tied to new construction, which is tied to increased assessment, which leads to increased taxes. That is the very point.

Mr. Singer: That is fine.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It is fine to the point that increased assessment in every municipality may be the source of relief for most of their present trouble.

Mr. Singer: You can increase assessment in any one of these—what are there, 972 municipalities—and maybe in 150 of them does the increased assessment really mean enough to enable the municipalities to go out and do their job properly. In addition to that, you have the whole field of construction that does not produce increased assessment—highway construction, all the governmental construction that goes on. It does not produce a penny of increased assessment, so the hon. Minister's argument at that point defeats itself. The tragedies at the Hogg's Hollow bridge were talked about earlier tonight. There is no increased assessment from that.

The problem is that these municipalities are just unable to do this job properly, and the proper inspection should, and must, come from the provincial government.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, while we are dealing with this Construction Safety Act, may I inform the hon. Minister that back in 1963 the Lambton county council adopted a resolution asking for financial assistance to pay for the safety inspector. Back on February 27, 1964, the city of Sarnia asked for similar financial assistance. And back on February 8, 1965, the city council of the city of Windsor asked for financial assistance to pay for—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: May I say, Mr. Chairman, that there are many more than that. This has developed into Ontario's favourite form of municipal relaxation—the resolution by chain letter. We even have raffles in the office as to how many copies of the Sarnia resolution we get from northern Ontario each day.

But to get very serious about it, this is carried on by way of an exchange of the resolution. You support my resolution on this point, and we will support yours on another.

Mr. Singer: That is a real slander list.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: This is what you used to do. Do you not remember?

Mr. Singer: I think your colleagues should circulate that suggestion to all the municipalities.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: As to subsidizing this operation, I cannot see it at the moment, and I will be quite frank with you. I cannot see it at all, because the increased assessment that comes from the construction leads to tax revenues, the tax revenues lie on their hands, and I think this is a very proper function.

Now reference was made about highways. I disagree with the hon. member when he says that new highways do not increase assessment to local municipalities, because they do. But as to the inspection of projects—and I think I can say this with some assurance in the absence of the hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton)—in future The Department of Highways will not look to construction safety inspection from any adjacent municipality.

Mr. Singer: When did that start?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I said I think we can say that with some assurance.

Mr. Singer: It is about to happen?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: About to happen, yes.

Mr. Singer: Well, that is good, that is an improvement, and I compliment the Ministry for that because I gather it is not this hon. Minister, it is the hon. Minister of Highways.

The trench excavators Act is a perfect example of this, and I remember several years ago talking about this. You get a local inspector who has to go out and inspect the job being done by the municipal engineer, who is his boss. I cannot think of a more anomalous position in which to place a local employee than to go out and report on his boss, even though the statute says he should do it. Here is the man who hires him and puts him into the job and he goes out to say, "You had better do your job." It is as though you had your deputy following you around and charged under a statute with reporting your misdeeds, if you have any. It just does not work, and you know it does not work. It cannot work under that set-up. You translate that through all the other Acts where you have local inspectors inspecting their superiors and the system just does not make sense.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word or two in support of what the hon. member for Downsview has said. This is a matter that many of us have raised many times in this House, at least from the time when The Construction Safety Act was introduced in this House. We have not, in recent years, had the full text of The Trench Excavators' Protection Act before us, and I am not sure that the principle applies as strongly with regard to that. At least, I think perhaps a stronger case can be made for municipal inspection under The Trench Excavators' Protection Act than under the Construction Safety Act. Certainly the McAndrew commission seems to feel that municipal inspection under The Trench Excavators' Protection Act was satisfactory.

I am a little disturbed, however, when I notice some of the accidents that are taking place, even in the trenching operations, and we all know that those are very dangerous operations.

Here is a coroner's report dated January 25, 1965 with regard to a fatal accident that occurred on December 15, 1964 in the city of Oshawa. Oshawa, as we know, is one of the larger cities in the province and I would say a progressive city—but here is what the coroner's jury had to say about the accidents that they were investigating:

It would appear that the municipality's responsibility in this regard was not discharged properly—

In this regard they were referring to the need to comply with certain regulations on the part of the contractor, and they pointed out that the contractor had failed on two occasions to take remedial action that he was asked to take. Then the coroner's jury said:

It would appear that the municipality's responsibility in this regard was not discharged properly, and appeared to lack proper direction. We would recommend that a municipality appoint sufficient qualified, competent safety inspectors, and that they be effectively directed regarding their duties and responsibilities—and so on.

The problem is, Mr. Chairman, that we can hope and pray and entreat for as long as we like to have municipalities appoint qualified or sufficient qualified, competent safety inspectors, as the coroner's jury in this case recommended, but often they do not do it. There is no way of making them do it, as far as I can see. It is not a matter of whether they are making something out of the assessment or not, it is a matter of whether a man is going to be killed or not and I say we argue about the dollars or the pennies and the assessment in some other context. But when human safety is at stake, let us get on with the job of inspecting.

I had thought, until I read this coroner's jury report, that perhaps municipal inspection was satisfactory with regard to The Trench Excavators' Protection Act. I am now in some doubt, and I may say that my doubts are getting stronger all the time with regard to The Construction Safety Act.

The city of Toronto is, I think, better equipped than any other city with respect to inspectors under The Construction Safety Act, and they have a grand total of four. There are four good men who do good work, but how can four men do an adequate job on all the construction activity and very heavy dangerous types of construction going on in this city? So the city of Toronto has four inspectors to enforce The Construction Safety Act. As I say, they are good men who, I believe, are doing a first-class job. But four men just cannot do the job that is required in this city. I do not know what the specific answer is, but all I say is something has to be done, because there are far too many construction accidents in the city of Toronto. Notwithstanding the great improvement in our laws and the improvement in the inspection, something is seriously lacking. Partly, it is education, no doubt; partly, it is education of the workers. But whatever it is, more people have to be put on this job to reduce the number of accidents. I believe that Toronto should increase its four inspectors, but either the province should put in some more on its own or, alternatively, it should do what it can to persuade the city to put more on. But at least we should not be arguing about who gets the benefit of the increased assessment from construction when we are dealing with construction safety. Let us get on and do the safety job and argue about who gets the benefit of the increased assessment later.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, does the department embark upon any system of training of municipal inspectors? Are they licensed? Are they examined periodically? Are they trained in any way?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: We have 16 men in this particular branch who go about the province and have meetings at convenient times with municipal representatives and show the men the precepts of inspection and labour materials, what to look for, and this kind of thing. They do not have to be engineers, but when a man shows he has an aptitude to be an inspector, our supervisors can bring him along and do something with him. This is a continuing process.

Mr. Singer: Well, that is a continuing lecture process, but surely the department, if it cannot see its way clear to doing a substantial part of the inspection by using provincial employees, at least should initiate a system whereby people who are going to be safety inspectors will have to qualify in an examination. First, the system as it is now is that the municipality, within its own wisdom, can appoint anybody as a safety inspector. Then, when he is there, you try to bring him along—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It is not quite as bad a picture as the hon. member is painting it. There is a high degree of co-operation in this between the municipalities when they go to appoint a man. Contact is made with our department and finally the municipalities say: "Here are three contenders for the position; help us choose the right one."

In other words, there is good liaison between the municipalities and the department. Then we go on and immediately take that man and try to instruct him and to raise him to a standard.

At the other end of the thing, while there is no certificate of, shall we say, competency, there is a certificate issued with respect to the man—I have known at least one occasion when, after a certain period when the municipality was liaising with the department, they were told that this man would never make an inspector—

Mr. Singer: Well, it is fine that there is something there, but I would think that it is at least as important to the welfare of the people of Ontario that a safety inspector be qualified and have a certificate of qualification as it is to have an automobile mechanic qualified and to have a certificate of qualification hanging on the wall.

If it is important enough to make sure that only trained people can work on cars, surely it is important enough to make sure that only trained people can do safety inspection?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Would you people endorse that?

Mr. Singer: Certainly, I would.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That would be helpful.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I am rather impressed by the fact that a government with 77 seats has to get endorsement from either of the Opposition parties before they are moved on something like safety.

However, if we are finished with that issue, I should like to get on to one other, sir, if I might. Earlier in the session I inquired on at least two occasions with regard to inspection that had or had not been made with Wolverine Tube plants in London. The hon. Minister has had considerable correspondence from unions in the city, including the labour council, the latest one about a week ago indicating that they had not heard from the hon. Minister as to what the situation was. In his busy life, has the hon. Minister been able to catch up with his correspondence?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I will be very frank. I have not seen that letter which the hon. member said has been referred to me. I do not think that I need tell him that I lead a reasonably busy life on days like today and others like them, but I have not seen that letter.

Mr. MacDonald: The last inspection had been some months ago—they said that the last one was in July, 1964, and another one was going to come, in the normal course of events, this spring. The hon. Minister was going to check with the regional office and when this was checked with the regional office an inspection was held. Now they have asked what was the result of that inspection and have received no reply to the letter.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The last inspection was on February 5, I am informed.

Mr. MacDonald: And what was the result?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: There were some instructions left, but I have not got them here.

Mr. MacDonald: That, I think, was the letter that the hon. Minister has not replied to.

Mr. Troy: How many accident prevention associations are there in the province to which you give grants?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I think it is seven. It is divided into industries; there is logging, lumber, pulp and paper; there is mining, and so on. Then the industrial accident prevention association, which is a large one.

While they are incorporated under letters patent, they are not private operations; they are private only in the sense that they are quasi-official and official operations.

Vote 906 agreed to.

On vote 907:

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, on vote 907.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, if you will excuse me, before we proceed with vote 907, I move that the committee rise and report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will continue with the estimates of this department and then proceed to the estimates of The Department of Reform Institutions.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

THE PLANNING ACT

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Planning Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Speaker, a short explanation of the rather important amendments contained in this bill. The first section would permit the Minister of Municipal Affairs to refer to the Ontario municipal board any part of a plan which may be in dispute without holding up consideration and approval of the remainder of the plan.

Several other sections of the bill deal with the matter of the so-called five per cent lands and a new method of treating this subject by placing more responsibility in the hands of the local municipal council; plus a further amendment authorizing expenditures out of the special five per cent lands funds—for park purposes only, without the approval of the Minister, but only with the approval of the Minister for any other purpose—for acquisition of other land.

THE MOTOR VEHICLE ACCIDENT CLAIMS ACT, 1961-1962

Hon. I. Haskett (Minister of Transport) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Motor Vehicle Accident Claims Act, 1961-1962.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. I. Haskett (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, by way of explanation, this is a bill to make two minor changes in The Motor Vehicle Accident Claims Act. The first amendment makes the registrar the agent of the operator as well as of the owner of an uninsured motor vehicle. The second is to preserve the right of recovery of an insured against any person to which an insurer becomes subrogated.

THE SCHOOLS ADMINISTRATION ACT

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Schools Administration Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS ACT

Hon. Mr. Davis moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Public Schools Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

THE SEPARATE SCHOOLS ACT

Hon. Mr. Davis moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Separate Schools Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

THE SECONDARY SCHOOLS AND BOARDS OF EDUCATION ACT

Hon. Mr. Davis moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Secondary Schools and Boards of Education Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Mr. Speaker, I would point out that these bills will all go to the committee on education. Much of the legislation is of a housekeeping nature, but I would point out two or three of the highlights of some changes in policy contained in this legislation.

One change is the allowance to the school boards to use modern data processing equipment for the maintenance of school attendance records.

One other change that I am sure will be of interest to those members who represent the northern areas of the province will be a provision whereby the parents of children in territorial districts will be reimbursed for board, lodging and certain transportation, to a maximum of $3 per day per student. This grant will be paid to the elementary school board and then passed on to the parents. It will be necessary that the student have a certificate from the principal that he was actually in attendance, and it amounts to, on this basis, $15 per week.

The other amendment in The Schools Administration Act that might be of interest is a provision to authorize the elementary school boards in the territorial districts to provide transportation for pupils who reside in the territory without municipal organization outside any school district.

Another amendment that will be of interest, I am sure, is an amendment to allow a school board to establish day classes in oral speech and lip reading to accommodate deaf children who are at least two years of age. This is a reduction in the age level because the feeling, Mr. Speaker, is that these young people are better served if they can get into a school programme at this early age.

Another change refers to the appointment of separate school inspectors and municipal inspectorates, and this programme of appointments would be carried out in phases over the next five years, and would allow separate school inspectors to be appointed on the same basis as public school inspectors in municipalities.

The other one that is, I think, rather interesting, is that in order to encourage the teaching of conservation in the schools, we will allow a board with an average daily attendance of 10,000 or more, to acquire not more than ten acres of land owned by a conservation authority, or adjoining the land of the conservation authority, so it can be, practically speaking, outside the municipality.

Boards would be allowed to construct a natural science school and conduct there a natural science programme in co-operation with the authority.

There are one or two amendments to The Separate Schools Act referring to the election of trustees and to the determination of the zone boundaries, to clarify certain situations that have arisen.

We are also establishing the right of the foster child to educational opportunities, so that children placed in foster homes for adoption continue to be wards of the children's aid society for a probationary period. It would now be possible to admit such a child, without a fee, to a public, separate or secondary school supported by the assessment of the residence of the foster parent.

We are also extending the duties of the public school consultative committees. These are presently confined to the alteration of county school areas, and their powers would be enlarged to include the alteration of townships in school areas if necessary.

There are several other amendments, Mr. Speaker, in the Act and I would expect we will deal with these in detail during the committee itself. These are the highlights of the legislation.

Hon. J. A. C. Auld (Minister of Tourism and Information): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the hon. members today to the presence in your gallery of a very special group of visitors from Japan. Accompanying Miss Hiroka Koba, who is here in her official duties as Miss Japan-Canada Friendship, are more than 15 of the leading members of the Japanese press and television. These visitors are nearing the end of a two-week tour of Canada as guests of the federal Department of Trade and Commerce, and after leaving Toronto will visit Niagara Falls, Edmonton and Vancouver before embarking for their homeland.

Miss Koba, who is a school teacher and daughter of a very famous Japanese author, will return to Japan as guest of honour at the Canadian pavilion at the Tokyo national trade fair. This evening, sir, my department will have the pleasure of entertaining our visitors at a dinner, which I feel will symbolize the goodwill which comes with international travel.

We are also pleased to welcome today, sitting beside Miss Koba, Miss Canada who is Miss Linda Douma. We of this House are indeed honoured, sir, to have these guests with us today, and I am sure that all hon. members will join with me in wishing them an extremely pleasant journey back to their homeland.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary) begs leave to present to the House the Department of Municipal Affairs annual report, 1964.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Woodbine (Mr. Bryden) asked a question of me and unfortunately I had been called to the telephone and was unable to answer it. I have the answer today, sir.

The question was: When is it expected that the transfer of Sunnybrook hospital from The Department of Veterans' Affairs to the University of Toronto will be effected? The answer is that this is actually a matter between the University of Toronto and The Department of Veterans' Affairs and, therefore, I cannot state a definite date when the transfer will be effected. However, I have found out that while the principles originally outlined as the basis for transfer still stand, very active and vigorous negotiations are now steadily going forward to work out the difficult and complicated details involved in this transfer.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, before we proceed with other more or less routine questions, I wonder if the hon. Minister plans to make any statement with regard to the quite serious allegations made today by the president of the Toronto stock exchange with respect to the hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Wardrope).

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): We are aware of the statement that he made and it is under consideration.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart). Has a licence been issued under The Used Car Dealers Act to Don Smith of Toronto, and if so to what address was such a licence issued?

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no. I am advised by the used car dealers branch that no application has been received from a Don Smith of Toronto for a licence, either as a used car dealer or as a used car salesman.

Mr. D. A. Paterson (Essex South): Mr. Speaker, does the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall) plan to contact industries with a view to encouraging them to expand in Ontario during his proposed sales trip through the United States?

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Economics and Development): Mr. Speaker, the sales missions that we send to the United States are designed to sell Canadian goods, but we also have a separate programme called investment opportunity missions which are carried out to encourage United States' firms to grant licences to Canadian companies here or to operate branch plants.

During 1963—I could cite some of these figures for the House—these missions located 173 companies which came and opened up branch plants in the province of Ontario; there were 78 licence agreements made with American companies to produce their products, not formerly manufactured in Canada. We will also have a report on 1964 operations very shortly when we present the estimates.

Perhaps an example of the activity in this investment mission field would be a brief outline. Our last opportunity mission went to Houston, Texas, and while there for two days we located two manufacturers who wanted to open up branch plants in Ontario and 31 Texas companies that were interested in distributing Canadian products in the western United States.

We anticipate that there will be eight of these missions going to various parts of the United States in 1965.

Mr. Paterson: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker?

Are these missions trying to attract specific types of industry to Ontario or just industries that are not now producing in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Randall: No, we are interested in any manufacturing facility that would like to locate in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The fifty-ninth order; House in committee of supply; Mr. W. E. Sandercock in the chair.

On vote 907:

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Chairman, in connection with vote 907, which covers the operation of the human rights commission, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the human rights commission of the United Nations is currently meeting in Geneva and arising from a report that I heard last Saturday at noon over the British Broadcasting Corporation I would like to read to the hon. members of the House some observations about human rights generally which were made by an observer, Mr. William James of the London Times.

All of us are interested in the question of human rights, not only as a local matter or even a national matter, but indeed from an international point of view. Because any human rights legislation or education will only be effective if it is achieved on a broad international scale. I quote from the remarks of Mr. James of the London Times:

The commission—and he means the human rights commission of the United Nations:

The commission is working under the banner of the United Nations' declaration of human rights, adopted by the assembly in 1948. The rights and fundamental freedoms which it declares belong to all men and include equality before the law, ownership of properties, social security and work and education. It was an ideal toward which all nations were called to work.

Interestingly, from the first the Soviet Union disagreed with the idea of international intervention in the affairs of its citizens. The point is worth thinking about. The Soviet Union was arguing, in fact, that all rights derive from the state. But the declaration arises out of the conception that there is a higher moral law, not written down, but discernible by reasons above all states. The declaration really appeals to the natural law of the ancient, stoic philosophers and to the Christian idea of the law of God implicit in the creation.

To this higher law all good states must seek to approximate. One cannot say that the history of the human rights commission is one of great practical success. The very difficulty of what it is trying to do can be gathered from some of the other business of the present meeting. Capital punishment is to be considered and an international code of ethics for the police. Freedom from arbitrary arrest is on the agenda with the treatment of political prisoners and the question of human rights in developing countries. It is extremely difficult to apply a world-wide standard in the face of an immense variety of national customs and outlooks.

And he goes on to say:

It must be admitted that for most of the time so far, the United Nations' safeguarding of human rights has stayed in the ideal world of principle without coming down to effective action. Russian luke-warmness and the breach between east and west are two of the causes.

Thousands of complaints of the denial of human rights reach the United Nations every year and all it can do is to pass them on to the commission, which notes them but takes no action. The only opportunity for challenging an offence against human rights on a large scale is a debate in the assembly like the one held on apartheid in South Africa.

It is worth noting some regional offshoots. In a highly developed part of the world like Europe it is easier to work to a common standard. There is a European court of human rights which regularly examines the complaints of individual citizens against their government. Canada too has gone farther than any other country in incorporating in its own laws the provision of the human rights declaration.

But if the declaration, for many parts of the world, must seem to set a fantastically high and unrealistic standard, it still can be seen as a strengthening of the world's conscience. No one can say that what it demands is anything more than what a man might reasonably expect of life in this world. It is a code which all national states aspiring to be considered civilized will be drawn more and more to follow.

That is the end of Mr. James' remarks.

I think that his statement provides us with the objective which we are trying to attain in Ontario. It is against those objectives that the estimates under this vote are presented.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, we have heard from the hon. Minister of Labour a sort of clarion call. Certainly it has not come from the government; it has come from the United Nations.

I know that the hon. Minister of Labour is a very erudite person; I suspect he reads a chapter or two of a book every night, including philosophy. I suspect he has read Hobbes and Rousseau and a number of others. I think he has a very keen intellect and he realizes that men are not perfect; that they have imperfections and we have to make them look upwards. Therefore, our laws, particularly in connection with human rights, should not be insipid or vacillating efforts, but something that demands the very best of humanity. I am sorry he is not in the House right now, because I suspect he does not reflect your thinking. I listened to the debate that was presented from the point of view of the government on the part of the hon. Provincial Secretary (Mr. Yaremko), who is of a background other than Anglo-Saxon. He told us that he had gone, when he was a graduate of law, to one law company—I do not know what you call them: a firm?—and they told him: "Change your name and we will accept you." Then he said he went to another, larger firm and they accepted him. As far as I am concerned, and I am sure as far as the hon. Minister is concerned, if you went to a firm and they told you the basis of accepting or not accepting you was because you had the name Rowntree, you would raise a rumpus all over the place and demand that they accept you on your qualities and your talents. You would not have secretly with hat in hand walked away and gone to another firm.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): I do not know if they would hold still for those.

Mr. Thompson: Well, perhaps the talents would not have stood up, but at least you would have known it was not on a racial or national background.

And I thought that the hon. Provincial Secretary gave a poor presentation with respect to the human rights debate that was taking place. As I say, I wish he was in the House in order to answer me. But I thought, standing there as a protagonist, as he was presenting himself, of minority groups, that he was an insipid lamb, arguing that because of numerical factors, he wandered over to another place with his tail between his legs. We in the Liberal Party do not have our heads bowed no matter what our racial background; we look on ourselves as equals. I say that the law in this Legislature should give recognition to the fact that we are all equal. When you make a law, you do not have discrimination, whether it is with respect to the accommodation of three or six. I would like to go into that a little bit. There is a great preamble with respect to The Accommodation Act—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, does not what the hon. leader of the Opposition is debating in detail come under the legislation, wherein we have ample opportunity of debating it? Are we not talking about the operation of the human rights commission, to put it into the position which outside observers attribute as being in the forefront of the operation and application of human rights in Canada? That is why I read that statement. In the whole of Canada there is no provincial jurisdiction that is further ahead than Ontario; indeed, we are the only jurisdiction which has a full-time commission operating in the interests and for the advancement of human rights.

Mr. Thompson: Of course we are talking about human rights, but also the direction that the hon. Minister's personnel will follow—the direction that is given in connection with the statute that we approve or disapprove. As I say, I started being very flattering toward the hon. Minister. I hope that he will display a new enthusiasm and vigour, not a sort of a watered-down or insipid approach, because I think the hon. Minister is as much opposed as I am to watering-down things. It is for this reason that when we get a situation of numerical aspects with respect to human rights, I hope the hon. Minister would deplore it as much as I do.

I frankly was astonished and dismayed that the hon. Minister should be bringing in legislation on accommodation where we had a number attached to the fact that you can discriminate. It is a shocking thing in view of the whole situation south of us, where a great human drama is being played, where men are fighting to be equal. Up here we are insipid, weak and vacillating, saying: "We will move it down a little bit on accommodation to three units." The only reason that we agreed to this in principle was because of the preamble, and the fact that we thought that when we got down to the strategic debates we could move that you could remove the three units to no units. And we are going to fight for that.

In connection with employment opportunities, I have, frankly, been shocked as I find that you have a great preamble again, saying that these are the virtues with respect to clearing away discrimination. But it applies only to those employers who have fewer than five employees working for them. You may say that first of all in the moral aspect, you do not leave loopholes for anyone, but when you do leave loopholes, let us have a look at what they really do. The loophole exempts from the provisions of the human rights code no fewer than 24,000 service businesses in this province—76 per cent of the service businesses in Ontario. It leaves no fewer than 41,000 employees in our service industry with no protection against discrimination.

Mr. Chairman, that loophole exempts 40,000 retail businesses in Ontario. It means that 75 per cent of our retail businesses need not concern themselves with human rights. It exposes 80,000 retail employees to the poison of discrimination.

Mr. Chairman, it exempts 35 per cent of our manufacturing industries—4,700 manufacturing industries with 11,000 employees.

In these fields, 130,000 Ontario workers are vulnerable to discrimination in employment. This loophole means that there is a wide range in which people can have discrimination without any legal attitude from the point of view of the government. The law does not touch them in any way.

Loopholes aside, in human rights we should stand in the forefront. As the hon. Minister of Labour has said, Ontario wants to be an example for the world, and he quoted from the United Nations. What does the government consider an adequate staff to maintain the equality and dignity of human beings in the province of Ontario? How large a staff does the Ontario human rights commission have? How many persons able to eradicate the great evil of prejudice in the province of Ontario? Thousands? A hundred, perhaps? Even a dozen? No, Mr. Chairman. There are three; a director and two officers, plus three clerks.

The present government allows one human rights officer for every two million citizens of this province, and is that adequate? I look for comparisons.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, might I ask the hon. leader of the Opposition a question?

Mr. Thompson: Do you mind if I finish?

I find that the Toronto humane society, which, incidentally, was organized in 1887, 75 years before we adopted our human rights code, the Toronto humane society has a staff of between 25 and 30 persons and operates with an annual budget of about $220,000. I think, Mr. Chairman, that we can be proud of the work that is done by our humane society and societies for the prevention of cruelty to animals. Our efforts as a people is honourable in this area. But can we take pride in the fact that our human rights commission operates with half the budget and a quarter of the staff of the Toronto humane society?

In my terms, the answer is plain. We cannot take pride. We can only be ashamed of our slow, small and hamstrung efforts to ensure the equality and dignity of the citizens of Ontario.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that in a very real sense, the shame belongs to us, right in this Legislature. But in even a more meaningful sense, the finger of shame must be pointed first at a tired and a cynical government of this province, a government that repeatedly and consistently, time after time, with unflagging determination, commits itself to the minimum effort. A government that knowing nothing of leadership has raised the art of followership to a degree of perfection unparalleled in the civilized world. Followership, Mr. Chairman. This government is years and years and miles and miles behind the wishes of the people of Ontario for human rights.

Two weeks ago, we saw evidence of how Ontario feels. We saw hundreds of students, businessmen, religious leaders and others, sacrifice time and comfort in their conviction for the equality of men. I suggest that these people are ashamed, and so are millions of others, at the government's demand of them. The government's commitment to human rights on their behalf amounted to two cents.

Mr. Chairman, let us do two things. First of all, let us remove the shame of exempting 76 per cent of our service industries, 35 per cent of our manufacturing industries and 75 per cent of our retail businesses from the provisions of our human rights code. Let us plug that loophole, so the world cannot look through this loophole to see the kind of government that we have today. Then let us ask the citizens to show us how important they consider this struggle. Let us ask them how much of their money they would devote to human freedom. Let us ask the religious leaders, the students, the labour leaders, the businessmen, the ordinary man in the street. Let us ask others. Let us ask the Indians.

Mr. L. Letherby (Simcoe East): Ask me, too.

Mr. Thompson: We have heard from you, my friend.

Mr. Letherby: You are just playing to the gallery, you know that—

Mr. Thompson: I want to get that in the record. I enjoy getting that from our friend from Orillia. He said a lot of this is nonsense. Are you referring to the human rights code and the dignity of man as being nonsense?

Mr. Letherby: I figure that the human rights code is being respected by this government, but you are trying to ride it a little too far.

Mr. Thompson: I am trying to ride it a little too far? I want to get that on the record. I am trying to rise and give an equality of—

Mr. Letherby: Do not start to point your finger at me. Go on with your discourse.

Mr. Thompson: You do not have any opinions on this?

Mr. Letherby: Pardon?

Mr. Thompson: You have no opinion with respect to human rights?

Mr. Letherby: I have lots of them, but they do not agree with yours.

Mr. Thompson: Pardon?

Mr. Letherby: I have opinions. They do not agree with yours.

Mr. Thompson: What are your opinions?

Mr. Letherby: You have the floor; I have not.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, I asked the hon. leader a question, but he said he would not permit any interruptions. Now he is carrying on a side debate. I am listening to what you have got left to say in this harangue that you are offering.

Mr. Thompson: May I say to the hon. Minister of Labour, that you, because you stand out in some way, are in conflict with the average rabble of your party. You have sat here for a long time. Our friend here is a red necked roughneck.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Now, nothing personal.

Mr. Letherby: And you are the biggest rabble in your party.

Mr. Thompson: I stand for people who are abused, for minorities. He stands for having the status quo and claims everyone is satisfied, no matter if they have—

Mr. Letherby: You are making the speech, I am not.

Mr. Chairman: Order, please. Order!

Mr. Thompson: You had a lot to say, my friend, and you are going to lose a lot of votes for your party.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Now let us get on with your address.

Mr. Thompson: You said that before.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary and Minister of Citizenship): Are you making the speech for votes, sir?

Mr. Thompson: No, I am not making the speech for votes. Let me just start again, because the hon. Provincial Secretary has come back. As a man—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Keep the sequence of your remarks—

Mr. Thompson: From the point of view of his philosophy, he is weak, insipid and obsequious.

Mr. Letherby: And so are you.

Mr. Thompson: He stood up in connection with the accommodation Act and I was ashamed of him; I am ashamed of his philosophy. Weakly and obsequiously he says, "Let us give time to this; let us wait a little while. We have cut it from six; we will move it to three."

But you know, we will move on in this. We voted for the principle of the bill, and I want to emphasize this as the New Democratic Party did; it voted for six units, and if people were discerning they would recognize they voted for six units. But they did not vote for three units. What that means is that the New Democratic Party believe that six units is right. But we happen to have a stronger sense of conviction.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Thompson: My friend, how twisted can you get? He suggested that you should vote against three, but you vote for six. I would suggest that they are so muddled that they do not know what they are doing in this situation. We want to see this wiped away; we want to see discrimination removed not only on the numerical value, but on an equality—one that they have completely eradicated. The hon. Provincial Secretary comes in with a kind of a plaintive whine about the fact that he went to a law firm and he was turned down because of his name, and then he went to another one and was accepted. What is he talking about? As I said to you previously, with respect—

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Chairman, on a point of personal privilege—

Mr. Thompson: —if I went to a law firm and was turned down because of my name, I would raise a holy ruckus and the matter would be fought out. I would not be submissive and obsequious—

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: You know the government that was in power at that time? The Liberal government!

Mr. Thompson: I would not be wandering around here when the government is—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Chairman, I think it is most unparliamentary for the hon. leader of the Opposition who holds the second highest position—

Some hon. members: Put your point of order!

Mr. Thompson: I did not get the point of order.

I want to say this, and I want to reiterate it. As far as I am concerned, in philosophy and siding with the crowded benches, I have never seen such a weak-kneed, such an obsequious, such an asinine approach as we had from the hon. Provincial Secretary in connection with fighting for the rights of minorities.

They came in with a whimper, telling us that at this point they might have three in an accommodation clause. I suggest to—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order pertaining to the rights of members of this House, I have a great regard for the hon. leader of the Opposition—

Some hon. members: What is the hon. Minister's point of order?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I would say, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. leader of the Opposition comes perilously close to putting himself outside of this Legislature—

Some hon. members: You will never do it!

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: —while imputing motives to the hon. Minister from Bellwoods. I do not think that the hon. leader of the Opposition is—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I do ask you, Mr. Chairman, to remind him of his duty as an hon. member of this House to other hon. members, and of his duty as the leader of the Opposition. I think he is being carried away by something that he wrote—

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, on the supposed point of order in which the hon. Minister of Labour says I am "carried away," the only thing I am being carried away with is my conscience—

An hon. member: Which way?

Mr. Thompson: —inasmuch as I am going to take a stand that you are not going to add discrimination with respect to employers and then give a loophole for others to have less than five. The hon. Provincial Secretary stood up and tried to defend the position on the housing accommodation saying that we had six before and now we have three, and boys be patient and we may move down there a little further later!

There is a great need and we are going to fight hard in connection with breaking with these numerical values which you establish in connection with discrimination.

We say that there should be no discrimination, and we are going to push for that on the principles which we followed in the accommodation bill in the House. Our point is that the preamble is good. In principle, it is good, but when you come down to the details: We reproach you on it!

We tried to make amendments in connection with the bill that came in. Both the New Democratic Party and ourselves voted for this when it was fixed units. We voted for it because in the preamble we liked it. But on the detail we did not. And then when it came in with three units, we still did not like it. But we liked the preamble and were going to try to amend the details. Similarly with respect to the employers—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I think the hon. leader of the Opposition is speaking on this bill at the wrong time; we are talking about the money to operate the commission.

Mr. Thompson: But the bill gave direction for the money to be allocated. As far as we are concerned, when the hon. Minister has a great preamble about fancy discrimination in connection with the recruitment of employees for over five who are working in an industry, we say this is wrong. You do not just satisfy the ones who are under five so that they can be free and easy and do whatever they want.

As I have mentioned, there are many of these people and they also should have legislation with respect to them. I ask the hon. Minister how he arrived at five as the point at which they could have a free attitude on their own part. How did he arrive at five?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It is the same figure as is applied by the Liberal government at Ottawa on a national scale in connection with the Canadian declaration of human rights.

Mr. Thompson: Well, let me say to the hon. Minister that I do not follow blindly anything that is done in Ottawa—

An hon. member: You might!

Mr. Thompson: I follow my conscience and the hon. Minister is giving this as justification for —

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I am just telling the hon. member that this is an arbitrary figure.

Mr. Thompson: Well, why?

It is not good enough. Does the hon. Minister mean to say that he has just done this because it is done in Ottawa by the Liberal government? Let us have more reason.

The hon. Minister is a very incisive, intelligent man and he must have had other reasons. Let us hear them.

He has no other reason?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Is the hon. leader of the Opposition through? Because when I am sure he is through—

Mr. Thompson: I asked the hon. Minister.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I do not like standing up when the hon. leader of the Opposition is standing up.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Oh, oh, oh!

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: So that there will be no misunderstanding as to where we stand in the operation of human rights legislation, I at no time, now or in the past, nor do I plan in the future, ever to measure the success of the operation of or the contribution which an agency makes by the number of its employees. That is the first thing. It is a false test to apply to anything; it has no relevance and the hon. leader of the Opposition's argument to me is fallacious. Indeed, I am prone and inclined to observe that I am amazed at the harangue on this subject which he read from his prepared notes. It is obvious that the Opposition needs more research facilities—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Now I will tell you that at the North American conference on human rights last summer in Minnesota, Ontario was held up as one of the shining examples. It has legislation that exceeds in quality similar legislation in 26 states of the United States.

Mr. Singer: But there are 50 states.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: And equal to a further number as well.

Mr. Singer: I will bet it is better than Mississippi.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It is also in excess in quality of all legislation in Canada. The hon. leader of the Opposition must have missed the point in my reference to what Mr. James of the London Times had to say on his broadcast last week, when on a world basis he said that there is no jurisdiction further ahead, and this is from an outside observer, than Canada.

But the hon. leader of the Opposition does not want to pay any attention to that. I say to him that if that is the position he wants to take, well and good. We have heard it recorded.

As for me, I do not accept the argument accepted by the hon. leader of the Opposition and I think some of his remarks leave a lot to be desired in the way in which they have been expressed, because this is not the leader of the Opposition whom I have known to date, this is somebody else speaking, it is somebody else talking.

As far as the moneys that we are asking you to consider here today are concerned, I say this to you, that we are the only jurisdiction in Canada with a full-time operation. In British Columbia the staff is zero. Men are drafted from other departments to implement and deal with human rights matters.

We could go into detail with respect to what men like Eamon Park have recommended—men who purport to be experts, men of Irish descent as well—and Mr. Park—

Mr. Thompson: Now, do not discriminate.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Oh, it is a rare compliment I am giving.

Mr. Thompson: I am a Canadian.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: A rare compliment. Your views do not coincide with the recommendations of community groups led by Mr. Eamon Park at all; they do not coincide, there is no relationship.

I put this before you squarely: I think that the progress made in this province is equal to none. I do not understand and I criticize quite openly the hon. leader of the Opposition for imputing that the recent demonstration in Toronto with respect to human rights was directed to this government and in criticism of what we have done. No such thing!

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Let me clear the record. It was directed to a situation in a state of the United States where, under no circumstances, are conditions comparable to those here.

Mr. Singer: He did not say anything like that.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: No, but I am saying this because your inferences are intended—they always are—to sort of let something roll off and over; if it catches some flies, well and good. This is your view.

Mr. Thompson: No, it is not.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, I am glad to hear it is not, because the public and Hansard will now be clear as to what you did not say by way of—

Mr. Singer: How gracious of you to clear the record.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, that is part of my job.

Mr. Singer: Clear the record of performance.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Let us refer to the operation of another Liberal government, in the province of Quebec, which bears the same banner as the hon. leader of the Opposition and waves the same flag. Quebec legislation covers only employment; it does not cover housing or public accommodation at all. I do not understand this research you have done in this matter, but I would be glad to discuss it with you privately at any time. I invited the hon. member for Etobicoke (Mr. Braithwaite), when he was appointed to be my shadow in your shadow government—

Mr. Thompson: Shadow? He is your prominent—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I invited him the minute I heard that. I telephoned him and said I was delighted with his appointment by his hon. leader. I invited and made an appointment to have him come down and go over all the matters in my department. And I extend the same invitation to you.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Chairman, I, as a member of this Legislature, do not have to sit in my place and listen to the kind of language used by the hon. leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Thompson: Did you vote against the fair accommodations bill?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: All I can say, Mr. Chairman, it is the record of this government which I support; I will read the record very succinctly again, and this is why I am on this side of the House—

Mr. A. J. Reaume (Essex North): Who wants you over here? You stay there; we do not want you.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Chairman, four years before the adoption of the United Nations declaration, the Ontario Legislature passed The Racial Discrimination Act. In 1951, it passed The Fair Employment Practices Act, the first in Canada. In 1951, it passed The Female Employees Fair Remuneration Act, the first in Canada, the first in the Commonwealth. In 1954, it passed The Fair Accommodation Practices Act, the first in Canada. The establishment of the anti-discrimination commission in 1958 was the first in Canada and is still the only one of its kind. I can see that the hon. leader of the Opposition has no interest in what is going on at this point in the House at all.

Mr. Sopha: Do not take yourself so seriously.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I take myself very seriously when he talks like that. The hon. member for Sudbury laughed when I mentioned discrimination in the field of the Canadian football league. The hon. member just sat there—

Mr. Sopha: I thought it was just blustering nonsense on your part.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Yes, it is interesting to note, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Sopha: What have you done about it?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: It is interesting to note that three days later Mr. Macaluso from Hamilton woke up to the fact, and he then asked the federal Minister of Citizenship—

Mr. Sopha: Who is he?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: He is the Liberal member for Hamilton West. I have read the record of this government in power in Ontario. Let us see what the record is of a government that is in power in Ottawa. Let us look at the civil service application form when you want to get a job in Ottawa under a Liberal government.

Question No. 19—Are you a Canadian citizen? Yes No.

Question No. 20— By birth? By naturalization? If a Canadian citizen by naturalization, please answer the questions on page 3 under citizenship.

And you turn the page and this applies only to people who are naturalized; born outside of Canada—

Mr. Sopha: Is this a statistical compilation?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: A statistical compilation, is it? This is the thing that is no longer in existence on Ontario civil service applications.

Mr. Singer: For how long? How long? You only took it out after there was a public outcry.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Citizenship to be completed if a Canadian citizen by naturalization—

Mr. Singer: How long ago did you take it out? How long ago?

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Place naturalized. Country of birth. Port of entry. Now you ask me what has that to do on an application for a job in the federal civil service? Do not give me that—

Mr. Sopha: That is unparliamentary.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The hon. member for Etobicoke asked me, in the course of my estimates, where was I when they were being stopped from coming into Canada at Niagara Falls, and elsewhere in Ontario. But the significant thing that he omitted to say, Mr. Chairman, was that it was the Liberal government that was stopping the people. They did it last week, and had to reverse themselves.

I mention this: an article from the Globe and Mail of March 13 headlined:

BILL TO CURB CABINET POWER TALKED OUT

Ottawa (C.P.). The government yesterday talked out a private bill that would remove from The Immigration Act the federal Cabinet's powers to refuse admission to Canada of persons on grounds of nationality.

That bill introduced by a private member was talked out by the Liberal government. Mr. Chairman, I will stack the record of this government of the past 20 years against any government in the world, including the Liberal government.

The hon. member referred to the fact that I mentioned two incidents in the late '30s. The reason I am a member of the Progressive-Conservative Party that forms the administration is that in the '30s, when I needed somebody, there was a Liberal government in power and it did not lift a finger.

Mr. Sopha: Well, one could typify the contribution of the hon. Minister of Labour as a pious incantation but that phrase could not adequately describe that of the hon. Provincial Secretary, which is more akin to blustering balderdash.

Mr. Singer: Is that unparliamentary?

Mr. Sopha: I am one of those who has looked with some degree of sardonic amusement on the inarticulated major premise of the hon. Provincial Secretary. Fairly summed up, it is that whenever minorities are spoken of in this province, the hon. Provincial Secretary has a sort of vested right to get up and speak about them. In other words, he holds himself out under mere pretence as chief principal spokesman of minorities in the province, and no one else's opinion is of any consequence. The hon. Minister of Reform Institutions (Mr. Grossman) used to convey that, but in recent years we hear less from him.

Whatever the view of the hon. Minister of Labour about the relevance of the remarks being made in respect of this vote, I think it is sufficient to say that we are talking about human rights. Surely the human rights commission, using the moneys that this Legislature is pleased to vote, devotes its time almost exclusively to the question of human rights. Whether that question expresses itself in the administration of the commission, or in the legislation that it motivates the Ministry to lay before this House, I do not know. All this began not with the government of Ontario, at some particular place and time that the hon. Provincial Secretary advises himself to pick out, but in the meeting between President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill in Argentina in the early days of the war, when the first expression of the rights of mankind was made by the leaders of the two warring nations against the German juggernaut and the tactics and the unprincipled activities of Adolf Hitler. That, of course, led to the universal declaration of human rights, adopted by the United Nations and eventually to the adoption of a code, of which I do not approve in its use of language and its implementation of arithmetic by the government of this province.

I think it is significant that at a moment in history when the whole of this continent is conscious of the striving of the black man in the United States, trying to rectify 100 years later the results and misadventure of the war when brother took up arms against brother, cousin against cousin, over the issue of slavery, that this government has the unmitigated gall to produce a statute before the Legislature which enshrines discrimination—not only permits it, but enshrines it. That significance is underlined when one remembers that the original statute, the one that preceded this one the name of it escapes me for the moment—the one before the 1961-62—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Anti-Discrimination Act.

Mr. Sopha: The Fair Accommodation Practices Act and the Fair Employment Practices Act. We must never lose sight of the significance that those statutes were passed by the consent of all the members of the House. They won support from every party. The declaration of principles in those statutes, contrary to what the hon. Provincial Secretary invites us and the public of Ontario to believe, are declarations of all members and all parties, and he has no vested and private and managerial interest in them at all. Nor have any of his colleagues on the government benches.

Then at the time when the black man—and really there is no comparison—is striving in the United States and sometimes sacrificing his safety, and indeed even his life, at that time, in this city, the metropolis of Ontario, in this city where one out of three of the citizens of Ontario live, clergymen of all denominations meet in a church in downtown Toronto and join together in an inter-faith service of worship. And to that end, supplemented by 2,500 to 3,500 of the citizens of this area, they joined together to make a declaration of principle. Those are the significant words, a declaration of principle. It is fair to say that the conscience of the church has been rather slow in awakening to these things. But they joined together, and they say this is what we believe about the relations of man and man. Basically, all they are saying is that notwithstanding the colour of the individual, if you cut him his blood is going to run red, no matter what part of the world he lives in.

At the very time that significant service of worship was being held downtown, this government has on the order paper a piece of legislation that permits discrimination and permits it on a mathematical formula. So, if one approaches the preamble to the statute, passed by this Legislature in 1963, by a little interpolation it would read like this:

Here is the state of human rights in this province on this the 31st day of March, 1965.

Whereas recognition of the inherent dignity and the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human race is the foundation of freedom and justice and peace in the world, except if you live—

these words are mine:

—except if you live in an apartment building where not more than three apartments are rented; except if you are employed in a business that does not employ more than five persons; and whereas it is public policy—

Mark those words, whereas it is public policy, and indeed the policy of all members of the House, public policy, not only of the members of the House, but the policy of the great mass of our fellow citizens throughout the province, that word, that phrase is all embracing;

—whereas it is public policy in Ontario that every person is free and equal in dignity and rights, without regard to race, colour, nationality, ancestry or place of origin, except, I add, if you live in an apartment building where not more than three units are rented, or except if you are employed in a business which does not have more than five employees.

I do not need to read the rest of the preamble, but it shows how destructive of the intent of this ringing declaration is the attitude of the Ministry with the hon. Provincial Secretary's exaggerated description that knows almost no limits; as he gets up in his inimitable way and beats his chest and allows large quantities of oxygen and ozone to envelop us all. I sometimes think that he would achieve better results if he beat his head for a while.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: We are on vote 907 and it is the operation of the Ontario human rights commission. We are talking about human rights and the policy of this government in regard to human rights. So, as my hon. leader aptly points out, if you want a little mathematics, the hon. Provincial Secretary would do well to look at this. We have exempted 75 per cent of our service industries from the application of this ringing declaration of principle; 35 per cent of our manufacturing industries. They can practice discrimination and 75 per cent of our retail businesses are allowed under law to indulge in discrimination.

There are a few mathematics to contemplate. I just want to call the attention of the hon. members to the concept that I have held for a good many years about our role—our Canadian role—in the light of present world conditions that deal with nationalistic urgings, and a striving of mankind in all parts of the globe for equality, and to reside in circumstances conducive to human dignity. I have always felt that our country can play an immense, and invaluable role in the relations of nations, one with another, if we project the image that we, as Canadians, are quite unlike some other peoples in the world, in that we have an honest and sincere concept of the freedom, and the equality and the necessity for the dignity of mankind.

So it ill behoves one province of this great country to appear in the light of the role of the honest broker in the world.

Peter C. Newman, I notice in recent articles in a newspaper, does not approve of the role of honest broker that we have played in the world in solving the troubled Suez situation, in the foundation of the state of Israel. He apparently does not approve of that. I do not know what he wants us to do, whether he wants us to go to war with Argentina, or some other little nation, so that we would have a positive foreign policy. But in projecting the image of our country as I see it, then we in Ontario have an obligation not to do anything through the use of arithmetic to detract one iota from that declaration in The Ontario Human Rights Act in the statutes 1961 and 1962.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, just as a minor postscript to the remarks of my leader and my hon. colleague from Sudbury, I thought I must bring it to the attention of the hon. Provincial Secretary that he has misled the House, I am sure inadvertently, but he has in fact misled the House.

I hold in my hand an application form for the Ontario civil service, which has on it as question No. 2: Are you a Canadian citizen or British subject, box "yes," or box "no." Now, the hon. Minister said that had been removed and in so saying—

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: No, Mr. Chairman, I did not—

Mr. Singer: Oh, yes, he did.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I did not say that.

Mr. Singer: He definitely did. He said it as part of an excuse for the actions of this government, and he held in his hand a federal form and he said: "This is an example of the horrible things that made me—not me, him—a Tory, and we have not got it in Ontario." We asked him when he had deleted it, and he said: "Oh, it is out."

Well, it is here, and I suggest, Mr. Chairman, since the Minister got up and made that statement—giving him the benefit of every doubt—he inadvertently misled the House, and I wish he would correct the record.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Chairman, there was no misleading on my part at all. The federal application—

Mr. Singer: No, it is the provincial one we are talking about. It is this one.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Chairman, there is nothing wrong in the question: Are you a Canadian citizen?

Mr. Singer: That is just what you made your speech about, that is what you pointed and gesticulated about, that is what made you a Tory!

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: You see, Mr. Chairman, the reason they cannot correct it in the Liberal Party is that they do not understand what it is about.

Mr. Singer: Oh, Mr. Chairman, I gave him the benefit of every doubt and now he is trying to bulldoze his way through.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The federal civil service—

Mr. Singer: Waffling again.

Mr. Thompson: Talk about the provincial!

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The federal civil service then goes on to find out whether you were a citizen by birth or by naturalization—that is the complaint.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, just to clarify: He says there is nothing wrong with this. Am I to assume from the hon. Provincial Secretary that it is important to know whether you are a Canadian citizen or a British subject? Is one superior to the other or not? Would you answer why this is in your application form?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: It is in conjunction with the public service—

An hon. member: Oh get off it!

Mr. Thompson: I am sorry, I want to get this in the record. You have made a speech on this so I want to ask you: Why have you got this on your application form?

Interjections by several hon. members.

An hon. member: It is on the wrong vote.

Another hon. member: It was not ten minutes ago, was it!

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: It is in conjunction with the—

Mr. Singer: Have the good grace to stand up and say you made a mistake.

Mr. Thompson: Under human rights you are getting up, as far as I am concerned like pale blotting paper, just wanting to absorb what your party says every time you stand up—

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Oh no, no!

Mr. Thompson: "The Progressive-Conservative Party is always right, that is why I joined it!"

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Sure!

Mr. Thompson: Now I want to ask you as a defender of human rights and as a speaker for minorities why have you got this in: "Are you a Canadian citizen or British subject or not?"

Will you answer that for us?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Is that in conjunction with—

Mr. Thompson: Will you answer it or do you want to remain silent and obsequious? Will you answer it? Will you answer why you had that or does that concur with the human rights code?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Yes, sure!

Mr. Thompson: It does!

Fine, we know your stand, my friend.

An hon. member: Perhaps the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) will tell us.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, we will be coming to that commission in due course.

Mr. Singer: The civil service commission is under his department.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It will come when the vote comes up.

Mr. Singer: The hon. Minister of Labour is the arbiter of the rules, he is always telling everyone when they are in order and out of order and when they have strayed. Would the hon. Minister of Labour not be anxious to have his hon. colleague correct the record, because his colleague said this statement was not in the form and it obviously is in the form?

An hon. member: You need Leslie Frost.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The record is quite clear as Hansard will show.

Mr. Thompson: We are not talking about Hansard, we are talking about application forms.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It is clear in the introduction of my estimate, it is clear in certain amendments to the—

Mr. Singer: How about this question?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Just be a little bit courteous.

In the light of—

Mr. Singer: I asked you a specific question. You said, "the record is clear." Now you are making your preliminary speech all over again.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Not at all. Mr. Chairman, the record is clear and it is obvious that the hon. member was not here or has not read Hansard, because in certain amending legislation which I have introduced that question is answered. It does not apply to employment in the civil service of Ontario, except insofar as The Public Service Act is concerned.

Mr. Singer: Whether it applies or not, the fact remains that the Minister, the hon. Provincial Secretary said it was not in the forms. This is a form, a current form, and it is there. The hon. Minister said it was not. I say the hon. Minister misinformed the House and I think he should correct the record. It is just as simple as that.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Chairman, the situation is perfectly clear. Both application forms asks whether the person is a Canadian citizen or British subject, but then the federal one goes on to ask—

An hon. member: Oh, come on!

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: —goes on to ask whether by naturalization or birth, and that is what I complained about in connection with the football league and am still complaining about with regard to Ottawa. I think Ottawa should change its form because I think that the Ottawa form is contrary—

Mr. Sopha: I can understand the federal government asking for this because they have a responsibility for immigration and the compilation of statistics, two separate heads of responsibility. They run the Dominion bureau of statistics. But I cannot understand why in this form, where there is no comparable responsibility, that you require the answer to the question: Are you a Canadian citizen?

Is the hon. Provincial Treasurer who runs the civil service commission, is he, and the head of the civil service commission, are they both concerned that the people who apply for employment are Canadian citizens? I know lots of people who have been here, a great many people who have been here ten or 15 years and are not yet Canadian citizens. We do not compel them to become Canadian citizens. Are they to be denied the right to a job because they are not?

I can understand them not being allowed to run for public office until they take that step of the acquisition of citizenship, but I cannot understand really, in the farthest and most strenuous exercise of my imagination, why it is a matter of concern to the provincial government, or any employer, whether a person is a citizen.

Now I can understand down in Quebec such societies as the Jean Baptiste society are concerned about the employment of French-Canadians and are concerned about speaking French in employment. They have people going around and telling employers to insist that French be spoken in their employment. I can understand those things, and they are a reflection of the strains and stresses of Confederation.

But I cannot understand why paper should be wasted for an answer to that question before employment here. Having asked the question, do the hon. Provincial Treasurer and head of the civil service commission—and really we are entitled to answers to these questions—do they discriminate in favour of those who are Canadian citizens or British subjects?

That second is a real laugh! The "Minister of Minority" ought to be concerned about that one, because you can come here in two different categories. You can come as a landed immigrant from central Europe; but you can also come here as a British subject. So you would answer in reference to that one yes, and you are not a citizen.

Is that intended to give a preference to people who come to this province who are British subjects and are not Canadian citizens? It would seem to indicate that, because we are all British subjects by virtue of The Citizenship Act, 1947—I hope my date is right, I think it is 1947; yes, 1947.

We are all British subjects but there are British subjects among us who are not Canadian citizens. So the hon. member for Downsview, in a very perspicacious way has opened up a can of worms here, and the can of worms is residing right in the lap of the hon. Minister over there, the man who gets up and raves about the Canadian football league, which after all is a matter quite trivial in its ramifications. We will not require a meeting of the security council to deal with that one. I imagine they will iron out their difficulties about what is that inside guard and they will be able to sell their tickets, you can bet your last dollar on that. Especially the last place Argos, they will sell their tickets this fall as they have in the past.

But really, if the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) was here I am sure that he would give us an answer. I know in my heart that if Leslie Frost was still Prime Minister he would have been up long ago to give an answer about this. I feel that my hon. friend from Grey South (Mr. Oliver), the dean of the House, would agree with me, that this is a matter on which we are entitled to an answer.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I thought the answer was quite apparent from what I said a moment ago, but apparently it was not.

An hon. member: Apparently not!

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I made reference to The Public Service Act and therein lies the entire point to, I think, what you must be talking about.

Mr. Sopha: What does it say?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: To be a permanent public servant of Ontario you must be a Canadian citizen.

Mr. Sopha: Or a British subject.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Or a British subject.

Mr. Sopha: Well, that is a shame.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That is what it is. I see nothing shameful about it. I think that the permanency of the civil service requires at least that kind of restriction, having in mind all of the factors that bear upon the state, and so on. I do not propose to debate many of these factors. I do not think many of the factors that were major in their nature years ago are as major now, but I think the fact still exists that the security of the state is the paramount factor which should concern all of us here.

Mr. Singer: Where is the Ontario army going to move next? That was great state security.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That is all right. You apparently do not understand the phrase security of the state. We will leave it at that. But that is the reason and it is at that point.

I would say, sir, that the right to employment of any person, if he qualifies, is unrestricted even in the areas of the civil service with the exception of that area of permanent public service. But you can be employed by the civil service without citizenship.

Mr. Chairman: Is vote 907 carried?

Mr. Singer: Oh, no, Mr. Chairman. Since we have entered this form business here, through the courtesy of the hon. Provincial Secretary, there are a couple of other interesting questions on this form. They inquire as to whether the applicant is single or married. I suppose that is logical, but then they go on, separated, divorced or widowed. Just how much snooping has to go on when these people are hired? Perhaps the hon. Provincial Treasurer has an answer for that one? Then they also want to know if there is a birth certificate. Is there some subtle inquiry in that, or is it just sort of a—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Speaking about human rights, the human rights code of Ontario covers race, colour and creed.

Mr. Singer: Not age, or marital status or reasons for marital status, or legitimacy.

Mr. Sopha: Do you have to be legitimate, too? Does there happen to be a bar sinister anywhere?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes, I assume there is.

Mr. Sopha: That is what the birth certificate is for.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It probably has to do with superannuation, completing his employment record, pension, that sort of thing.

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): Sensible thing, you see.

Mr. Singer: You had better have a look at that statement before you—

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Chairman, I would like to bring up a matter of human rights. It has been brought up on many occasions—I think about every year since I have been in this House. In fact, we just touched on it now and that is the problem of age. I think we see so many ads in the papers where a person over the age of even 35 need not apply. Now, I realize there are certain jobs that only people of a certain age can do, but also there are many other cases where discrimination, I think, is most obvious against people, especially those 50 years and over. It would do no harm at all—it would do a considerable amount of good—if we added into our human rights declaration that there should be no discrimination against age. I realize that a lot of this is education of the public, but I believe that the public has now reached a point where they are beginning to accept, with a certain amount of eagerness, that there should not be any discrimination in regard to employment when it comes to age.

The government has been approached on this matter on numerous occasions, right in this House, and it seems that every year we speak our piece and not a thing has been done. That the government see to it that this is added into our declaration is long overdue.

The second item I would like to mention regards hiring personnel and the discrimination of sex. I believe that in our declaration now, there shall be no difference in pay or hiring. When the minimum wage first came out we had a great argument over the fact that to begin with there was a discrimination between men and women. Well, I still feel that there is—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Equal pay for equal work.

Mr. Trotter: Equal pay for equal work. This is a principle that we, on this side of the House, emphasized at the time the minimum wage came out. But in this particular department, besides what is actually law, a great deal can be done in educating the public through the various publications that are put out. One of the things that comes from our background, the mores of our society, is that women have been kept in a secondary place, especially in industry. I think this has been the view of our society, and it crosses all walks of life. We are seeing a tremendous change, especially in Europe. For example, if you are in the courts in Paris, France, it is amazing the number of women that are practising as barristers before the Bar. They are able to do that because they are accepted as barristers and for the ability they have. In this country, and in this province, it is much more difficult for a woman to practise before the Bar. I am not blaming the government. I am not blaming any particular party, but I say that there is a duty on government to use what facilities they have in educating the general public to believe that women should be given greater opportunity. When we compare what the Russians are doing with the women power and what we are doing, it is obvious that a far greater percentage of the Russian women become graduate engineers, doctors and dentists. Here we have made very halting steps. In some of the European countries, and to a much lesser extent in England, women have played a greater role.

I feel that this is a great waste of brain power. I am looking at this problem not so much as it confronts us today, but as it is obviously going to confront us in the years that lie ahead. Our western society is in competition not only militarily and socially, but in economics, and we are going to need to harness every bit of brainpower that we have. I feel that we neglect the women's brainpower and it does come from, in many cases, discrimination—that it has been part of the mores away back in our background in this province. It may be what we in Canada call the Anglo-Saxon heritage.

This is one of our weaknesses which has not been quite so bad among the French-Canadians, but I would urge the government, in this particular department of human rights, that it use its facilities—possibly through the schools, through various public service groups and especially the schools to reach the young people—to encourage the women and the young girls to seek professional careers in industry, not just in nursing, but in other fields. It has shown in other countries and, to some extent, in Canada, that women are extremely capable in various spheres in which normally they would not be active.

Mr. N. Davison (Hamilton East): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might ask the hon. Minister a couple of questions on this same subject?

I have here the national employment service magazine, the Ontario section for January, 1965. There is a statement by J. W. Trimble, the regional director, and he starts off with:

Many capable older workers with years of useful service ahead of them are not being given an opportunity to re-enter the employment field.

Here is another magazine put out by the purchasing agents of Ontario, and there is an article in it about retiring after age 65. This is one paragraph I would like to read for the hon. Minister.

In 1909, when my father came to this country from England, it was not unusual to see in the Toronto newspapers a special proviso in the help wanted ads: "No English need apply." Today, the more radical tolerant Canadian businessman sets up another kind of wall: "No one over 35 need apply."

In British Columbia they now have, under The Fair Employment Practices Act, a bill that they do not allow discrimination in hiring. This is a fairly limited bill, but it does give some protection to the older workers. I wonder if the hon. Minister would comment on the fact that we have one province in Canada that realizes that there is a problem with the older worker and they are bringing in some legislation?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: This is a very important area to be considered; I am glad that the hon. member raised this question. I would say that I personally have a very great interest in this matter, but at this point in March, 1965, I think I can say this with some real assurance to the House that the problem to which reference was made, the major block in this situation, will be removed when portability of pensions becomes effective, and—if Ontario pension portability is already in the process of being implemented—under the Canada Pension Plan, portability is one of the conditions and factors.

Then with the general interest, which I assess as being very real and alive on the part of many groups of responsible management in the over-45 age group, I think that between the interest that I know exists, plus the removal of the block in respect to pension plans and the implementation of portability, I think that as soon as the portability factor becomes operative the problem the hon. member raised will be solved in large part. But in solving it I am interested in assisting in the matter, and in discussions on this subject—reference was made by the hon. member for Parkdale in another context, Mr. Chairman. I have had discussions with certain publishing groups with respect to control of advertisements and that sort of thing, and in addition to that, I would hope—and I have not mentioned it as a part of our programme—but one of the things I hope we will have will be a resumption of public debate with this matter not being raised just at various conventions and conferences that are held, but that a working committee in the employing group will be established to advance the points which we have discussed today.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, under vote 907, during the introductory remarks the hon. Minister mentioned that a human rights officer would be appointed for the southwestern Ontario area. For this we commend the hon. Minister. Is the hon. Minister prepared at this time to state who will be appointed?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: No!

Mr. Newman: Then may I bring up several other comments to the hon. Minister? The problem of the 45-years-of-age and older worker is one that—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I have just spoken to that.

Mr. Newman: I would like to stress another aspect of it. It is going to be of extreme importance in the area from which I come, especially with the dislocations that we hope will not come, but may come, as a result of the automobile plan. I have had individuals approach me who were not 45, but were under 45 and looked 60. When they go to apply for employment, their application is accepted, but as soon as they make their appearance at the office, they are not believed. What is—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Another instance—that question to which exception was taken about age—where a date of birth would be pretty helpful.

Mr. Newman: That is true. They do present their date of birth, but the—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I think that it is another reason why it should stay on the application.

Mr. Newman:—employer does not accept it at all. He judges the man by his appearance. Likewise, I have had the situation where the individual is physically handicapped. He goes to the national employment service; is sent to an employer; and he goes with the understanding that the job is available for him. He arrives at the employer's who takes one look at him; sees that the individual is not of the most pleasant physical appearance and as a result the man does not find employment.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: There is an area with respect to the handicapped which is real, very real. I do not think much of the example of the handling of the case which the hon. member has just cited. I think that the handling of that kind of a referral of a man who is handicapped to a potential employer, requires just a little more careful handling than apparently took place in the instance the hon. member cited. I think that a little bit of commonsense is required, and a little bit of the milk of human kindness.

Mr. Newman: I am glad to hear the hon. Minister make such comments, because the individual that did apply for the employment came back and was practically crying. He sees no reason for him to live any longer he says.

There is another problem that does come up under human rights, and that is the problem of the immigrant worker. We accept the immigrant to our shores. He comes, but when he goes to apply for employment sometimes, some employers will give him a fairly long, detailed application form. The man could fill in the application form were he to have an individual who could speak the language beside him. He probably would have no difficulty. But because he is not conversant with the English language, he finds himself at a real disadvantage, and quite often the employer says, "Well, if you cannot speak English, how are you going to take instructions?" Yet command of the English language is not necessary in all types of employment, especially in certain types of factory employment where all a man has to do is be there, operate with hands and feet, and follow instructions. He can perform the job just as well as a man who has a college education.

There are also some employers who will give a fairly long, substantial test and they give a number of minutes for an individual to complete the test. If you are conversant in English you have no difficulty at all. But the poor, new immigrant takes one look at this and he is at a complete loss. He cannot complete the test and they immediately say, "You do not understand English; you are not well enough educated." The result is the man is not hired.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: This is a real problem. It is a matter that goes back a little into the federal field of immigration. I am afraid it is a question of educational standards of the people who want to come to Canada or those who are being asked to come. But most important of all, this involves the basic question of where the language of the country to which he is going fits in.

Now most of these immigrants are sponsored individuals. In some cases relatives who are already here tend to look after and, in the initial stages, get the immigrant established.

There are many cases, and I think it is in that area where we can help in getting the immigrant to acquire a knowledge of the language, a working language as quickly as possible.

We are working in the case of the Italian community—I have had meetings with the Italian consul here in Toronto and I think his objectives on behalf of his former countrymen are the same as ours. We are working together. I hope that in a few weeks we will come up with a programme that will be pretty practical. But even there we will be relying on the families of these people to encourage them to take these classes. I recognize the problem, and I think it will be something to resolve and improve the situation. It is going to take the interests of people like the hon. member, and those of us in our department and others who are community minded citizens.

Mr. Newman: Is an employer discriminating in the eyes of the commission if he asks—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I do not think he is in the context of discrimination. It depends on the kind of job. If the man is writing receipts or invoices or explaining things; if the job involves explanation to the public with whom the firm does business, I would think they would want somebody who is adept at English. It is an inexact field in which we are all working, and I think we have to deal with the situation. There are some employers who have work in a particular trade available where you do not have to meet the public, maybe that is the kind of job. The Italian group accomplished that in the construction business by those men from Italy who had been here over the years and owned construction companies invariably employing recent immigrants from Italy and then the process starts. It is not easy, it is not an exact area. We should keep working at it together.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, my prime concern actually was with the Italians, as the hon. Minister has mentioned.

Now he applies for production work in one of the big automotive plants and surely the command of the English language is not—it is to his advantage to have it—but it is not or should not be a requirement as far as the average type of employment in the plant, where he is simply going to take orders from a foreman and going to do manual work only. He would never be in communication with anyone with whom a good command of English would be required.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Chairman, I have just a few words. I was very much interested when I read the first brochures of the hon. Prime Minister of this province about human rights with no discrimination in the government of Ontario or any of the agencies. When I thought of certain discriminations—they may not be overt but certainly subtle, and I speak of the Ontario Northland Railway. I do not know what religion you are and do not discriminate against you, but it always seems a strange thing to me in that railway that none of my faith ever had an opportunity to get any kind of an executive position. If you look over all the executive officers, you will not find one of my faith. I am sure they are not that dumb. They are junior officers all right, but no opportunity to advance farther in that particular railway.

It was always known if you had a special card, if you carried a card, then you had a good chance to advance. So it has always struck me that I could not take these brave words too seriously.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, one other question of the hon. Minister: Is the requirement of Canadian citizenship a proper qualification for admittance to a university? Can the university insist on a person acquiring that? Is this not discriminating?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: This is away outside the code, it has nothing to do with the code at all. I think it has been the practice for the last 50 years or longer that residence or citizenship with respect to university studies was not a qualification. They may have certain fellowships and courses available to people coming from, say, the city of Windsor or particular districts with a tag on them and that sort of thing, but I have never heard of anything such as the hon. member suggests.

Mr. Newman: Well, Mr. Chairman—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It is one of the great factors, the international aspect of our educational system in the university area.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, may I read this letter then from one of the provincial universities? I will not use the individual's name, but if the hon. Minister wishes to see it I will be glad to show it to him.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: If the hon. member could have a copy of that letter sent to the hon. Minister of University Affairs (Mr. Davis), I am sure he would be glad to take it up for him.

Mr. Newman: Well, I am just wondering whether this is not against the human rights code.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Race, colour and creed!

Mr. R. Gisborn (Wentworth East): Mr. Chairman, through you to the hon. Minister, I have a copy of the human rights code, 1961-62, and section 1, subsection 1, deals with discrimination prohibited in notices, signs, and so on:

1. No person shall publish or display or cause to be published or displayed or permit to be published or displayed, any notice, sign, symbol, emblem, or other representation indicating discrimination or an intention to discriminate against any person or any class of persons for any purpose because of their race, creed or colour, nationality, ancestry or place of origin of such person or class of persons.

Mr. Chairman, subsection 2 deals with exceptions as to the matters of opinion. It reads as follows:

Nothing in this section shall be deemed to interfere with the free expression of opinion upon any subject.

Now I am not a lawyer but several people have asked me about this clause. I can see the difference as a layman, there is some difference in the application of sections 1 and 2. But I wondered if the hon. Minister could tell the House how many prosecutions there have been under section 1 and how many convictions under section 1, and if in any case subsection 2 has interfered with prosecution procedure under this section 1.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I would have to search that out and get those figures for the hon. member. I would be glad to do that.

May I at the moment make reference to his comments with respect to the no sign prohibition? The first legislation of this kind was in 1944. That was legislation entitled Racial Discrimination Act and was directed to the type of signs such as obnoxious and unacceptable signs on the front windows of, shall we say, restaurants and so on, or even in the front door of rooming houses and so on: "No such-and-such allowed"; or "None allowed." These were objectionable in their nature and it was this type of thing that gave rise to the legislation.

The answer to the first part of the hon. member's question, as I understood it, is that since January 1, 1962, on that point there have been six cases and no prosecutions. In other words, settlement was reached and the matter was worked out. As to the second part of the hon. member's question, I would have to inquire more deeply and I would be glad to do it.

Mr. Gisborn: Just a brief comment, Mr. Chairman: I understand that in some cases where the commission has interfered in an alleged case of discrimination, or maybe in more than one case, they have been able to conciliate and bring about an understanding and get the problem cleared up. I understand in some cases they can get the proprietor of an establishment to place the human rights declaration in their establishment. Is this the case, have we got the declaration in poster form and is it being used?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes, we have it available and it is being used, but there is no compulsion as to its posting. There has been a very wide distribution of the large size human rights code, as well as the smaller size.

Mr. Gisborn: I am glad to hear that because I think that the display of that poster across the province would do a lot to bring understanding and do the educational job that are the intent and purpose of the code.

Vote 907 agreed to.

On vote 908:

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Chairman, when the hon. Minister of Labour issued his press statement on January 13 of this year, outlining his blueprint for labour, it contained references with some considerable pride to the research branch. The designated areas stipulated within that branch were the fields of automation, technological change, manpower training and manpower requirements generally. I think this opens up the entire area of technological change within this Legislature and, as the hon. Minister opposite knows, I have some small personal interest in that area. I hope he will allow me a perambulating survey over the field in the light of what has happened in the last year and the new information that has become available.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: As long as you do not perambulate too far from the vote.

Mr. S. Lewis: I will perambulate within the confines of the vote.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I would be very much interested in hearing what you have to say about this important subject.

Mr. S. Lewis: I got the word "perambulate" from the hon. member for Sudbury, so I use it with discretion.

Thus far in this Chamber, Mr. Chairman, the hon. Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of Labour have spoken at some length about the area of technological change. I do not think it unfair to say that the basic theme, or one of the basic themes, was that the computer is in the office and all is well with the world. They argue that automation is a bogey, it is not a Frankenstein monster, there is no—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be put in the position of interrupting. I would like to sit and hear, but if that is the nature of your approach to the subject I must, at this point, take violent disagreement. We take no such position. We do not put it in those terms at all—we say that we will never—

Mr. S. Lewis: But that is what the hon. Prime Minister says.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: —solve the problems of technological change by going out and spreading fear and mistrust. That is what I say; the answer to the problem is by all of us digging in and doing something about it. That is the position; it is not in the terms in which you put it.

Mr. S. Lewis: I shall have cause to quote from both the hon. Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of Labour, and perhaps we can define our terms.

I think that certainly the hon. Minister of Labour advanced the thesis that there was no factual basis for the projected dislocation and upheaval, I quote him:

I have yet to be shown any sound factual basis for any of these blind forecasts of doom and economic chaos. This game of one-upmanship can only serve to seriously mislead the layman and the public generally.

I do not think, therefore, that I am misinterpreting the hon. Minister's remarks. Then, in the subsequent exchange with the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Sargent), the hon. Minister revealed a curious attitude of mind in that agitated lapse when he suggested that automation was not new; it was a continuation of mechanization, it had come to us from the wheel.

I was rather saddened by that particular intervention, because I think it betrayed an attitude which suggests that the problems we are likely to be faced with over the next ten or 20 years will not be solved by this government. That particular approach in no sense appreciates the qualitative changes that are introduced in modern technology. It sounded rather like a chamber of commerce commercial and I do not think it befits the hon. Minister of Labour.

What is more, a great many eminent people in this field disagree profoundly with the suggestion that they are prophets of doom because they postulate exceeding difficulties. The Secretary of Labour in the United States—let it be pointed out to the hon. Minister—has said that automation is creating—and I quote him now—"a human slag heap," and that the United States is gradually being divided into millions of haves and millions of have-nots.

That is not a prophet of doom. That is a realistic appraisal of the situation, and a basis for some projected analysis.

Now, the hon. Prime Minister took a rather different emphasis and a very interesting one. The basic theme of the Prime Minister's speech was a careful recitation of the employment ratios, the range of employment in the province of Ontario, and the low level of unemployment. One has to say to him in his absence that you cannot disagree with the statistics he recited. They were sound, they were factual, they were reasonable.

But, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that they missed the point, because the fact is that the problem of manpower adjustment and manpower displacement is not necessarily, or even primarily, a problem of unemployment. To cast the context of technological change purely in the framework of unemployment is to miss the very difficult interrelated problems.

The hon. Prime Minister then said this, and I want to quote from his speech on February 23:

The winds of technological change consequently are not of hurricane force and need not be looked upon as a blind unreasoning type of force which cannot be controlled, which will strike without warning, and which will inevitably leave havoc and destruction in its wake. I would submit that these winds of change are propitious, they are predictable, we may harness them and we may turn them to our own use.

I think the serious flaw and an interesting revelation of the attitude of mind lies in the phrase, "they are predictable." This is a facile and unjustified phrase, because on the basis of what we know now about rates of technological change, and on the basis of statistical data which are available, that kind of contention is not justified. If the hon. Prime Minister was right in suggesting that the 1980s would be the crucial period, then the present attitude obviously portends little developments to meet the crisis.

I think that the entire presentation on the part of the hon. Minister of Labour and the hon. Prime Minister missed six basic propositions relative to technological change and to the research which this branch will have to do. I should like to itemize them.

1. They did not take into account the basic and fundamental disagreement about the impact of automation, the totally new concept that that gives rise to; and the need for government to begin to define a position in relation to those concepts.

2. There was no suggestion of the specific studies or case analyses that are available for future planning.

3. The question of manpower analysis and the rudimentary labour market information was not outlined in any detail.

4. The state and adequacy of our present training and retraining programmes were passed over in cavalier style.

5. The existence of government co-ordination and involvement has not been defined.

Finally, I suggest to you, Mr. Minister, that the crucial area of the effects on the psychological and emotional stability of human beings in an automated process has not been discussed by the government.

I think that these are fundamental propositions and I would like to deal with them one by one and propose some concrete solution.

First, Mr. Chairman, through you to the hon. Minister, let me say that I disagree with the basic proposition of the hon. Minister of Labour. I think a great many others disagree with his sanguine approach. There are countless experts you can choose from, but I want to draw to the attention of this House—since it has been referred to under other circumstances—the conference on automation and social change in September of 1963, and the presentation made to that conference by John Snyder, invited on behalf of this government to speak. John Snyder said, and I think it is rather interesting, since it meets the hon. Minister head on.

I suppose it must be true that individuals here in Canada are reacting to all this furore in much the same way as individuals in the States do. Some must feel that those of us who are trying to do something about automation's effects are quite right. Others probably feel fairly neutral about the whole thing. Still others undoubtedly think we are overdoing it, that there is no serious threat to our economy or to our society or to men in today's technological changes—that there are no real problems at all.

Well, I disagree rather violently with the doubters in the States and I am willing to take issue with them here in Canada, too. I understand their doubts, but I have maintained that they are living in a world of myths and if we can accomplish one meaningful task I think it should be the dispelling of such myths, and the focusing of attention rather on the facts and dramatizing how frightening the facts really are.

Then he went on to outline the facts, and I too will outline them in the course of the next short while. But first, who is John Snyder? He is co-chairman of the American foundation on automation and employment, which foundation was the model for the government proposal now abandoned. He is also the president of U.S. Industries, which develops automated equipment, and an undoubted expert in the field. In fact, it is the testimony of Snyder and John Diebold before the Senate sub-committee in the United States which has formed so much of the statistical basis for reflections on automation.

There are other people who disagree with this government, and they should be brought in. There is the famous ad hoc committee for the triple revolution. It is not as sinister as it sounds, and contains the following people: Robert Theobald, the economist who wrote Abundance and made the first major analysis in this field; Gunnar Myrdahl, whose capacity in economic affairs in the adjustment to automation is unchallenged; Michael Harrington, who wrote The Other American and upon whose book much of The Economic Opportunity Act is based, or at least motivated; W. H. Ferry, who is vice-president of the Fund of the Republic doing studies in this area; Gerard Peal, editor of The Scientific American; Donald Armstrong—perhaps this will appeal to the hon. Minister—retired vice-president of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company.

All of these men generally accept the proposition that the impact of automation and technological change is of such dimension that it invalidates the traditional theories. It is no longer possible to talk cavalierly about income related to work; it is necessary to begin to think consciously about providing every individual and every family with an adequate income as a matter of right. In other words, they asked of this government and of other organizations, that thought be given to a guaranteed annual wage unrelated to work.

I want to suggest strongly to this government that that proposition is worthy of delineation within the research branch. It is not a dream, it is not a particularly irrelevant concept; it is one which flows from the area of technological change and one worthy of government analysis.

There are a great many others who disagree with the emphasis put on things. Ewen Clague who is the director of the U.S. Department of Labour Statistics, views the speeches of the kind that were made by the hon. Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of Labour, and then says:

We tend to emphasize new occupations created. We talk glibly of specialists in miniaturization, numerical control and astrophysics; but we are inclined to overlook the occupations that are declining.

The 1960 census of population lists more than 80 occupations, many of them skilled, in which employment declined since 1950. These include loom fixers, cabinet makers, locomotive engineers, paperhangers, plasterers, shoe repairmen, tailors, boilermakers, furriers, stone cutters and some highly skilled trades in the printing industry.

I dare say a Minister of Labour or two will be ultimately contained in the list.

The truth is again, Mr. Chairman, that this government persists in underestimating the impact of technological change and on the basis of employment ratios in the month of March, 1965, proclaims that you can meet the problem without the kind of basic economic analysis and basic study of manpower requirements which are indispensable. That simply will not work.

The number of computers introduced into Canada by the middle of 1964 was marginal to say the least. Somewhere in the area of between 300 and 400. The number that is likely to exist in the middle of 1970 could be three or four times that, some would project it further and say 10 or 20 times that. As it now stands, only one per cent of those machine tools which could be brought under computer control presently fall within that automated ken.

When we expand further in that direction, when Canada obtains the pace of development that holds true for the United States and at the moment for the United Kingdom, then Ontario will feel the shock in powerful and reverberating waves.

Therefore, I suggest strongly to the hon. Minister that the all's well with the world thesis is somewhat unjustified.

Now the other next area of lack, and I think it important, is that none of the specific studies which have been provided have been analyzed by the hon. Minister in this House. There are studies available upon which we can base our predictions.

Let me mention some of them: The first is a case study of displaced workers, bulletin

No. 1408 of The United States Department of Labour. It is a study of 3,000 workers in five plant shutdowns in the United States in 1962, 1963 and 1964. In petroleum refining, in automotive equipment, in glass jars, in floor covering, in iron foundry—in the whole range of employment opportunities. There are basic lessons and realities to learn from that study—a study, Mr. Chairman, which has not even begun to be contemplated in Ontario.

These were the lessons: Not one firm provided retraining for jobs elsewhere. Only two of the five firms gave assistance of any kind to find work; all of the five firms were multiplant but none of the firms provided the men with interplant transfers. The most effective assistance in finding new jobs came from friends and relatives—not from the state employment bureaus.

The average man thrown out of work by technological change was in his late 40s, he had a family of two dependents, his average educational level was one year of high school. The rate of unemployment one year later for these people was from eight per cent to 39 per cent, fully six or seven times that which prevailed in the rest of the work force. A search for a job was a frustrating and brutalizing experience.

This, let me point out to the hon. Minister in his sanguine haven opposite, is one of the very few studies available in North America which suggests what can happen in the case of technological change to displacing workers.

But there are others. There is a study in the United States on the introduction of office automation into 20 different firms in private industry. I would like to suggest to you what this study indicated.

Within one year the total employment was reduced by 25 per cent. Within one year one-third of some 2,800 employees whose work had been directly affected were reassigned to other positions—with serious psychological adjustment problems. Equal numbers were upgraded and downgraded in skill. There was an unexpectedly small number of new positions created.

A great many people talk in facile terms about automation creating new jobs. Where the studies have been done, and they have not been done in the province of Ontario—it is amply demonstrated that such jobs are not created. In fact you can have a serious attrition of the work force, and this too should be taken into account by the government.

The results of this survey were not earth-shattering, but they did form the basis for some government planning.

Here in Canada we have the little study, "Impact and Implications of Office Automation" by John MacDonald of the federal Department of Labour. He wrote it in the middle of the year 1964, for the economics and research branch. After he did this study, the only study of its kind in this country, the first that has ever been done in this field, he was moved to another position. That, alas, seems to be the result of foraging into these new areas.

What does MacDonald point out? Let me quote from his central thesis. He says:

The entire sociological organization of the office will change under the impact of computers. In such a situation, where the full potential of the computer is utilized to perform the operations of a centralized integrated system, the impact on the traditional structure of the organization is like a torpedo cutting clear across established functional and departmental lines. Whole departments, even vice-presidential empires, may be swallowed up in the wake of reorganization. Rumps of depleted departments may be combined into new organizational entities, while a new and powerful electronic data processing department emerges as the essential heartbeat of the organization.

His study confirmed the experience of the American study. He said that introduction of large-scale electronic data processing computers in a head office of 2,000 employees will eliminate 200 to 500 jobs in two to five years. I think he underestimates. The immediate layoffs are small; but he warns society, and the government in particular, that that is misleading; office automation is hidden rather than overt and the work force naturally contracts because there are no further hirings over a large period of time.

Up to three-quarters of the clerical jobs in any given industry where a computer is introduced can be affected, frequently with severe damage to the human psyche and the capacity to adapt. There are disastrous effects on the intermediate level of management, control and supervision, and the general portent for office automation is an exceedingly serious one.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, there is, of course, the survey of market conditions in Windsor, to which I am sure the more assiduous Windsor members here will refer in time. This, too, is a fascinating document. One of my hon. colleagues intends to raise it at greater length at some future time on this vote; but let me introduce into the House the elements that highlight it.

First, of 1,000 cases of unemployment in Windsor in the middle of 1964, fully 15 per cent were unemployed as a direct result of technological change. Fifteen per cent. I say to the hon. Minister that that is rather higher than I would have thought, and it is a frightening figure.

Approximately half of those who left to look for other jobs were unemployed for more than a year; 53 per cent have no high school education. Only 124 of the 1,000 enrolled in the oft-inflated programme 5, and of those only 62 completed the course. Among the under 25 years, the rate of unemployment was considerably higher than those within the 25 to 44 year range, and certainly than those above the 44 year range.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, I think it is possible to make—although the hon. Minister refused to make it—it is possible to make a tentative summary, which I would like to make on behalf of my party on the basis of the present available data.

1. Much of worker displacement is in no way tied to, or alleviated by, training programmes. In fact, I would say the majority of it.

2. There is no geographic mobility to speak of in the province of Ontario, which is fostered by industry or supported and stimulated by government.

3. The long-term diminution in-office white-collar workers is likely to equal that of the blue-collar manufacturing industries over the long run.

4. Age level and education of the workers who are thrown out of work because of direct technological change, either precludes or discourages retraining. That is standardized in every study we have available.

5. Unemployment after displacement is a long-term proposition, and the creation of new jobs within any effective plan is minimal, despite all that has been said. Of course this is one of the points which Snyder raised at the conference; one of the things which these men have tried to get through to governments such as this, without any success.

I ask the hon. Minister opposite, using this branch as an umbrella, what are his policies for geographic mobility? What are his policies to solve this problem of education, inhibited by age and by motivation? What are his policies to solve the problems of worker displacement unrelated to retraining procedure? What are his policies for the creation of new jobs in computerized offices?

I want now to move to the third area. One of the reasons I suspect that the hon. Minister cannot give a policy—and indeed he has admitted it himself—is that there is simply no manpower data available in the province of Ontario whatsoever. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, there is no manpower data available in this country.

The hon. Minister nods his head. Let me remind the hon. Minister of something. In the 1960-61 debate in the federal House of Commons, there was considerable agitation for analysis to be made. In 1962, the federal Senate sub-committee submitted its report, manpower training, if you will, and begged for statistical data. None was forthcoming.

In February of 1963, there was tabled in this House by the select committee on manpower training, a report, only part of which the hon. Minister saw fit to implement. The other parts of it—the fundamental and crucial aspects relating to the need for data—are just now being tentatively explored. The Deutsch report is now before us, and many similar economic appraisals, but absolutely nothing in the way of market inventories is available.

It is astonishing that despite all these committee reports, the hon. Minister talks in vague terms about his research branch. I suggest to you, sir, that we need a provincial inventory of human requirements. We need it desperately, and we need it now.

There is no possible excuse for further delay. There is nothing available. The hon. Prime Minister promised only one study in his speech, and the only thing we have thus far received from The Department of Labour, is this rather interesting document on population and labour force productions for the economic regions of Ontario, 1961 to 1986. An interesting document, but it is hardly of use in coping with the problems of technological change.

Indeed the young research man with the select committee on youth who does not have an economics background—rather a sociological degree—prepared much the same material on short notice for our committee. I do not think that this kind of document will serve to divert our attention from the essential focus, which is the absence of any information at all.

What must we have? I want to suggest to the hon. Minister on behalf of my party that what we need falls under four areas.

1. This province needs five- and ten-year projections of labour demands. It needs five- and ten-year projections relating to market analysis, on a continuing systematic basis.

2. We need an industry-by-industry survey of future manpower requirements. We have to know, and we have to know now, what measures or events are likely to affect the work force composition. I am referring to things like new machines and equipment, development of new products, increase or decrease of sales, plans for change of location, and so on. The Department of Trade and Commerce in Ottawa gets much of this information on a voluntary basis. Scandinavia has it. The United States, through its bureau of statistics, is gradually acquiring it. We need such data in the province of Ontario; at the moment we have not even a smattering of it.

3. We need comprehensive data on the changing occupational employment patterns within individual industry. You do not take measures regarding technological change without knowing the shift in the occupational structure of our work force. It is not enough to know the shift from industry to industry. You have to analyze it within industry. So far, we have not had any evidence of that. The hon. Minister may feel that is too much for his modest and novel branch, but it has to be found.

It is interesting to note that Ewen Clague, who is director of the bureau of labour statistics in the United States, came to the organization on economic co-operation and development in December of 1964 and gave statistical evidence available from 1954 to 1964, of the occupational changes within industry. He itemized baking, petroleum refining, and telephone industries, and he broke them down in precise fashion. I think it rather interesting: some of the hon. members of this House might find it equally interesting. He gave the total employed, the professional and technical percentage, the managers, officials and proprietors, the clerical workers and sales workers; the craftsmen and foremen; the operatives; the service workers; and the labourers. He analyzed the percentage shift within each grouping of that particular industry, the occupation shift between early 1950 and early 1960, this making it possible to project manpower requirements: to provide proper skills for the training programme; to adjust to technological change.

That information is not available; it has not even begun to be available. All we are now planning for is adjustment to the imbalances which presently exist and, of course, none of the necessary descriptive material is close to being available.

I would like to go one step further. There is a fourth aspect which we in the province of Ontario require. We must know how individual occupations are themselves affected by technology. In other words, you have to know whether within individual occupations the skill has been upgraded or downgraded; to know that business machine service men and maintenance electricians, and tool and die makers, and appliance service men have been upgraded; and that machine tool operators, typesetters, intercity truck drivers, and so on, have been downgraded. Thus you can make an analysis, not only of the overall market, not only of industry by industry, not only occupational shifts in industry; but of the level of skilled requirements within occupations as well.

When we have that kind of manpower survey and comprehensive market data in this province, then we will be at the threshold of formulating a programme.

All of that data is obviously indispensable for intelligent government planning, Mr. Chairman. There cannot be intelligent government planning under the present circumstances, no matter what the protestations of the hon. Minister.

There cannot even be any intelligent retraining or training programmes, because there is no data on which to base the occupational choices for retraining. The hon. Minister cannot stand before this Legislature and say, with confidence, that retraining on the job or retraining in any of the stipulated programmes in the federal-provincial agreement is not, in fact, retraining for obsolescence—because no one knows; because there is no market data available on which to base the courses.

I just want to take a couple of minutes, Mr. Chairman, and look at these courses with the hon. members of this Legislature. I appreciate that some of this is perhaps a little involved, but in order to be presented in a logical and coherent fashion, I shall simply move in this way toward the end.

The basic federal-provincial programmes which affect this department and the government as a whole are numbers 3, 4 and 5. I know that the hon. Minister of Labour in his lead-off said that programme 4 is his major responsibility now, but I think that programmes 3 and 5 are so interrelated that they are worthy of some analysis.

Programme No. 3 is defined as follows: 1. To assist employed persons wishing to upgrade their skill. 2. To help those about to enter employment. 3. To provide training for those individuals wishing to retrain for change of occupation.

Curiously enough, in this province we have interpreted those three areas to mean only the second, and our interpretation of programme 3 relates primarily to vocational centres and institutes of trade. I do not think I do my fellow members on the select committee on youth a particular injustice if I say that when technological and trades training came before that committee we were very dubious in our minds as to the precise status of vocational centres; how they fit in with the general overall curriculum, at what point the entry line is established, and precisely what they provided for entry into the labour market.

But then we move to programme 4, which is a particularly friendly one for this government. Programme 4, of course, has been a total and utter flop—I am sorry to put it in those words—but at the end of 1964, we had implemented one particular project under programme 4. This programme 4 has tremendous potential—let me emphasize that. This is the in-plant training part of the federal-provincial agreement. We had one project; it involved 30 people! It was the Leaside educational assistance project and it involved the firms of Honeywell Controls Limited, Philips Electronics Industries and Sagamo Company Limited. It was a programme for upgrading to grades 9, 10 and 11 levels in English, mathematics, and science.

Perhaps hon. members of this House would be interested to know something about that scheme. The students worked three hours a day from 3 to 6 p.m. It took three months to complete the three courses, which is really an interesting telescoping of academic achievement. The company agreed to pay the regular wages for class time during regular working hours—a highly civilized and intelligent move, I suggest. The skilled teachers had recently retired and were brought in to supervise the subjects.

What was the upshot of this experiment with 30 people? The only experiment up to that time under programme 4? The attendance was 98 per cent and there were no problems of punctuality. In grade 9, 26 out of 30 passed all courses; in grade 10, 25 out of 27 passed all courses and the average was 65 per cent to 75 per cent. It indicates beyond dispute that age is no factor in the learning process; many of the students have gone on to grade 11.

But there was one serious qualification to this course. The selection process was so refined as to mock the objectives sought. The students were given a plethora of forms to fill out; they were asked for motivational attitudes, employer references, work conduct, and then they were made to sign on page 10—I smiled to myself when I listened to the debates on the human rights code and the civil service material earlier this afternoon—

I authorize investigation of all statements contained in the above-mentioned qualification record. I understand that misrepresentation or remission of facts called for herein will be sufficient cause for non-approval or dismissal from the upgrading project.

Basically, it is nothing to become terribly concerned about, except that it reads a little more like an income-tax form or a submission to the secret service than it does to upgrade one's educational achievements.

Mr. Singer: To keep the security of the state.

Mr. S. Lewis: To keep the security of the state doubtless was the crucial factor involved.

The truth is that although a great many applicants put in for the course, only 30 were chosen, ten from each firm. Despite the excellence of the course, I suggest that it has not expanded widely in the province of Ontario; that there are even now only three or four other similar experiments, and that this scheme of in-plant training, which is of exceeding excellence and in which the hon. Minister of Labour has a right to share some pride, has no foundation for future growth because there is no statistical data available on which to base courses.

The technological and trades training branch, and I think this can be placed more properly under The Department of Education, was rather embarrassed and concerned at the lack of data which they had available. In a branch of 14 men, only one was assigned to make labour market analyses across the province of Ontario.

In fact, I would like to quote a little exchange between the hon. member for Scarborough North (Mr. Wells) and the head of the trades and technological training branch at that committee session. The hon. member for Scarborough North—I do not think that I am misinterpreting him—thought it would be worthwhile to have some agency make an overall market analysis on which these programmes could be based.

The head of the training branch said: "There is very little of that being done at the present time. There may be some that may develop."

The hon. member for Scarborough North replied: "Would this not be the logical thing?"

The head of the branch replied: "Definitely," and later added, "I have one man whose job it is to try to do this area who is in contact with business and industry; one man cannot do it."

Of course one man cannot make a labour market analysis of the province of Ontario on which to base training in programmes 3, 4 and 5.

Programme 5, to move to it briefly, is of course, the heralded retraining of the unemployed. Let me give some national statistics: Between April 1, 1962 and March 31, 1963, seven per cent of the average unemployed enrolled. Between April 1, 1963 and March 31, 1964, there was an astronomical jump to 10 per cent.

In other words, anywhere from 90 to 93 per cent of the work force in the past two years has been unemployed and has not sought retraining in programme 5.

It is noteworthy that in 1963-64, although 18,000 took the courses, almost as many dropped out of the courses. It is necessary for the hon. Minister of Labour to ask himself, and to direct his research branch to finding, the answer for men dropping out of courses. Could it be the impoverished per diem payment? What happens to the women with children? What counselling services are provided? How do you boost human incentives? What knowledge has the department about the relationship of men who are unemployed and the programmes offered under programme 5?

The Windsor survey showed that very few had any motivation to attend. One must ask why. Our party is concerned about this area precisely because the present programmes—I say this forthrightly and in full knowledge of what I say—are meagre, ill-founded, perilous and totally inadequate. And the hon. Minister of Labour presides over them all.

Programme 5, according to a member at our select committee meeting, is the reaction to emergency programming; and so it is. But a reaction to emergency programming in 1965 consigns to obsolescence those people in 1975 or 1980. Although the number placed of those who complete the courses is impressive, the fact remains that as many drop out as enroll, and a minuscule proportion of the unemployed have any interest whatsoever. No one knows what courses to give because no one has any market information and the entire thing is an exceedingly vulnerable scheme.

That leads us, Mr. Chairman, logically to the role of government in all of this: what the hon. Minister of Labour should be doing, what might be done in government involvement and co-ordination.

What frightens me about this area is that I suspect the government is still maintaining the wisdom, the dubious wisdom, of the former Minister of Economics and Development who has been so ably succeeded in this Legislature by my hon. colleague to my right. Mr. Macaulay said at the conference on automation and social change—and I want to read it into the record again—it should be branded on the conscience of this government because of its neanderthal reflection on Tory capacity to adjust to change. I quote:

I do not believe that the solution to automation lies in legislation, nor do I believe that governments can or should accept the responsibility for finding the solution.

Legislation should not be involved—governments should not be involved: This according to the former Minister of Economics and Development in this government! Perhaps that is why, at this precise point in time, the government remains statistically nude in the area of market analysis. Perhaps that is why, at precisely this point in time, we are only beginning to catch up with imbalances rather than analyzing the root economic causes. Perhaps that is why, at this time, the hon. Minister of Labour is trying to salvage the wreckage by setting up a research branch in, let it be said, hugely generalized terms.

What we have had up until now, and I contend that it still persists, Mr. Minister, is an incredible labyrinth of competing agencies; a jungle of misinformation gathering, rather than intelligent information gathering. We did have the foundation on automation and employment. It was conceived in bravado, it was disbanded in silence. This government simply consigned it to limbo.

Then we had the federal manpower consultative service. The hon. Minister in his lead-off said he looked forward to their reports. The hon. Minister knows as well as I that the federal manpower consultative service is a labour market joke. He knows that equally well. He chuckles to himself—he is pleased to hear an Opposition member saying it rather than the government having to say it.

I will say it on his behalf. This is a passive agency, this agency is not doing anything. This agency sits quietly by and waits for trade unions and management to make submissions to it, instead of making the analysis itself. Listen to the way its director described its functioning at the organization for economic co-operation and development in Washington in December—Mr. Brooks, I believe it is—and I quote:

We offer to industry and to labour the services of the officers of the MCS to help structure the research and assessment programme, guide it and bring to it the benefits of experiences developed through similar programmes elsewhere.

It is to be stressed that the MCS is just that. It will not do the research but will certainly be prepared to assist in the identification and location of suitable research talent.

It sounds like a civil service advertisement. No wonder the Deutsch report referred to this particular group as a “disembodied branch” not at all integrated into the labour market programme.

Then the hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. Minister of Labour had a little exchange about the national employment service. That, too, is a laughing matter in relation to labour market analysis. The national employment service has one economist's position. The position has not been filled in five out of the last eight years. The national employment service has none of the data. In the Globe and Mail for March 24, 1965, there was a heading: “Data Lack, Study Gap Hinder NES.” Then the story says precisely what everyone knows, we will have no substantial statistical documentation from that source.

Well so much for the foundation on automation and employment, so much for the manpower consultative service, so much for the national employment service. Now we move into the provincial area.

We suddenly learn that the Ontario Economic Council is to take hold of research; yet all the hon. Prime Minister indicated to us was one promised survey of a rather limited kind. Then we expand, and we hear that the research branch of The Department of Labour may provide the key; but there is no delineation of responsibility and authority. One might ask about the technological and trades training branch of The Department of Education. Where is the substance there?

What are the joint combined efforts to which the hon. Minister refers? He need not worry about duplicating federal work, there is no federal work to duplicate. At the moment there is no provincial work to emulate. On what is the hon. Minister basing his research programme? I think that we in the House have a right to learn precisely what he intends to investigate.

I want to suggest, Mr. Chairman, that fundamentally there are two root questions to ask of this research branch.

First, we do not need the vague assurances that you are going to look into technological change, Mr. Minister, we assume that of your department. We want precise specifics on the following matters—and I shall raise them. Some of them you may wish to deal with in reply.

What overall work force analysis is under way? To how many years do future projections relate? Where are the likely gaps in the statistical material required?

Which industries are presently under study, or contemplated for study? What sampling technique is employed? When will the precise reports be tabled in this Legislature?

Are there any areas of changing occupational trends being investigated? Has the trade union movement been involved?

What expansion plans are there for programme 4? Which industries have actually been contacted? What are the various grounds for refusal, if any?

Are individual studies of office and white-collar automation contemplated? If so, where; and why were those specific industries chosen?

What breakdown can be offered on the capacity of the private or public sectors to provide new jobs? How do such figures relate to the Deutsch report requirements?

What studies are currently underway to facilitate geographic mobility?

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): That will keep them going for five years.

Mr. S. Lewis: One could go on endlessly, but this is the material we require.

I suspect the hon. Minister of Labour agrees, but it would be of much greater satisfaction to this House if instead of saying, if I may say so, in his peculiarly sanguine fashion that we have it under control and will investigate technological change, it is of crucial importance that we have precise analysis offered.

The second question that has to be answered by this branch is: What are the channels of communication, authority and decision making? What are those channels? Not at the senior civil service level! I am pleased to know that you are going to have a little tête-à-tête between senior civil servants of The Department of Labour and The Department of Education; but where are the channels of authority and decision-making at the Cabinet level?

Do they lie with the Ontario Economic Council in The Department of Economics and Development? Do they lie with the research branch of The Department of Labour? Do they lie with the technological and trades training branch of The Department of Education? Does one set of statistics go to the other? Which set of statistics are authoritative? Which plans are based on which statistics? Who makes the ultimate decisions? Who has the final authority?

Not a word has been offered, and I suggest, frankly, Mr. Chairman, that time is surely running out. Not in the sense that we cannot adjust to certain little imbalances but that we will never correct the fundamental economic ills until we have these lines of delineation clear.

Now, I have dealt with those obvious areas, Mr. Chairman. There are these crucial lacks in government co-ordination, in manpower data, in the delicate and sensitive area of retraining.

Let me add a sort of incidental reflection: One cannot speak facilely of retraining. It is terribly difficult. Many training projects have foundered because of the psychological and emotional adjustments required, because of the educational levels, because of the inadequacy and irrelevance of the courses. I strongly put to the government that they should give us a precise and specific set of proposals.

After they have given us that overall blueprint, not in general terms but in particular specifics, I think this research branch should give some pretty serious thought to bringing people who will analyze the emotional and psychological impacts on workers in an automated industry; of workers who are subject to severe technological change.

I might say that never did so many men co-operate so closely to produce such marvelous goods, and never did they get less satisfaction either from the experience of co-operation or from the experience of creation.

There is an interesting quotation from John MacDonald that I would like to read into the record, because I think it is exceedingly relevant:

A large segment of these automated jobs consists in that strain-evoking trigger attentive idleness—

I do not think it could be captured more effectively.

That strain-evoking trigger attentive idleness that is the hallmark of the monitors of automation and advanced mechanization.

A first step in coming to grips with the present problem of occupational mental health would be frankly to admit the magnitude and endemic nature and social dynamite in what is referred to as the neurotic personality of our times.

I do not suggest that the hon. Minister of Labour contributes to social pathology. I do not suggest that the government wishes pre-meditatedly to develop neurotic personalities throughout this society. But the question of mental health has now become fundamental, Mr. Chairman.

The world federation of mental health which met in the middle of 1964, had as its leading speaker, Sir Geoffrey Vickers, who was also at our conference, and his subject was, "Human Relations in Industry and Mental Health." One sees, at least amongst those who are sensitive to the field, a shifting sense of responsibility, a shifting emphasis. I suggest to the hon. Minister that nowhere in his outline of the research branch, and the data that they compile, has there been even an implication that some of the human psychological effects will be analyzed.

Why should they be analyzed? Let me read the opening paragraph of a British magazine, Personnel Management and Methods, May 1964, under the title, Industrial Neurosis:

Every year, an estimated 18 million man hours are lost through psychiatric illnesses against four million through strikes.

Put differently, neurosis causes at least 35 per cent of all absence from work due to illness, and accounts for an average loss of about three-and-a-half working days per annum in the case of men, and six days in the case of women. Moreover, statistics indicate that the incidence of neurosis throughout the population is increasing steadily.

I think that rapid and unplanned introduction of technological change will increase the incidence of industrial neurosis, and I do not have the absolute conviction that the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) will adapt his community mental health programme sufficiently rapidly to contain this debilitating emotional experience.

I do not wish, in this age of automation and technological change, to put together the bits and pieces of human wreckage. I respect that fact that there is inherent in this whole proposition, immense scientific possibilities. But at the moment, frightening gaps exist, and this government is to be faulted on those gaps.

Automation, like any other technology, is morally neutral. But the capacity for men to adapt, and for their lives to be effected, either happily or adversely, lies with the policies of this government. Although I agree that some very modest and tentative steps have been taken; this government has not yet shown the economic awareness, and the social conscience required, to provide the data and the training and the alterations of the work force, plus the government co-ordination on which everything must be based. I have as much optimism as the hon. Minister of Labour in the capacity of the human spirit, and its inventive and creative power. I do not have the same optimism in the capacity of this government, of its front bench and of this department and this branch similarly to adapt.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, are we going to continue with this, because I would like to speak for about ten minutes?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, with respect, and I congratulate the hon. young hon. member, for his presentation on this subject, it is obvious that he has done some homework, to acquaint himself with some of the problems which are concerning me. Let me assure you that the subject with which we are dealing under the title of research, involves more aspects and problems than he has mentioned, and probably was aware of. In fact, I might say in the spirit of the approach you have taken to the debate, that never have I heard so many words compressed into so few new ideas. However, I move the adjournment of the committee.

Mr. MacDonald: That is a typically Tory attitude.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That is exactly what he was handing out over here. You do not like to take it.

Mr. MacDonald: You are doing nothing—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves that the committee of supply rise and report it has come to certain resolutions, and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, before moving the adjournment of the House, tomorrow we will proceed with estimates. I see there are some bills available for the committee of the whole House and we may have time for some Budget debate.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves the adjournment of the House.

An hon. member: Which estimates tomorrow?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Department of Labour, and, as announced before, Reform Institutions, Highways and Energy.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. Minister, since at some point I am personally involved, is it your intention to travel right through with estimates—move from one to the other? You have mentioned three or four?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: There are certain other items on the agenda that are available to us, and I think the House should be prepared for them. Budget debate, committee of the whole House and the continuation of estimates.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 6.05 o'clock p.m.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

THE BRUCELLOSIS ACT, 1965

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Brucellosis Act, 1965.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, by way of a word of explanation, the main feature of the amendment to The Brucellosis Act is to provide for the voluntary rather than the compulsory vaccination of female calves.

THE LIVESTOCK COMMUNITY SALES ACT

Hon. Mr. Stewart moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Livestock Community Sales Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

THE CORPORATIONS ACT

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Corporations Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Speaker, these amendments are of a limited nature. By legislation passed this year, the Parliament of Canada has extended the class of assets in which insurance companies under federal jurisdiction may invest. The amendments are for the purpose of equalling the extension with respect to Ontario insurance companies.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege.

In the Toronto Telegram of this date, which I have before me, there is a headline "AG to Recommend Shulman's Dismissal." Then follows an article under the name of Peter Bruton, Telegram staff reporter.

I should like to say this, sir, that insofar as I am quoted in the article, the quotations are quite correct. The rest of the story is entirely speculative and I would like the House to know that.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Is it true, though?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If the hon. member would just wait I will complete the statement then perhaps he will not need to interrupt.

Although there was a Cabinet meeting this morning, the matter of Dr. Shulman was not on the agenda, it was not discussed and I made no recommendation to Cabinet. What I said to three reporters yesterday, one representing the Telegram, one representing the Globe and Mail and one the Toronto Star, is as quoted in this article, that I had no intention as Attorney General of engaging in a public controversy in the press with an official of my department on a matter of government policy or on any other matter. I added that I had not seen the report or the letter to which Dr. Shulman had referred in the previous day's press and again yesterday morning; that I would reach a decision with respect to the matter and that I would communicate any decision to Dr. Shulman. This article is therefore, except for what is quoted, pure speculation.

Mr. J. R. Knox (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a point of personal privilege at this time?

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Knox: I would like to correct an error. This is reported in the Telegram of Thursday, April 1, in Mr. Peter Bruton's column—at least I presume it is Mr. Peter Bruton's column. His picture is at the side, although I may say it does not do him justice. He is a much finer looking man than that.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Knox: But the statement reporting a meeting of the public accounts committee, says as follows: "The most sensational item yesterday came when committee member Ralph Knox (P.C., Lambton West) fell off his chair."

The report shakes me, whether the other did or not. I would like to state categorically, Mr. Speaker, that I did not fall off my chair at the public accounts committee meeting yesterday. I am not a member of the public accounts committee. I did not attend their meeting yesterday, in fact I have never attended a meeting of the public accounts committee.

I would also like to say, Mr. Speaker, that I did not fall off my chair elsewhere yesterday, and I would further like to state that I cannot recall ever having fallen off my chair, nor can I recall ever having been reminded by anyone else that I fell off my chair.

I have a high regard for Mr. Bruton's column and I am sure he will find some way to inform the thousands of my friends who read his column daily, that I was not there and did not fall off.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Chairman, before the orders of the day, I would like to draw to the attention of the House, that among the many matters under continuing study by the Ontario hospital services commission in relation to hospital costs, has been the matter of fringe benefits for public hospital employees. This study has been intensified during the last few months in conjunction with the appraisal of the 1965 hospital budgets, now almost completed.

Before the inception of the Ontario hospital care insurance plan, total fringe benefits paid by public hospitals in the province of Ontario amounted to something more than $1 million. In 1960, the amount paid for fringe benefits by public hospitals in the province amounted to $4.3 million and in 1964 this had risen to $9 million. At the present time, the commission accepts as an allowable cost of hospital operation, the employers' contribution to an approved pension plan, half of the single premium for hospital insurance for each employee, half of the cost of group medical insurance at the single rate for each employee, and half of the cost of group life insurance for each employee at the single rate, with certain limitations on the amount of the insurance, and half of the cost of weekly indemnity insurance upon certain conditions, for example, that the insurance does not duplicate sick leave benefits.

I am now pleased to advise the House that the Ontario hospital services commission will extend its policy in relation to fringe benefits for public hospital employees. The commission will now accept as an allowable expense of hospital operation, half of the cost for both hospital and medical insurance at the family rate. This policy will be introduced with effect from today, April 1, 1965, and the operating details will be worked out between the commission and the various public hospitals concerned. This is expected to add a further $2 million to the gross annual cost of hospital operation, and will bring the total paid for fringe benefits by public hospitals to their employees, to an estimated $11 million.

This change in policy is part of a programme to provide hospitals, within reasonable bounds, with the greatest possible freedom in negotiating levels of remuneration and working conditions for hospital employees.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Health if it is normal procedure for mail addressed to patients in Penetanguishene to be opened by officials of the institution.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, the answer is that mail received at Penetanguishene for patients is not opened routinely, but if there is reason to believe that the contents will be detrimental to the patients or to the security of the institution, it is opened.

As an example of this, about a year ago a parcel mailed to a patient was opened because of suspicion which arose in the minds of the staff, and it was found to contain a fully loaded revolver.

You will understand, Mr. Speaker, that this is a maximum security institution and it is quite essential that we take every possible precaution for the patients' safety and for that of the staff.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. Minister a supplementary question?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I will hear the question.

Mr. Bryden: Pardon?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I will hear the question first.

Mr. Bryden: Has any mail addressed to Fred Fawcett recently been opened at Penetanguishene and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Yes. A letter was received a few days ago addressed to Fred Fawcett and there was a legend on the outside of the envelope which gave the staff cause for concern, and for that reason it was opened.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I should like to address to the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts), a copy of which he has received.

Has the government been able to get any assurance that the opportunity for FAME to renegotiate its purchase of the Fearman plant will remain open until after the report of the judicial inquiry has been made?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would say first that Farmers' Allied Meat Enterprises Co-operative Limited has continued to deal with the Fearman company and would be the party to whom such an assurance would be given.

I am given to understand, however, that the Fearman company, while leaving the door open for negotiation, has reserved to itself the right to make a deal with any other interested party, and it must be understood that when the due date passed, FAME then was left with no legal rights in the matter at all.

This parallels the situation which existed before the shareholders of FAME requested the government to conduct a complete investigation into the affairs of FAME and its relation to other farm organizations.

At the present time I will say that we will continue the efforts we are now making to assist in any way possible in FAME's contacts with other farm organizations.

Mr. F. R. Oliver (Grey South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. Prime Minister if the inquiry is under way?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Oh, yes. Mr. Speaker, we have asked the presiding commissioner to proceed with all despatch. The full background of the situation has been explained to him and he understands. He is proceeding with the utmost speed to complete the investigation.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I have here answers to 24 more questions that are on the order paper: questions 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 53, 58, 59, 60, 61, 64, 65, 67, 68, 69 and 84.

The hon. Prime Minister tabled answers to questions as follows:

38. Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Inquiry of the Ministry: (1) How many applications were made in Ontario for legal aid in the year 1964, or for the last complete year for which records are available? (2) Of those applications received in the year 1964 or for the last complete year for which records are available, how many applicants received legal aid?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

(1) According to the report of the provincial director of legal aid for the year 1963 (last available), 13,269 applications were made for legal aid in Ontario.

(2) Of the above applications, 11,956 applicants received legal aid.

39. Mr. Singer: Inquiry of the Ministry: Of those applicants who were refused legal aid in the year 1964 or for the last complete year for which records are available, how many were refused by reason of the means test which was applied?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

According to the report of the secretary of the Ontario legal aid plan, no records are available of the number of applicants who were refused legal aid by reason of the means test.

County and district directors of the legal aid plan have a wide discretion in granting legal aid. In all criminal cases, they give the benefit of the doubt to the applicant in granting legal aid, and in civil cases legal aid is usually granted also. The applicant is requested to pay some fee whenever his ability to make such contribution is established.

40. Mr. Singer: Inquiry of the Ministry: How many lawyers, rendering legal aid in the year 1964 or for the last complete year for which records are available, recommended criminal appeals after convictions of their legal aid clients?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

According to the report of the secretary of the Ontario legal aid plan, there are no records for either the year 1963 or 1964, indicating how many lawyers rendering legal aid, recommended criminal appeals after convictions of the legal aid clients.

Note: Regulation 6 of the Ontario legal aid plan states as follows:

Legal aid should not include the following matters:

(8) Appeals, except where in the opinion of the provincial director, on the report of the county director, there appears to have been a miscarriage of justice.

(See also answer to question 41.)

41. Mr. Singer: Inquiry of the Ministry: How many such appeals in the year 1964, or for the last complete year for which records are available, were in fact carried forward under legal aid?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

In 1964, the provincial director of the Ontario legal aid plan received 13 requests for appeals in criminal cases.

These were disposed of as follows:

(a) Eight were carried forward under the legal aid.

(b) In two cases, the legal aid committee assisted the applicants by way of opinion and advice in connection with their appeals.

(c) Three applications were refused.

42. Mr. Singer: Inquiry of the Ministry: (1) Of the recommendations for appeals made in the year 1964, or for the last complete year for which records are available, how many were not carried forward because sufficient money was not available to provide for the cost of the transcript of evidence? (2) How many convicted persons in the year 1964, or in the last year for which complete records are available, have been unable to appeal their convictions and/or sentence because of their inability to obtain a transcript of the evidence taken at their trial?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

(1) If an appeal under the legal aid plan is recommended, the transcript of evidence is made available under the plan.

(2) No such records are available.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF REFORM INSTITUTIONS

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Mr. Chairman, in presenting the estimates of The Department of Reform Institutions, I take this opportunity to reiterate and emphasize the philosophy and policies of my department. Our philosophy is that which is recognized by all modern correctional jurisdictions, and our policies are designed to implement that philosophy, with vigour, energy, and all the resources at our command.

We work on the premise that all offenders must be evaluated and assessed in such a way as will indicate the most effective programme for their social orientation. And, sir, we have some very good resources. In our Mimico clinics, we have a fine programme for dealing with offenders who are drug addicts and alcoholics.

In the guidance centre and the treatment centre at Brampton we have as progressive, as intense, as enlightened and effective a programme as can be found anywhere, dealing with these types of offenders.

We have a most progressive unit at our neuro-psychiatric clinic at Guelph and, incidentally, the TB hospital there is the only one of its kind in a corrective institution in this country.

And as for open institutions, it is just not possible to have so-called "open institutions" that are more open than ours—institutions relying entirely on classification and psychological restraint coming from within the inmate, so that physical measures can be reduced to the absolute minimum—no locks, no bars, no fences—physical methods of restraint completely absent.

At the forestry camp at Hillsdale, the only man on duty at night is a night watchman and he is an inmate. This is minimum security at its best. There was not one inmate who even attempted to escape in the last five years. Not a single one. This is a credit, sir, to the staff charged with the responsibility of classifying inmates and choosing those suitable for such institutions. I doubt if there is a better system of minimum security with the same good record anywhere.

We have a fine classification system. We have a most varied programme, which is one of our strengths. I think it would be difficult, also, to find a system of comparable size with more varied training and treatment methods and a more detailed classification and segregation system.

However, even though I am aware of the many strengths of the department's policies, I am equally aware of many things which remain to be done and I freely admit this. There will always remain much to be done and we will be ready to move forward to those things which appear to offer advances as they develop. That is progress.

I have read literally hundreds of briefs, brochures, books, theses—yes, and every word from Hansard for the past ten years relating to correction—and from all these I have sought guidance for the future. I evaluate all this and if, from any reliable source, we find suggestions of merit, we study them with a view to adapting whatever is sound, progressive and practical.

One problem we must face is the necessity of directing our resources to their most effective area, and in this connection, experts in the field of correction point out that there are four different types of people undergoing sentence:

First, there are those who seek help, and may be able to be helped.

Second, there are those who refuse to be helped, regardless of whether or not it might be beneficial.

There is, unfortunately, a third group whose condition has become chronic. They have, as a result of the aging process, suffered a true decline in both physical and mental powers. It is quite evident to all who know them well, that they can no longer maintain themselves. A good number of this group, generally referred to as the chronic petty offenders, do not, in my view, belong in our corrective institutions as they are structured today. This is a subject which is engaging the attention of many of us who look forward to some early developments in this field.

Finally, there are the troublemakers. Some of these persons are particularly quarrelsome and even inclined to take legal action on little or no foundation. They show a lack of sympathy and of sentiment. They do not understand other people. They have few, if any, true friends. They are basically extremely egotistical, selfish and thoughtless of the rights, property and feelings of others. Their troublemaking grows out of their dominating selfishness, their lack of human understanding and their craving for prestige, plus a constant warfare with persons who have crossed their path. They may be a danger to their fellow inmates and to staff alike. Their own ideas are sacred to them and must not be questioned. Where they are associated with others, either in their own families, in social groups, or on the job, their touchiness is a source of continual discord.

It is from this group that well-intentioned people sometimes draw their source material for making strong pleas on behalf of the inmate, either for his comfort or his rehabilitation, believing that what can be done for one inmate can be done for all inmates. Unfortunately, this is just not so. But we must exert every effort to help these people, whatever the type.

In helping them we recognize their types. We recognize that these types need different levels of security or custody. We have, as mentioned, very open institutions. Equally necessary are institutions organized under strict security conditions. As in some cases, a great degree of custody is imperative for the protection of the public.

I say this, fully realizing that for some people the term custodial conditions is anathema to their ideals. I recall very vividly the many charges made in past years against the department—that it is custodial minded—and Hansard is replete with this oft-repeated and much abused phrase. I would like to deal with this concern about the alleged emphasis on custody in our system.

Let me say at the outset that any serious-minded person involved in corrections is aware of the dilemma in our work. We are attempting to rehabilitate people whilst at the same time we are their custodians. Or to put it more bluntly, in the case of a great number, particularly adults, we are attempting to be doctors and jailers at the same time. We are in the difficult position of attempting to gain the confidence and trust of an offender whilst at the same time restricting his freedom. A most difficult task.

I am certain that the basis for much of the criticism directed at corrections authorities is not so much criticism of a particular aspect of a correctional programme, including ours, but—whether the well-meaning critics believe it or not—is criticism of the whole concept of penal institutions as such. In principle, I agree that it would be easier to obtain a therapeutic atmosphere with incarceration. Nevertheless—and this is the whole basis of the dilemma—no one has, as yet, produced an effective substitute for it.

If a man breaks a law, society insists that he be punished, in some fashion, for his crime. It may be rationalized as punishment for wrongdoing, for security purposes, as a deterrent, or for corrective purposes. Whatever the reason, society insists that the offender be restricted in his movements. Whether that restriction is confined to a probationary type of restriction—that is, outside an institution—depends on the nature of the offence and the number of previous convictions. Even probation presupposes that at some stage repeating offenders will have to be imprisoned.

Within the limits of our present knowledge of this complex matter, there is no other way, certainly none that I have heard of. And until such time as some modern Solomon comes up with the answer, I am afraid that we shall just have to bear the slings and arrows of those who are constantly irritated by the present correctional systems—even though they have no other solution. So custody is needed and can, if used intelligently, be of benefit in the reformation of the offender.

I want to emphasize that our modern approach, our efforts towards rehabilitation, do not mean that we are in any way mollycoddling the offender. It is wrong to think that because of the many services used in the rehabilitation process, prison is in any way becoming a soft touch. To some it may appear so, but in fact, it is just the reverse. In the old days the repeater had grown used to prison routine. He knew what to expect. He knew how he was expected to behave. He sometimes even knew what to do in order to get himself a cushy job, sit there and wait until his release.

This is no longer true. Inmates today are constantly being made to face up to the fact that they have many commitments to themselves and to society. They are involved in group and individual therapy programmes and are assessed by their peers. This often hurts, because it is not so easy to manipulate your colleagues as it is outsiders.

They are made to think, and think deeply. This is most disturbing to many of them and prison is, in fact, a far greater challenge to the old lead-swinger, the repeater, than it used to be. We demand so much more from them.

Sometimes, however, there is a danger of misinterpretation on the part of offenders. In our anxiety to improve our corrective processes we must be most careful not to give offenders the impression that we are sympathetic to the view many of them hold—that is, that they are really the innocent ones and that their troubles lie not within themselves, but with society, the police, the courts and the correctional institutional staff.

This is what we must be most careful to avoid. We must always make it quite clear to the offender that he is in the institution because he has broken the law, and that the staff in the institution will do everything in their power to help him straighten himself out. They will give him every opportunity to change his ways but, and this is a most important but, he must in no way be encouraged to feel that public sympathy for penal reform in any way implies that it is the law enforcement agencies, the courts, and our staff who are on trial, with the idea that they are in some way the guilty ones rather than the inmate.

Hon. members may find it interesting to know that many of the offenders with whom I have talked, in answer to my questioning as to why they committed some petty crime, answered time and again, almost word for word, "I thought I could get away with it". This emphasizes the necessity to give strong support to our law enforcement agencies, so that they can do an effective job, so as to deter potential lawbreakers from getting into trouble in the first place.

I am most anxious that the public be made aware of the need for its co-operation in the rehabilitation of offenders in our care, but I am just as anxious that the public be aware of the need to support their law enforcement officers and agencies in carrying out their work as effectively as possible. Without any doubt, an effective police force is our most potent weapon in the fight against crime. It is our duty to support it as much as possible.

Rehabilitation is, of course, another weapon in our fight against crime. We place great emphasis upon it. However, in fairness to my staff, there is a most important fact which should be brought to the attention of this House: It is a more difficult task to rehabilitate inmates today than it was ten years ago. The reason may not be obvious to the layman, but to those in this field it is clear. Ten years ago probation services in this province were in their early stages of development. Today they have been greatly improved.

Perhaps I might read you an extract from a letter received in our department a year ago from the inspector of penal institutions in another province. This short extract is most interesting and I quote:

I hope to send two men to Ontario next year to take a look at Danny Coughlan's probation service, as personally I feel the Ontario probation service is the best organization of its kind in Canada.

Now, Mr. Chairman, probation service is, of course, under The Department of the Attorney General, even though this letter was written to a member of our department. I agree—it is a fine service, and it is doing most excellent work—but one result of that fine work is that those who labour in our corrective institutions are for the most part engaged in the complex, stubborn, difficult task of trying to rehabilitate those who have failed on probation and in many instances, not just once, but several times.

In other words, by the time we get them, we are dealing with those who have not responded to anything else. They have not felt the influence of family life. They have gone through the social and family agencies, children's aid societies, other welfare groups and even the vastly improved probation services. At what is apparently the end of the road—the road they have continued to tread even though all these other people have tried to help them—they are sent to us. Is it any wonder that by this time, rehabilitation is a most difficult task?

Difficult, but by no means hopeless. We never give up. But some people seem to think of rehabilitation as something like a surgical operation, they almost infer that maladjustment can be almost cut out of an inmate. Take a certain approach, give them a certain type of treatment and care, and viola! We have a rehabilitated citizen.

These people, well meaning though they may be, just fail to understand the problem. A comprehensive programme, directed by specialists of many disciplines, is the only known, effective treatment, not only in the adult field but in the juvenile field as well, and in our department, dealing with both the adult and juveniles, we have probably the largest treatment team of any correctional department in Canada.

We employ either on a full- or part-time basis, 77 teachers; 39 trade training instructors; 18 chaplains; 27 doctors; 29 nurses; 18 psychologists; 8 psychological assistants; 17 psychiatrists; 11 social workers and 60 rehabilitation officers.

In all, 225 full-time and 79 part-time treatment and training staff as of today's date.

I realize that it is easy for us to say we have the largest treatment team, but of course we also have more offenders than any other province, having as we do, the largest population. However, I am convinced that we also have the largest treatment staff in terms of percentages.

Now, I said earlier that all offenders must be evaluated, indicating the most effective programme for them at all times, and I emphasize the phrase, "at all times," because we firmly believe that the period immediately after arrest or sentencing, the first time a man is in jail, the time he spends in the local jail, has a great effect on his future conduct. Those who can be helped should be evaluated and receive that help at that time and this is the area which, insofar as the local jail is concerned, has, at least to this moment, been completely overlooked.

Most of the present local jails are inadequate for today's needs, many of them being nearly or even more than 100 years old.

This is why we have spent a great deal of time promoting the regional detention and classification centres plan. The main purpose of this is to encourage county councils to amalgamate their jails with neighbouring counties in establishing one unit to serve a number of municipalities. We have met with many councils during the past year to discuss this project. With the increasing use of pre-sentence reports, the new units will provide proper interview facilities for probation officers and medical and psychiatric evaluation where indicated. Adequate segregation of the various types of inmates will be made possible in the new centres. Proper facilities for visits by relatives, lawyers, and so on, will also be provided in the new centres.

Our studies reveal that about 40 per cent of people committed to jail do not require maximum security. Consequently the new units will be planned to accommodate this section of the jail population in a minimum security setting with provision for a meaningful work programme.

This government has approved a grant of 50 per cent of construction costs to any group of counties which will build and operate an approved regional detention and classification centre. Action has already been taken in a number of counties, which have approved in principle the establishment of such units in their areas, and we are hopeful that agreements will shortly be signed, implementing the plans in those areas.

I want to say here that the people and the councillors in these municipalities have responded in a very gratifying fashion. They are making a fine contribution to a progressive and forward-looking plan, realizing that this will be a major breakthrough in this field, not only from an economical point of view, but also for the rehabilitation of the offender. And when these units are established, Ontario will again provide the lead for the rest of country and even the continent.

Activity at the department's staff training school continues to centre around training of custodial officers from adult institutions and supervisors from training schools. For the first time in the history of the department, we held week-long seminars for senior custodial and supervisory personnel. These seminars were designed to acquaint our officials with recent trends in corrections, to discuss the philosophy of the department and to bring and keep our staff up to date on changes within the service. Some 66 senior officers attended such seminars in 1964.

The major emphasis in terms of numbers and time continues to be with junior personnel with less than a year's service. We have recently moved away from mere content in courses. We are now primarily concerned with a modification and sharing of attitudes. Personnel often enter this field with preconceived notions about prisoners, preconceived attitudes towards them and preconceived ideas of what their job should be. Some of these attitudes are more positive than others. Sometimes attitudes can be placed, as can the attitudes of the general public, at a level varying between highly negative and highly positive.

It is our job to try to modify attitudes where necessary in such a direction as to ensure that the aim and purpose of our correctional policy and practice will be enhanced. We encourage our staff to develop with prisoners the kind of relationships which are most likely to contribute to this aim.

For example, most prisoners tend to have highly negative attitudes towards authority figures. Therefore, one of our aims is to help prisoners see authority figures more positively, as reasonable people. To do this, it follows that authority figures act in reasonable ways in dealing with prisoners. Because custodial officers have the closest kind of relationships with prisoners on an eight-hour-a-day basis they are in the key position with respect to changing attitudes about authority.

It is vital, therefore, that custodial officers have the right set of attitudes themselves. The rehabilitative process takes place essentially at this level. Work by psychologists, social workers and psychiatrists, will be of little avail if the relationships between custodial officer and prisoner are damaging ones.

It is for these reasons then that we are most concerned about training our staff in a basic understanding of prisoners and see prisoners as people with certain kinds of problems.

In the last year, 64 custodial officers and 33 training school supervisors have received such training. We also rely on the positive attitudes found in our institutions to amplify some of the modifications that have occurred as a result of the course. It is a continuing process and it takes many years to make a good correctional worker.

Currently we are attempting to ascertain with some degree of precision, just what are the attitudes of staff prior to training and immediately after training, and some months after training. In this connection, we are developing an attitude-scale test, in the hope that it may effectively measure attitudes. Attitude measurement is, of course, fraught with difficulty and it may well be some months before meaningful results are obtained.

Our director of staff development, Mr. Douglas Penfold, feels that the calibre of custodial officer trainees has improved over the past few years.

We plan to expand the seminar type of training of senior staff. This group ranges from superintendents, assistant superintendents, rehabilitation officers, to office managers. Without this, one sometimes finds junior personnel who have been exposed recently to a form of training programme, more familiar with later correctional trends than some of their seniors. This kind of situation creates obvious difficulties. I personally participated in some of these courses and tests and appreciate the problems involved. They are many.

The department continues to provide financial support to staff members taking the three-year correctional course at McMaster University. Some 60 of our staff have been involved altogether, and 21 have graduated recently from this course, which has been accepted by the civil service commission as a standard of education requirements for certain positions within the department. McMaster University, at the request of our department, is currently engaged in polling correctional jurisdictions across the country to assess the feasibility of developing a correspondence course version. If this develops, the course will be available to staff members in our outlying institutions.

Once more, I ask hon. members to take note that there is no more comprehensive programme of staff training at all levels, available in this field in Canada. This is the very basis on which we build our programmes—ability, dedication and training of our staff. I have placed a great emphasis on it just as I have placed great emphasis on another aspect of rehabilitation and that is, research.

I think, as I have attempted to point out, that one should not oversimplify the problems inherent in producing and operating a rehabilitation programme. I must admit that in my early days in this portfolio, I had an idea that one could appoint more clinical personnel, listen to their advice, and arrive at great solutions. However, I found that they themselves, the expert psychiatrists of long standing and the psychologists, were loath to direct me in many situations, because they knew that there was no general agreement about the effectiveness of particular programmes. They told me that, dealing as we are with the problems of human behaviour—society's attitudes, anti-social, deviate and criminal actions—that the extent of knowledge in this area still leaves very, very much to be desired.

In consequence, I determined that even though there are no absolute answers, at least we could actively encourage research in this field and that, as it was within my power, I would establish the machinery for seeking out these so necessary guide lines.

The appointment of Professor Taduezy Grygier as director of research in April, 1964, has helped the department to utilize research data in shaping departmental policy. The new Training Schools Act, presently before this House, is an outstanding example of this. The bill introduced several weeks ago was based on social, psychological and legal research carried out by the director of research and his graduate students at the University of Toronto. His cross-appointment with the university has added an important channel of communication between the government and the resources of scholarship, research and professional education available solely in a university setting. I take this opportunity of expressing particular appreciation of the help received from the University of Toronto School of Social Work under the direction of Professor Charles E. Hendry.

In one research project on the attitude change in correctional staff following a new method of using psychiatric resources in a training school, Professor Grygier has been working closely with our director of staff development, and the director of research of the civil service commission, Dr. S. D. Saleh.

It is of great credit to the morale and the enlightened attitude of my staff that the research just mentioned was undertaken at the initiative of the superintendent of our training school at Simcoe, Mr. G. W. Stewart, and his staff.

In several other instances, initiative in research matters came neither from the university nor from our director of research, but from the staff of the institutions and of the head office of my department. We have been commended by the university people for the excellent co-operation which they have received in all cases from the staff at our institutions. The staff have not only helped in studying the offenders and the children in training schools under their care, but were willing to undergo various tests themselves. They understand that it is impossible to help effectively the offender or the child in trouble without taking a good look at the results of our operations and at the personnel called upon to do the job. This is further evidence, Mr. Chairman, that our department is always anxious for any new approach that holds out hope for advance.

A further conclusion from research data was that we need more specialized services, especially for the children classified up to the present time as unmanageable, and in the past as incorrigible. These children are neither unmanageable nor incorrigible, but have been deprived of necessary care and control by their parents and guardians and need a setting which a training school can provide. This was confirmed in a study by Mr. F. E. A. Ewald, now supervisor of casework services of the John Howard society of Ontario, who found, and I quote him:

Excellent evidence that Ontario training schools exert a positive influence on the value system of the children in their care.

This is particularly noticeable in units which, and I quote again:

—are small, with high staff/student ratio, or, if large, have a fair amount of structure and clearly stated rules, which help the children to know where they stand.

Later, when Dr. Grygier's studies were extended to private training schools, it was confirmed by Mr. John Cosson, now caseworker at the children's aid society in Guelph, that treatment suffers when staff/student ratio is insufficient. We know that correctional institutions throughout the world suffer from shortage of staff, especially professional staff. What was found in this particular study was the effect of insufficient staff on treatment. We, therefore, studied this matter further and took positive action to relieve that most acute shortage, insofar as the extent to which insufficient funds had been the cause, by providing for the subsidization of the complete operating costs of these private training schools as against a fixed per diem rate, which had obviously become inadequate.

The general conclusions from these studies was that the best set-up for a training school would be "one offering an intensive and flexible treatment programme within a clearly defined structure."

This is the basis of our present system, which will be developed on a more elaborate system as we go along. In general, as mentioned earlier, we have been always ready to implement recommendations based on research, wherever it has proved feasible. In this respect my department is now, with the possible exception of the state of California, a unique example of policy based on scientific evidence. I repeat, we pay great attention to those experts who base their judgment on scientific grounds.

Since 1960, the Canadian Journal of Corrections has been published, in abstract form, progress reports on all correctional research being carried out in Canada. When we reviewed these journals, we were pleased to note that a large portion of the research had been initiated and carried out in our department.

At the present time, Professor John Spencer and a team of eight graduate students from the school of social work at the University of Toronto, are carrying out a research project in four of our adult institutions, the purpose of which is to ascertain the effects of disciplinary action. This is a subject, incidentally, that has received little attention from research workers to date. We hope to have a similar team make a like study in our training schools. In some cases, research data have led us to a better utilization of existing resources, as in Port Bolster.

Time, of course, does not permit me to quote all the examples of research assisting our programme.

Another area in which great strides have been made during the year is in our chaplaincy department where, under the direction of the Reverend Maurice Fline, a most effective programme has been built up. Dr. Fline is a chaplain and also a doctor of philosophy in psychology and pastoral care. Through his direction, and initiated by this department, a consultative committee on chaplaincy affairs, representing the major denominations, has been formed, through which a total of 222 denominational representatives, responsible for weekly visits to all local jails in the province, have been appointed by the various religious denominations.

Full- and part-time chaplains have been appointed in many institutions, and a full-time Roman Catholic chaplain who has been appointed to the Mimico reformatory and clinics, has assumed responsibility as senior liaison chaplain to all Roman Catholic chaplains. A number of our newly appointed chaplains have had wide experience and they are conducting group counselling sessions; one, who is a specialist in clinical pastoral training is conducting sessions for chaplains, senior ordinands and other interested personnel. The benefits of group therapy conducted during the past few years amongst female narcotic addicts by a chaplain trained in such work, have now been effectively demonstrated. The impact of our growing chaplaincy department is being felt and I am satisfied that we now possess the nucleus of one of the finest chaplaincy departments in the field of corrections.

In the summer of 1964, a three-week orientation course in clinical pastoral training for 12 chaplains and interested clergy was held at the rehabilitation centre of the Andrew Mercer reformatory, with internship experience being offered at Mimico and Brampton. The success of this pilot project warrants the establishment of a three-month course this summer, which will be followed during the ensuing academic year by evening seminars for interested clergy, in the interviewing, counselling and treatment of offenders, and practical training sessions at our institutions for qualified ordinands and seminarians under the supervision of our most experienced chaplains.

We have a programme of treatment for addictions that has been built up over the years. We now operate four treatment centres for men and women who are addicted to alcohol or narcotics. Last year more than 800 men were treated for alcoholism at our clinics at Mimico. I am happy to say that, including those who attended our conference on addictions, more than 600 people came from all parts of Canada, and from abroad, in order to observe how our clinics are operated.

In this connection I have, this last week, authorized Mr. Frank Potts, our director of psychology, to accept an invitation from The Department of Hygiene for the state of New York to help advise on establishment there of a research institute on alcoholism. This shows their appreciation and the appreciation of other jurisdictions of the work being done in our department, and is a very great tribute to Mr. Potts.

Since 1955 our 32-bed neuro-psychiatric clinic at Guelph has been providing valuable services for those inmates who come to us suffering from some form of mental illness. There, a team of doctors, nurses, psychologists and psychiatrists establish a diagnosis and provide psychotherapy for all adult males who require it. It is interesting to note that a senior member of our treatment team at the neuro-psychiatric clinic is presently studying in Europe on a Nuffield travelling fellowship, further evidence of the esteem in which our professional staff is held.

In conjunction with the clinical complex at Mimico, we are planning a treatment programme for sex offenders. There is some evidence to believe that among convicted sex offenders there is a percentage who could be helped by modern therapeutic methods. It is, therefore, our intention to set up such a programme.

Another area in which we have a well established and effective treatment and training programme, is with female offenders. The programme for female offenders originates with intensive testing and assessment at the main Mercer reformatory. This includes intelligence, special aptitudes, and an evaluation of behaviour problems. From this total assessment, it is decided which programme available will be of most benefit to the inmate.

There is a milieu therapy unit for the addict in a separate building of the Mercer reformatory. There is a guidance centre at Brampton known as Ingleside for the younger offender who is capable of assimilating an intensive training programme. There is also at Brampton the treatment centre for offenders requiring intensive group and individual therapy. Presently this centre is concentrating on the female alcoholic.

There is obviously a number of female offenders who fit into none of these categories. These include the very short-term offenders, with whom we attempt rehabilitation training. We have industrial and a certain amount of vocational training—although it is obvious that stencillers and hairdressers cannot be trained in two months. This whole purposeful programme of rehabilitation bears comparison with anything else in this country for female offenders of this type and with this length of sentence.

There is no doubt that the King Street branch of Mercer is physically outdated and for that reason inhibits, at least in some aspects, our programme, and for that reason should be replaced. Since the early part of last year, plans for the replacement of this building were well advanced until the pronouncement by the Minister of Justice, that changes in our responsibilities were fairly imminent, caused us to reappraise our plans. However, the Minister's advisory council on the treatment of the offender is presently engaged in the planning of a new institution which will become part of the complex at Brampton.

I stated earlier that rehabilitation is not a surgical process. You cannot cut the wrongdoing out of man. But there is one area in which surgery can play its part, and that is in plastic surgery. It is quite likely that with some of our youngsters, physical deformities play some part in forming their attitudes and behaviour patterns. In consequence, we were gratified when, in 1964, Dr. Harold L. Silver, a distinguished plastic surgeon in Toronto, at my invitation very generously offered to perform plastic surgery without fee on any child or inmate in any of our institutions, providing there was evidence that such work would help rehabilitate that person. I should like at this time to express our very warm appreciation to Dr. Silver, and pay public tribute to him for this very generous, humane and helpful use of his skill as a plastic surgeon. It is our intention to formulate a research study around the work that Dr. Silver has been doing, which will enable us to establish its value in the rehabilitation process on those cases where plastic surgery has been utilized.

Mr. Chairman, we have made efforts to give greater readability to our annual reports. We have on occasion complained of the misreading of our statistics, of people taking wrong implications from figures provided by us, and, in fact, coming to completely erroneous conclusions. Hon. members will note that our report this year has some innovations designed to give a clearer statistical picture, and it is only a start, because changes in this field of statistics need to be made well in advance.

It is planned to collect information on behaviour whilst in custody, prognosis, evaluation of progress, and data from the parole and rehabilitation statistics, all of which can be mechanically collected and then evaluated. We are co-operating with other departments and organizations, and with the Dominion bureau of statistics, in the collection and evaluation of statistics, which can be meaningful for our work.

We are planning a farm training centre for a group of between 25 and 50 young men who are too handicapped by their limited ability to pursue further formal academic training, and who cannot meet the educational requirements of most of our skilled trades. Despite these limitations, many of them are strong workers, who take instruction willingly. We believe that by housing them together in a separate unit and employing them under experienced staff at farm work, they can be taught good work habits and the basic skills required for such work as general farming, market gardening, greenhouse work, poultry farming, and so on.

By providing training in such work and then placing them on some good farm, we believe that we will help them become not only self-supporting, but to find good homes for themselves as well. Also, by establishing this farm training centre, we will be reducing still further the population of the reformatory in Guelph, which is one of our objectives.

We are building a dormitory for 60 beds and a vocational training and academic building at the industrial farm, Fort William, where we are in the process of setting up a training centre for younger offenders from the Lakehead area. We hope to have in operation shortly the three vocational training shops for boys between the ages of 16 and 25. This will obviously have great benefit for the younger inmate who has the ability to take up a trade in this area. Furthermore, it is advisable, wherever possible, to encourage family visiting so that on his release an inmate has the assistance of family ties when he is trying to re-establish himself in society. The establishment of such a centre will enable us to extend our philosophy of open trade training institutions to the north of the province.

This was one factor in our decision to close the reformatory at Elliot Lake. We were finding that as time went on it was proving to be less effective, and in consequence, could no longer be justified in our total rehabilitation programme.

During the year we have made a good start on constructing chapels at Guelph and Brampton, stores at Burwash, and a motor mechanics trade training shop at Brampton. All these projects will be completed during the year. In addition, we intend to build an addition to the cannery in Guelph and a new laundry and reception building at the Burtch industrial farm.

During the year we began construction on a new forestry camp at Wendigo Lake, which is a few miles from South River. It is our intention to operate this camp as the minimum security section of the district jail at North Bay, just as our forestry camp near Thessalon is the minimum security section of the district jail at Sault Ste. Marie. We now have four forestry camps for adults and one for boys and we plan another similar camp for the coming year. In addition to their value in a rehabilitation programme, these camps are most useful in reducing the numbers at our larger institutions.

Finally, in the adult field, there is our parole and rehabilitation service. The work of the Ontario board of parole has grown steadily during the past year, and this is interesting in view of the Fauteux commission's recommendations for the abolition of the indefinite sentence and provincial parole boards which, incidentally, exist only in this province and in British Columbia. The increased number of indefinite sentences being given by the courts is evidence that the judiciary has confidence in our Ontario parole system.

Despite the increase in the number of paroles granted by the board, the percentage of failures has not risen, and this can be attributed to the expanded programme of the rehabilitation service. The purpose of parole is twofold—the rehabilitation of the offender and the protection of society. If a prisoner is reaching the end of his sentence and has given an indication that he has changed his outlook on life, and competent staff advise that he is ready to return to the community, it is far better, when possible, to release him under guidance and supervision, which can be done under parole, than to release him when his sentence is completely finished and no supervision and guidance is possible.

In this way society is protected and also relieved of the cost of institutional care, and the released person receives help in his adjustment back to the relative freedom of society, and encouraged and directed to accept his responsibilities and his role as a law-abiding citizen. We have rehabilitation staff located at all our institutions as well as at five outside offices throughout the province, and plans have been developed for additional offices and staff as the overall caseload increases, and staff becomes available.

There are many service organizations, religious organizations and private agencies that work closely with the department in the rehabilitation programme, and I wish at this time to thank them, on behalf of the government and the people of Ontario, for their interest and co-operation, and to commend them on the splendid job they are doing in this most challenging field of work.

One project involving co-operation between a private agency and our department is the pre-release day out which operates from the Mercer reformatory. This is most useful in giving the inmate the experience of a day back in society prior to release so that she may seek employment or make other arrangements before her release. Although there are restrictions as to some activities, the programme has proved to be a positive part of the rehabilitation programme, and the inmates have been most co-operative and enthusiastic. There could very well be an extension of this scheme, after further experience and evaluation.

Mr. Chairman, at this time I would like to pay a very sincere tribute to the staff of our training schools section and give a brief outline of the problems which face them and how they carry out their duties.

When children are committed to our care by the courts, they have, more often than not, been beyond the control of their parents and teachers for some considerable time. They have often been in the care of social workers for years. Individual foster homes and group foster homes have been tried, as has probation. After welfare agencies and a great number of social workers have tried every other kind of approach that communities have to offer, they come to us.

Surely it is not difficult, therefore, to imagine the problems the training school staff contend with—and why I am most anxious to give them every credit for doing such tremendously effective work in such a difficult task.

With respect to the development of training schools, we intend to introduce a good deal more variety into the programme as a whole. We do not intend to have our new schools patterned largely on the systems of the old. We must try a number of different types of treatment so that we can judge which is likely to produce the most effective progress with a particular type of child. We obviously cannot do this if we have the same programme for all. It is our intention, therefore, to examine a number of programmes that presently differ from our own—with a view to adopting any aspects of them which might appear to be at all suitable to our needs.

The past year has produced some major developments in the operation and administration of our training schools. In some areas we felt the time was ripe for another forward movement in developing the facilities and programmes of these schools.

The reasons warranting these new developments stem from: the substantial increase in the number of children being committed to training schools in recent years, which has resulted in some overcrowding, and the resultant strain which this has placed on existing facilities; the need to provide a more intensive classification system to assure that the individual needs of each child are not overlooked; the wisdom in developing more selective academic and vocational training facilities.

The overcrowding which has recently developed has inhibited the effectiveness of the training programme. In order to accommodate this ever-increasing enrolment, hon. members will recall the announcement I made in November, 1964 of the establishment of an Ontario training school for boys in northern Ontario. This school will be located in the Sudbury area and will accommodate 120 boys of all religious denominations. All costs, both capital and maintenance, will be assumed by this government.

This is a completely new departure from present policy. It will be the first inter-denominational training school and it will be the first training school in northern Ontario. Facilities will be included for the diagnosis of behaviour problems so that any child requiring intensive clinical care may be transferred to a treatment centre at an early age. Provisions will be made for academic and vocational training programmes in keeping with The Department of Education standards.

Presently, boys sent to training schools from northern Ontario must travel great distances to our schools which are in the southern section of the province. The location of this school will now make it possible for parents to visit their sons, who previously were unable to do so because of the long distances involved.

In addition to the school in northern Ontario, as hon. members now know, we have purchased the RCAF station at Hagersville, thereby obtaining facilities which will further reduce the population in other training schools. The new school at Hagersville will provide:

(a) A vocational training school for older boys.

(b) A complex of small cottage homes for the younger boys.

(c) Additional facilities which will enable us to revise and intensify our classification system.

Incidentally, it is interesting, especially in view of the many statements made about the increase in juvenile delinquency, to report that the number of children committed to training schools in this province over the past ten years shows very little variation per 100,000 of juvenile population.

In addition to expanding our present facilities to take care of the multiple needs of the children under our care, my department has, as mentioned earlier, just recently made changes concerning the financing of the private training schools.

The government will now assume the full operating costs of the private training schools, putting them on an equal financial basis to the eight Ontario training schools operated by the department. With a need to expand their services, the private schools have found it increasingly difficult to continue the high standards of treatment and training necessary in this field. Therefore, this new policy is a most beneficial step forward in providing greater financial aid to these Roman Catholic schools, in order that they may carry out the essential work they are doing with the juveniles entrusted to their care.

It has been well said that the cost of maintaining training schools such as ours is an investment. By the nature of the difficult correctional work involved, these schools cannot fail to be costly, but where an effective training programme is properly implemented, the cost is offset by dividends which will be of great benefit in the years to come.

The training schools advisory board in its annual report has indicated that consideration should be given to the establishment of a recall centre for those children who have failed while on placement from our schools and have to be returned for a further period of training. Placement officers are encouraged to return those wards to school who are not making a satisfactory adjustment to their placement, rather than be satisfied with repeated warnings to the child which, if unheeded, may even eventually result in the child getting into more serious trouble. While this procedure does not normally cause too great a disturbance, the superintendents of our schools have also indicated that the return to the school of wards who have been convicted of new offences does sometimes create difficulties, and has a disturbing influence on the rest of the students. Their findings are in line with the recommendation of the training schools advisory board regarding a recall centre.

We are, therefore, presently doing preliminary research and planning for a special recall adjustment centre which would analyze causes of failure to adjust on placement; where required, it would provide a more intensified training and treatment programme for this particular group.

Progress in the modernization of treatment techniques within our schools continues to be the focus of our attention, and we now have clinical treatment teams functioning in all our training schools. Every effort is being directed to the recruitment of professional staff so that each of our schools may eventually become a fully equipped treatment centre.

Mr. Chairman, much has been recorded and much has been said about the emotionally disturbed child. I will paraphrase a statement which I read a short while ago, and it runs something like this:

I can understand the feelings of those who make speeches on behalf of the emotionally disturbed, neglected and otherwise underprivileged children. But when the members who make these speeches go to sleep at night, filled with the virtue that affects all of us when we make such speeches, they should not forget that as they sleep, other people are sitting up long into the night, trying to achieve the very objective which was the main purpose of making those speeches.

This is very pertinent, I believe, and very true.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Is that what you do?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Yes, sir. There have been suggestions that many of the children committed to training schools should not have been sent there because they were emotionally disturbed, but that they should have been admitted to some other type of institution. I would be the first to admit that there are emotionally disturbed children in training schools. In fact, the majority of the children in our training schools are emotionally disturbed to some degree and perhaps this can probably be said of practically everyone in society. It is a matter of degree.

However, almost all the very many social histories I have studied, indicated that these children required the controls, training and treatment that are offered in a training school. It has been advocated that many of the children presently in our schools could be better rehabilitated if placed in small residential units directly from the court, after classification and diagnosis, rather than in one of our present training schools. Well, we have this type of residential unit within our training schools system.

Many hon. members no doubt know that my department operates such a small school at Port Bolster, called Trelawney House, accommodating 20 girls. The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Trotter) had great words of praise for that training school.

In regard to the suggestion that many children should not be sent to training schools, but to some sort of outside residential school, it is interesting to note that this school, Trelawney House, is not at the moment up to full capacity with girls of this type. You may well ask: What is the reason for this, when so many girls are being committed by the courts? The reason is that after testing and diagnosis at the reception and diagnostic centre at Galt, very few girls could be immediately recommended for this type of open setting. Girls who were sent to Trelawney House when the prognosis looked poor, and where the controls of one of the other schools was indicated, did not adjust, and eventually had to be transferred to another school.

So the suggestion that we have many youngsters who would be suitable for immediate transfer to such small units or schools, is just not factual. This does not, however, preclude the value of this type of unit. Initial research has indicated that after a short stay in one of the larger schools, there are more children in a better position to take advantage of the small residential unit. Therefore, we intend to plan small residential centres of various types which would accommodate approximately 15 children, who would be transferred to this small residence after a period of training in an ordinary training school.

These units would be satellites of a larger school, but dispersed throughout the district in various communities. It is intended that these small units will become part of the community, the children attending the local schools, and taking an active part in community activities, as in the case at Port Bolster. Eventually the child would be returned to his own home or placed in a foster home from here, as is now done under our placement system.

Now, in 1960, the department established a 30-bed diagnostic and treatment centre for girls at Galt. By so doing, we were able to have a clinical team made up of a teacher, social worker, psychologist and psychiatrist establish a diagnosis on all girls committed to our care by the courts. When the diagnosis has been established, they are sent to the appropriate training school. A proportion of them remain on at the diagnostic and treatment centre for treatment, if this is indicated. This procedure has proved so successful that we propose to expand this operation by utilizing an additional building for this purpose at the training school in Galt. This will enable us to strengthen the treatment team there, expand our treatment services and relieve the regular training school at Galt of those girls who require more treatment or control than that school could offer.

Emphasis on programmed activities in each school continues to be stressed. These activities have included the active participation of the students in community recreational programmes and has also included the involvement of the community in recreational and social activities held at each school. Last June I had the opportunity to be in attendance at the commencement exercises held at the girls training school at Galt. This function is held each year at the end of the regular academic school year. The auditorium was filled to capacity with parents and interested citizens of the community. It was a most impressive and heart-warming ceremony to see the look of pride and accomplishment on each girl's face as she came forward to the front of the auditorium to be rewarded for her efforts and work in the school during the past year.

After the ceremony, girls, parents and friends mingled together creating a most informal atmosphere, with little groups wandering throughout the school. On display in the auditorium was a large variety of craft projects made by the girls. These articles were for sale and the money derived from this endeavour is being used by the girls to maintain a foster child in Greece. This, I submit, is indicative of the atmosphere within our training schools.

As with adults, the after-care programme is also important in the juvenile field. Each school has a review board which sees a child at different intervals during his or her stay in the school. A review board usually consists of the superintendent, psychologist or social worker, teacher, housemaster, or house-mother and reviews the progress of each child, making recommendations for changes in the child's training programme as a result of this case conference.

The final recommendation is to the training schools advisory board concerning the child's placement from the school. It is at this stage that many of these unfortunate youngsters, who have no decent families of their own, who belong to no one who cares, are really brought into sharp perspective. It is here that our placement officers take over and show a youngster that he is not really alone, that there is somebody ready to help. The placement officer will locate a foster home for the child, who will also require supervision and a friend to call on him and guide him. This, too, is the role of the placement officer. This child may get into difficulties; his readjustment will not be an easy process. The community is not always ready to accept him. The role of the placement officer is, therefore, not an easy one. He must enlist the aid of the community if the child is to be successfully rehabilitated. This he accomplishes by understanding and interpreting to the community the real needs of these children, sympathy, love and a helping hand.

The placement and rehabilitation programme has proved invaluable in supplying resource information from the community while the child is still in our school, as well as assisting the girl or boy on returning to the community, whether it is to his own home, foster home, or work placement. The rehabilitation officer then does a service which is quite extensive, including: liaison with school principals and teachers for those children who will be returning to the local school on graduation; securing foster homes for youngsters who require this type of placement; obtaining employment and a boarding home for the older child on graduation; arranging for extracurricular activities such as the Boy Scouts, YMCA, YWCA, sporting activities and so on, all designed to help a youngster re-establish himself in the community. There is no doubt as to the success of this service. However, we are never satisfied with its intensity, and intend to expand as the case load increases and as staff becomes available.

Our training schools have played host to many visitors during the past year, including staff from government and private treatment centres, students from teachers' colleges, community service associations and so on. Many have expressed publicly their commendation of the work being carried on by the superintendents and their devoted staffs.

The new training schools Act, which I have mentioned in connection with research, is evidence of our intention to plan our facilities in conjunction with changes in our programme. This is exactly what we have done with the new Act. The Act creates a completely new philosophy in respect of youngsters coming into our training schools' system, that is, youngsters who have not been judged delinquent, but who are sent to training school because a judge is convinced that they need the facilities available to them and, in addition, neither their parents nor any other organization is able to provide for their special needs. This new legislation expresses most aptly the philosophy of the department.

I have reported to you a most detailed and carefully considered year's work, and I have indicated areas in which we are making great advances. I want hon. members to know, that without any shadow of doubt, the staff of my department are among the most hard-working and dedicated of civil servants. They are doing a magnificent job in a most difficult field, perhaps the most difficult in all of the government. It is to their great credit that I am able at this time to announce such an active and purposeful programme as I have in my department.

I regret that, since September, my deputy Minister has been away ill, and I would like to thank publicly Mr. Leo Hackl, the assistant deputy Minister, and indeed all the staff, for the way they have assisted me and have carried the extra burden caused by Mr. Graham's absence, and an especially heavy workload. I must particularly thank, in addition to my own staff, the religious orders operating the private training schools and commend them for the fine work they are doing. I refer to the Sisters of Our Lady of Charity of the Good Shepherd who operate St. Mary's training school at Downsview, and the Christian Brothers of St. John de LaSalle who operate the two schools for boys, St. John's at Uxbridge and St. Joseph's at Alfred.

In addition, I am very grateful for the strong support given to me by so many volunteer workers in this field, including the Minister's advisory council on the treatment of the offender, the training schools advisory board and the planning committee for the new detention and classification units.

I should like, Mr. Chairman, to conclude with a brief recapitulation of progress made during the past year alone:

1. We have built a new forestry camp at Wendigo Lake, an open air camp which will also help reduce the size of our larger institutions.

2. We are completing a new training centre for young men at Fort William.

3. We supported actively the establishment of the centre of criminology with a large grant and continuing close co-operation of the department.

4. A director of research was appointed.

5. We have completely evaluated our statistical methods.

6. We are reorganizing our information services.

7. We have reorganized administrative positions within the department, creating new senior posts for greater effectiveness. These are administrators in charge of adult male institutions, adult female institutions, training schools and inspections and jails.

8. We have strengthened our chaplaincy services, and built chapels in many of our institutions.

9. We have met with judges and magistrates and set up an organized programme for them to visit our institutions.

10. We have actively promoted a plan for the replacement of the old county jails with modern regional detention and classification centres, and we are offering a 50 per cent grant toward the cost of their construction.

11. We have held a most successful clinical conference on addictions and have arranged for this to be an annual function.

12. We have closed the reformatory at Elliot Lake in accordance with our policy of locating institutions only where they can maintain effective services.

13. We have been actively engaged in planning a new women's institution to replace the King Street branch of the Mercer reformatory.

14. We began to make practical use of plastic surgery as a tool in the rehabilitation process and will carry on research as to the results.

15. We have reorganized our method of hiring teachers under a new system of contract hiring, with a larger allocation of funds, which should finally solve our teacher shortage problem.

16. We introduced a completely new financing system for the Roman Catholic private training schools, at considerable extra cost to the government.

17. We proceeded on the establishment of an interdenominational training school in northern Ontario.

18. We purchased facilities for the two new training school units which are to be opened in the spring at Hagersville.

19. We have completely rewritten The Training Schools Act.

20. We have established a consultative committee on regional detention and classification units, and

21. We have strengthened and enlarged our staff training programme.

I would ask all hon. members, Mr. Chairman, to indicate their concurrence in this most extensive programme and our policies by the approval of these estimates, thus paving the way for another year of meaningful progress in this most important field of corrections.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

On vote 1901:

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Chairman, in listening to the hon. Minister's 21 points at the end of his speech I was reminded of Mr. Drew's 22 points and I hope that there is more substance in what the hon. Minister has to offer than in what Mr. Drew had to offer.

This is a department that over the years has been neglected and I do hope that a new Minister will be a new broom and sweep things clean and bring about a lot of improvements, because after all, if we look back at 1950, 35 per cent of the inmates in reform institutions were in those institutions at least twice, or more often, and today we find that nearly half of the inmates of reform institutions have been in there twice or more. In other words, things have been getting worse instead of better, despite the efforts that have seemingly been made.

Now, if we are to believe the hon. Minister, things are going to improve in the future and a lot more is going to be done. I am still going to be sceptical; I have a right as many have a right, not to be just sceptical but to be cynical at the whole programme of the reform institutions department as we look at the record from what we have read and from what we have learned from other people who have been associated directly or indirectly with penal reform over the last number of years.

Certainly the one matter of which we on this side of the House made an issue—Mercer reformatory—is still standing. We are still being told that they are actively considering making a change and, again, I have to keep throwing back the old story that must be told and retold, that for 44 years this government has been going to do something about that building.

The hon. Minister said that Mercer reformatory for women compares favourably with anything in this country. Again I remind him that this country ranks 44th according to the United Nations and comparison with the rest of the country just is not nearly good enough. It is a mighty feeble excuse that the hon. Minister has when he mentions Mercer reformatory. To me, as I have said before, Mercer reformatory has become a symbol; it has been standing for years and it is an indication to me of the attitude of this department. Now maybe this attitude is changing but I will tell you this, that the report that was handed down by the advisory council to the hon. Minister is nothing but evidence that he will go out of his way to cover up the sins of commission and omission that have been committed.

Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt in my mind that the report of the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions' advisory council was nothing but a whitewash report. The government has been embarrassed because of what has been revealed at the Mercer reformatory and is making a very ineffectual attempt to cover up what has long been known to many people. It is most unfortunate that a new Minister should make such an attempt to cover up the inadequacies of the present system of reform institutions.

It would be impossible to blame the new Minister for all that has gone wrong or taken place over the past number of years. Certainly we can blame the present administration for what has taken place over the last 22 years, but this has been, for the hon. Minister, a marvellous opportunity to come forward and to admit quite frankly that many changes had to be made. Instead of that, he has gone to ridiculous lengths to cover up a sordid situation at Mercer reformatory and I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that the fact that this situation could exist at Mercer reformatory for so long is an indication of the thinking, of the energy or lack of energy, in The Department of Reform Institutions.

Earlier this year, Father S. G. West, an Anglican priest in the city of Toronto, who has taken a great interest in penal reforms, had this to say:

—York county grand jury published its report on the Mercer reformatory in Toronto. It was an adverse report which in the main was true enough. It has been to some extent supported by the Elizabeth Fry society of Ontario. Denials and re-creminations spattered over the air and in the press. The Minister of Reform Institutions arranged for an investigation by his rather hand-picked advisory committee and most of us forgot about it.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I want to remind Father West and everybody here that we on this side of the House are not going to forget about it. This is something that should be cleaned up now. The government has had literally years, it has been advised by its own select committees of this House, it has been advised by individuals learned in penology that they should get rid of this place, and even the hon. Minister today says "We are actively considering it." It is no use blaming the federal government. This place should have been removed long ago, long before there was any change and any responsibilities of the provincial and federal government.

In a letter of November 10, 1964, to its members and its supporters, the Elizabeth Fry society released a letter supporting in the main the findings of the grand jury, and in that letter the Elizabeth Fry society said:

In general, the board of directors concurs in the findings presented in the most recent grand jury report and we are studying their suggested recommendations. It feels that the citizens of the province of Ontario should be gratified that this grand jury has had the courage to express its views.

Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt that during the past number of years many people have expressed their views about the conditions at Mercer reformatory. In fact, the Elizabeth Fry society in its letter of November 10 had this further to say:

Since the society was formed in 1952 we have in many respects suffered frustrations in bringing suggestions and recommendations to The Department of Reform Institutions. Many, many times our inquiries and suggestions have been ignored. For instance, specific inquiries about the educational programme within the institution have been made without success.

We have always been concerned about the type and extent of medical care in the reformatory, and have continually tried to interpret to The Department of Reform Institutions our feelings in this area. We consider that good health and hygiene habits should be taught and that adequate medical and preventative dental care should be available as part of the rehabilitative programme of the institution.

Then, Mr. Chairman, out came the advisory council's report to the hon. Minister, and on page 4 of the report is a chart showing the procedure and organization of the so-called "Mercer complex." Even the term Mercer complex is something really new. What the council means by this is shown on page 4, in "Procedure and Organization Chart." Provincial courts are first, city and county jails next, and then the Mercer complex. This is broken down into the reformatory itself, the treatment centre for alcoholics at Brampton, and the rehabilitative services.

The alcoholic centre at Brampton is a good thing. I am glad to see it open. I believe it opened late last year, at some time around Christmas, so that even that is something very new in the so-called Mercer complex. I, for one, as I said, am glad to see that we have this idea developing, but how much is it actually used?

For example, on page 4 the council lists under the word institutional such things as academics, arts and crafts, domestic science, group therapy, hairdressing, religious instruction, sewing and typing. Mr. Chairman, from what I have seen, from what I have read, from the former teachers, psychiatrists and psychologists who at one time were at Mercer and with whom I have talked, and from what I have learned from the inmates, to talk about academic instructions, arts and crafts, domestic science, sewing and typing, is to talk of some things that were just non-existent or that were part of a very feeble effort.

On page 4 of the chart the council lists special services under which come medical, psychological, psychiatric and dental services. Again I say that a lot of this on page 4 of that report is just window dressing. The medical treatment has been universally condemned. It would be interesting to hear from the hon. Minister how many psychologists and psychiatrists have quit The Department of Reform Institutions. I would say that the psychiatrists and the psychologists had been going in and out that department as if they were going through a revolving door. Even the evidence in the advisory committee's report substantiates the complaints I have heard that the dental treatment amounted, in the most part, to pulling teeth and doing very little to preserve the teeth of the inmates.

Yes, the department may talk about its rehabilitation services, Mr. Chairman, but the truth is still the same, that the average inmate of the Mercer reformatory leaves with $10 in her purse, no job to go to, and not enough proper clothing that would make a woman presentable if she was seeking employment.

What a feeble apology for the neglect of Mercer reformatory is this statement, which appears on page 7 of the report:

There is evidence that the department has not lost sight of the need to close down the old Mercer building as soon as possible without waiting for federal action. We were supplied with copies of correspondence between The Department of Reform Institutions and The Department of Public Works of February, 1964, and subsequently, which clearly indicates that negotiations were in progress for a rebuilding programme.

Evidently, sir, the Minister's advisory council is willing to accept the hon. Minister's advice that the hon. Minister is interested in replacing Mercer. Again, I hope he is, but I would like to know when. After all, the government of Ontario has been replacing Mercer for so long, and this has been repeated so much that it is becoming monotonous to have to say it. Yet if we do not continually harp on it and hammer away and draw this problem to the attention of the public, we are never going to have that building removed, and I for one will never let up as long as I have an opportunity to speak in public life in the province of Ontario.

I remember one instance when I met a well-known business man who was on a grand jury years ago. He saw that I was interested in this problem and he said, "That place stank then and I guess they have not done a thing about it." Here is a man who is very active in business, looking back over a period of 25 years. Obviously, a vast majority of any people who have come in contact with this building, as decent citizens from the public, have been shocked by what they have seen.

Mr. Chairman, in chapter 2 of its report, the advisory council deals with the problem of lesbianism. It says that reasonable precautions were taken at the Mercer to control this problem. The report says nothing about treatment. If women had proper living facilities, Mr. Chairman, if they were given some hope, if they had some training, the vast majority of them would have nothing to do with lesbianism, or even to think about it. The fact that such a sordid thing as lesbianism has even been rumoured to be so widespread, is evidence that Mercer reformatory, instead of being a rehabilitative centre, could in some instances be regarded as a cesspool supported by the taxpayers of the province of Ontario.

The fault lies with the administration in its whole theory and approach to the problem of reforming the offender. At page 12 of its report, the advisory council says this:

The select committee of the Legislature in 1954 recommended the establishment of adequate library facilities in all custodial establishments. Steps have been taken by The Department of Reform Institutions to implement this recommendation.

The advisory council said the books were catalogued and indexed. It quoted the former superintendent as saying that the library had "no old books," with the exception of those left over by the Toronto public library, but these were good and serviceable. That is it—blame the public library, blame anybody but do not blame us.

Mr. Chairman, if the books were catalogued and indexed, why did the Mercer authorities not tell the grand jury? Why did they not tell me or the hon. member for Downsview (Mr. Singer)? Why did they not tell the hon. member for Etobicoke (Mr. Braithwaite), when we visited Mercer reformatory?

The council says there were no old books. That is simply silly. The latest book I saw was a collection of Reader's Digest stories dated 1956. If they have the new books that the hon. Minister's council claims, why in the world would the authorities at Mercer not show them to the members of the Opposition when they were visiting Mercer reformatory? Because, after all, we were asking and we were there. Maybe the new books are there now, but they certainly were not there when I visited that institution.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to deal with the conduct of the so-called typing class at Mercer reformatory. You may recall that the grand jury report stated that the students sitting at the typewriters were typing gibberish. At page 16 of the Minister's advisory council report, the council says this:

The accusation made in the grand jury report and repeated in public by the foreman that inmates had been placed at the typewriters merely to give the appearance that this was a typing class, cannot be treated with indifference, since, if true, this would strike the basic principle governing administration of any correctional institution.

Well, Mr. Chairman, this is so true. And I have talked to former teachers at Mercer, going back over a period of nearly 18 years, and the stunt of setting up phony classes for visiting VIPs and typing gibberish, has been going on continuously over the years. It is too bad that the hon. Minister's self-appointed council did not call on some of the former employees at Mercer. One pet stunt was to place one or two girls who could type a little bit, in a seat closest to the aisle so that the passing VIPs, should they care to look over the student's shoulder, could see that they were typing. How shallow the investigation of the Minister's council must have been, Mr. Chairman.

Imagine this! This is what the council says:

We are satisfied that the class was being conducted in a proper manner and in accordance with the practice of typing instruction, even though it may not have been quite so well organized as when a qualified teacher of typing was in charge.

Well, Mr. Chairman, when in the world have they ever had a qualified teacher? I know of one teacher who taught at Mercer, who knew nothing about typing. She thought that she was there to teach the ordinary academic subjects. The first job she was given was to teach typing. She told me that to instruct her students properly, she set about learning the course. But I do not think that even she considered herself the best of teachers insofar as typing was concerned. But what nonsense to talk about "when the qualified typing teacher was in charge." And even, Mr. Chairman, the production of exhibits in the report and appendix 11 condemn the whole teaching set-up. I would say from the evidence produced by this whitewash council, Mr. Chairman, that just by good luck, the committee had exhibits by student A and student B showing that they could type. These are what are marked as exhibits in this report. Fine. I have even heard it suggested that when the grand jury saw typing, what was considered gibberish could easily have been typing exercises that they do. In other words, they do not necessarily make sentences, they are just exercises. But if the students were actually typing exercises, why did they not produce the exercises? They seem to be able to produce something that had been typewritten so my only conclusion can be that the reason typing exercises were not produced is that they just were not being done. In fact, gibberish was being typed.

The truth of the matter is, no doubt, that the students, with the exception of the two who could type, were really typing gibberish.

Now, at page 15 of the council's report, they say this:

We were informed that there were some beginners in a class who were learning the initial touch of the keyboard and there is no doubt that it was their initial typing efforts that led the grand jury to use the word "gibberish."

Well then, again I say to the hon. Minister, why does he not produce the exhibits? Is it just coincidence that something that was typed properly by two of the students can be shown? Again I say, this council and its investigation has been very, very shallow. To allow a council or a committee appointed by the hon. Minister to get away with this tommyrot would be failing in our duty as members of the Opposition to point out how this administration is trying to cover up in an area where it has failed badly.

I intend to go into some detail how this council of the Minister has, I think really been misused by him to cover up the sins of commission and omission of this administration over a long period of time.

Again, for example, Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister's committee on page 17 of its report goes so far as to defend what is called the sham class. That is setting up those typists who are supposed to be typing for the benefit of the VIPs as they walk through. I think it is a shocking thing that a committee or council of the Minister should come along and defend this type of thing.

For example, Miss Trudi Hersink, a matron who resigned from Mercer in November, is quoted in the Toronto Daily Star as saying this:

In the gymnasium, visitors find calisthenics in progress. But as they move on to another part of the building, gymnasts quickly change to their dresses and are herded down a flight of stairs at the back of the building in time to be seen at one of the centres.

Well, that is something that happened recently. This will give you an idea that this has been going on over a long period of time and incidentally, I have talked to these people personally and I have no doubt in my mind that they are telling the truth. The hon. Minister seemed to think that a lot of the information came from those inmates who were troublemakers. The truth of the matter is that the vast majority of any information I have gathered on the reform institutions here has come mostly from teachers, psychologists and psychiatrists who have either been employed full time or part time by this department over a period of years, from 18 years ago probably to about the end of 1964. And there is most certainly a pattern established. When you talk to the inmates there is definitely a pattern established. Certainly they cannot all be lying, in fact I do not think any of these people whose word I have taken are lying, it has been nothing but the truth. Some of them I have visited in their homes and the vast majority of them certainly are very well educated, well informed people. Some have visited my home, and I have had an opportunity to trust their credibility.

Now, from former employees, Mr. Chairman, I have learned that this type of thing—that is, the sham class—is standard procedure. In fact, in the days when they used to have babies of the girls kept at the institution, even the babies were used as a ruse to deceive the VIPs. Now I understand that the children are no longer kept there; I do not think they have been kept there for more than seven years. The VIPs—by that I mean, be they law students or members of the Legislature or the grand jury or anybody who has been taken through, somebody they want to impress, and I guess they would maybe impress the hon. Minister this way, in fact I do not know how a new Minister—we have had so many in The Department of Reform Institutions, because as we all know, the ministerial post of Reform Institutions is a political football in this Tory government—I do not know how a new Minister would ever have an opportunity to know what is going on, not just because he is there for such a very short time in the office, but because he is getting the run-around while he is being shown through an institution like Mercer. They really would not know how good or how bad the situation is, believe me.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: How did you find out?

Mr. Trotter: How did I find out? Simply by talking to people.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That is what I did.

Mr. Trotter: All right. Well, I am glad you take an interest. Obviously with what has gone on over a long period of time, the hon. Minister has not bothered to find out.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I bothered.

Mr. Trotter: Well, all you did so far was come up with a whitewash report, saying how fine everything is. So you have got a long way to go before you prove yourself and as I said at the very first of these estimates, you had a wonderful—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Nobody is lying to these people.

Mr. Trotter: —you had a wonderful opportunity, because neither I nor any member could blame you as the Minister for what has gone on. Certainly blame the administration, but not the Minister. When the Minister comes along with this garbage, this whitewash report, well, we certainly do blame you.

Mr. G. H. Peck (Scarborough Centre): Gibberish!

Mr. Trotter: Well, this is the gibberish we get from this government, of which you are a part.

Mr. R. A. Eagleson (Lakeshore): Speaking of gibberish, go ahead.

Mr. Trotter: Well, now, the VIPs would be shown as they were taken through—this is the system that has gone on—the girls working in a schoolroom, or in the sewing room and then the VIPs would be taken to see the cooing and gurgling babies. Then while the VIPs were looking at the babies, the girls would be taken from the schoolroom, or the sewing room, or wherever they happened to be, and changed into their gym suits, and as the VIPs came down, they could see a vigorous performance going on down in the gym. Then when the VIPs went home, the inmates went back to the sewing machines and the laundry room. This is how our educational and hobbycraft situation was in Mercer.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That was quite a show.

Mr. Trotter: There is never an attempt to show what is going on. No wonder the rehabilitative record of this government has been so bad, and no wonder that Mercer reformatory is really looked upon as a place of horror here in the city of Toronto. It is a disgrace to the province as well as to the country. It is an appalling thing that a Minister's council could come along and condone a procedure such as this, of deceiving people who are trying to see through an institution.

Mr. Chairman, during my investigations into the administration of Mercer reformatory, the comments that I heard from anyone I talked to concerning medical treatment at Mercer were simply blistering. The grand jury report said this about the medical treatment:

In discussing the medical supervision, as the writer has a great respect for the medical profession, he wishes only to state that in our opinion medical supervision is inadequate. We might add that from our subsequent inquiries, in and out of the institution, we could find no one with anything good to say about the medical supervision.

The hon. Minister's council says that criticism of the medical section by the foreman of the grand jury was based entirely on hearsay. Of course it was. None of us who have investigated this problem has actually seen these things happen, or gone about with Bibles in our hands taking oaths of what other people have seen. It has been learned from a great number of people who have had experience over a long period of time, and of course it is hearsay. Almost anything the hon. Minister knows about this is hearsay. The hon. Minister shakes his head; I do not know if he was in attendance when girls were examined or not. Certainly, everybody would be on their best behaviour if the hon. Minister—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am just denying what you said—that everything I know is from hearsay.

Mr. Trotter: The vast majority are learning this.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, I am not—

Mr. Trotter: But to accuse the foreman of the grand jury of using hearsay is ridiculous, because, as I said, we would have to walk around being commissioners, taking oaths with a Bible in our hands, and getting sworn statements.

But the council had this to say at page 22, when it was talking about the medical treatment:

It became apparent during our investigation that Dr. Hills was not popular with many inmates and some ex-inmates. Weighing the evidence of his co-workers against that of the inmates and ex-inmates, we accept the evidence of the former as being more reliable.

It is difficult, Mr. Chairman, to beat the establishment. The Department of Reform Institutions evidently has no confidence in any of the former inmates from Mercer, no matter who they are. At least the council did not seem to want to believe any of them.

It is rumoured, I believe, that the present medical staff has been changed—I may be wrong—that Dr. Hills has gone and that a community doctor is in there. Maybe this is something the hon. Minister has done. If so, it has been done very quietly. If these changes are taking place, Mr. Chairman, they are taking place very quietly. Then I suppose, maybe in a few months if we want to go through Mercer, great improvements will have been made.

For example, the reformatory authorities never served coffee until the grand jury and some of these other people went in. Then the next thing we heard, they served coffee once a week, for the first time in the history of Mercer.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Entirely wrong! Entirely wrong!

Mr. Trotter: And now they are serving it three times—they still do not serve it?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: You are completely misinformed.

Mr. Trotter: They still do not serve coffee?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: They certainly do, and always did.

Mr. Trotter: They never did.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: You are entirely misinformed.

Mr. Trotter: Then they never did, so if they are serving it now, that is new, because this was back years—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: They were serving it at the time you were claiming they were not.

Mr. Trotter: I am just saying they never served it, and I have been told they started just recently. Then that rumour is wrong. You are worse than I thought you were. I was trying to give you credit—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I said you were wrong. I said they had been serving coffee all the time.

Mr. Trotter: They have not.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Since when?

Mr. Trotter: Since when? They have not. That is utterly wrong.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, I will not argue.

Mr. Trotter: Mind you, you are in the government and have the opportunity; but I understand that even new clothing has been brought into the institution because we complained about the clothing of the girls. This may be wrong; I am trying to give you credit for doing something.

Hon. G. C. Wardrope (Minister of Mines): What a joke!

Mr. Trotter: It may not be, and you are not doing anything.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I do not want credit where I am not entitled to it.

Mr. Bryden: You do not want much credit.

Mr. Trotter: I believe that the medical organization at Mercer has been changed, and you are not denying it. I just hope that a community doctor is there, and if that is so, it is a move for the good. The fact you are not denying it may mean that it is taking place.

I want to point this out, that despite the fact that the grand jury complained about the medical treatment, and despite the fact that we in the Opposition heard of so many complaints, the whitewash council wanted to say that everything is fine. But in the meantime, before we even get to the estimates, it would seem from rumblings, that changes are surreptitiously taking place. I am glad that at least by causing an uproar, we can bring about this improvement, whether the hon. Minister admits it or not.

At page 19 of this report the committee talks about the six "airy and light rooms" in the hospital, and says the narrow window cells used by the patients and referred to by the grand jury were only used for admission cells. The report says:

These cells are never used by sick patients but are reserved solely for admissions.

When I visited Mercer reformatory, there was one patient in the cells condemned by the grand jury and not supposed to be used. So in that case, I can only go by what I have seen.

The report also says at page 19:

They do not have mattresses because some inmates are incontinent, and therefore they are given four blankets which can be readily laundered and kept hygienic.

Mr. Troy: Have they got no rubber sheets?

Mr. Trotter: It is rather hard to believe, Mr. Chairman, that all the inmates—in fact it is hard to believe that even a small fraction of them—are that incontinent. Rather, I would think that it comes from the almost punitive attitude that obviously has existed, that the rougher things are, the better chance you have to reform inmates. As I said before, if such treatment reformed people, they would all be angels after they had been mercerized in Mercer.

But here again, even when they are sick, they get no mattresses, only four blankets. I think it is a shocking thing for the council to give this feeble excuse for that stinking hole they call a hospital at Mercer; it is a shocking thing to have here in the government of Ontario and it is extremely hard to believe that there are so many inmates whom the council seems to think are unable to look after themselves.

The only thing I can conclude is that the administration of reform institutions has been sick and I hope the new Minister can revive it and do something instead of believing these apologetic councils he has set up:

Now, Mr. Chairman, at page 20 of the council's report is a typical whitewash paragraph, and it is this:

There was no log book for prescription drugs, but we did examine the doctor's order book and also the inmates' history charts where a record is kept of drugs ordered and given. We recommend that there should be a properly prepared and printed register for prescription drugs which would show the drugs given and the stocks on hand. Such a register would have the advantage of ready reference and avoid the necessity of having to search for information through the numerous pages of the doctor's order book.

Well, the council has passed over a shocking state of affairs when it says, "there was no log book for prescription drugs." Every doctor, every institution, every organization that handles drugs, is supposed to keep track of them but not at Mercer reformatory. An odd thing that even at a penal institution they do not keep track of drugs. One would think that it would be one of the places that it would be most necessary to keep a record. Of course, if you want to find out if the inmates are getting drugs, all you do is look at their personal charts.

The hon. member for Downsview spent some considerable time checking those charts. I do hope that the inmates did not require any drugs, because no evidence of prescription drugs could be found on the charts of the inmates.

In fact, if the hon. Minister—

Mr. V. M. Singer: (Downsview): That is not hearsay.

Mr. Trotter: No, that is not hearsay. We saw this. In fact, if the hon. Minister would care to look at appendix 16 of the committee's report showing the medical supplies purchased for Mercer reformatory from April 1, 1964 to October 16, 1964, he will find that besides oil of cloves, vegetable laxatives—and there are a lot of hard to pronounce names which add up to a collection of headache pills and ointments—and bearing in mind that there were inmates in there who might need drugs, because some of them did suffer from a drug addiction. There evidently was no possibility of a proper medical withdrawal and they just did it "cold turkey." It is true that a lot of them go through what is called "cold turkey" at the Don jail. A lot of them are still, even when they get to Mercer, suffering to some extent. Anyway, they required treatment.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: How does the hon. member know that?

Mr. Trotter: We will get into that later on when we come to some of the estimates.

One of the many complaints that I heard was that the inmates did not like to accept dental treatment because the ailing tooth would be pulled, instead of filled, and as a result, the inmates at Mercer reformatory did not want to go to the dentist. They wanted to wait until they got out. I was going through the records and took a quick look and saw that the extractions outnumbered the fillings six to one. We all know today that a dentist tries to save a tooth, and after all, the majority of the inmates in Mercer are younger people. If we look at dental practice the vast majority of work is done in treating a tooth; the last thing that a dentist does is extract it, and yet I looked at the records produced by the whitewash committee and I find that in 1964 the extractions outnumbered fillings ten to one.

Mr. Singer: That is not hearsay, either.

Mr. Trotter: That again, is on the hon. Minister's records. The treatment in the dental department at Mercer is contrary to all conception of modern dental practice and this, again, I would like to dwell on when we get to the estimates.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to dwell long on the detention cells at Mercer reformatory. Much has been said about them and to my mind they are a disgrace; that type of detention cell and treatment that the inmates in detention receive have no place in modern penology. I am not saying that detention cells are not needed at all; I am saying it is the type of detention, the type of treatment, that a person in a detention cell gets at Mercer. Certainly, in some instances detention cells are going to be needed, but not the way they do it at that place down on King Street. But the Minister's council says this:

Physically, the detention area at the Mercer does not lend itself toward the development of a modern and positive approach for dealing with inmates who have behaviour problems.

Even in this case things were so bad that even the whitewash council could not defend the detention cells. They came out with this weak statement, while hoping the whole thing would be passed over. But the fact that even a committee attempted to lean over backwards to apologize to the government—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Why would they do that? Why would this committee lean over and apologize to this government? What is in it for them?

Mr. Trotter: All I know is what I am reading here—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: What would be in it for them?

Mr. Trotter: Well, the witnesses they listened to were part of the establishment, you know—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: What purpose would this committee have in doing a job for the government?

Mr. Trotter: They have been sitting there for five years; they are certainly a part of the establishment—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Why—

Mr. Trotter: Certainly this report of theirs is absolutely in defiance of what so many have known for so long. Almost anybody with any commonsense who has a chance to look at things would realize that this whole report is nothing but a system to try to fog the issue and the mess that is down on King Street. Again, the council says this:

We find that the present detention facilities have definite limitations but we are satisfied that they are being used in a practical manner, pending availability of adequate facilities in a new building.

Well, Mr. Chairman, we have been waiting for 44 years since it was recommended that this be done away with, but how long are these new facilities they talk about going to be available? Think of the harm done to hundreds of people in that period of more than 44 years.

I admit the hon. Minister has a real problem to get interest from the government. I think that the public is taking more interest. For example, Mr. Chairman, when the hon. Minister was speaking, less than one-third of government supporters were in their seats and only two Cabinet Ministers, one of whom was reading the paper.

I can realize that when the hon. Minister goes with his estimates to the Treasury board, he and other hon. Ministers must have had a rough time getting money because of the very narrow view of the present administration, and the only way that money will be voted is when a hue and cry is caused among the public when we point out the mess that The Department of Reform Institutions is in, which is the only way the hon. Minister is going to get any money, just from his own colleagues.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trotter: And I might say this to the hon. Minister, that if he is really interested in cleaning up Mercer, in cleaning up the whole Department of Reform Institutions, we on this side of the House are the best friends he has. In fact, we are probably better friends than those he has on the Treasury board.

But here is the prize quote from the report—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: You always hurt the one you love!

Mr. Trotter: —at page 28:

The practice has grown up at the request of the inmates of substituting jam for the meat loaf.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): At least you know what is in the bread!

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Plum and apple!

Mr. Trotter: Is that not a revealing statement for what it does not state? They are requesting bread and jam, instead of meat loaf. In fact, the meat loaf is referred to, as I said before, as Puss 'n Boots—I think that is a cat food that is sold, and this is how it is regarded.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: It is not meant to be attractive.

Mr. Trotter: The hon. Minister might say again that I am going by hearsay, but again I quite believe what I have heard. And, of course, there has been much discussion as to how long inmates are kept in detention. Well, here is another prize quote from this whitewash committee:

There have been instances, however, in which an inmate has stayed in detention for longer periods because she has so desired.

Well, now, if you have seen that place, the dismal area; some cells have very feeble lights; in other cells if you ask them where they get light they point to the lights out in the halls which shine through a small slit above the door. If you see those places and then are told they stay there because they so desire, you realize there is something mighty weird going on. It is no way to rehabilitate anybody when you have a number of younger people there—the majority are probably between 16 and 20; certainly the vast majority are probably under the age of 24.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Where?

Mr. Trotter: It is in your own records.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member is confusing Mercer with the other institutions.

Mr. Trotter: No, in Mercer. Just on this point, its normal capacity is approximately—right now it would be somewhere in the neighbourhood of 100, but during the year in the hon. Minister's report there were 698 people kept in Mercer at one time and another, and their age groupings are—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: What page is that on?

Mr. Trotter: Page 49, The Department of Reform Institutions, and the first—

Mr. Bryden: The first of the two that have your picture in it.

Mr. Trotter: Yes. Now the age of prisoners—this is at Mercer reformatory, page 49. We are very glad to inform the hon. Minister about his department: 16 to 20 years inclusive—124; 21 to 24—59; then 25 to 29—80. So these are relatively young people. The vast majority would be under 30. Then they go down the line. But these are certainly younger people.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr Chairman, I am sure the hon. member does not want to mislead the hon. members of this House. I have been trying to tell him that he is taking all the women who have to go to Mercer first for classification. There are very few of these young ones ever kept at King Street Mercer which is what he has been condemning all along. Most of these wind up at Ingleside. The ones who remain at Mercer proper usually total 24.

Mr. Trotter: Oh, Ingleside holds 24 and it is never capacity. You go around and see—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Ingleside does not hold 24, Ingleside holds about 40.

Mr. Trotter: Ingleside?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Yes.

Mr. Trotter: Then you have recently raised the number.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Yes, since you got up on your feet I ordered some changes made.

Mr. Trotter: Because the capacity of Ingleside right along has been 24.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We dress them in different clothes and when you go to Ingleside they run around the back door and get into King Street, and when you go there they run to Ingleside.

Mr. Trotter: I would not put it past you because they actually do this. They go to Ingleside and some are brought back to Mercer. This is true. Even those who go to Ingleside are brought back to Mercer and this is no joke, this is a fact.

Mr. MacDonald: I remember a juvenile—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: There is never a juvenile in an adult institution in this province.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I docketed one six or seven years ago.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Six or seven years ago, you can do better than that.

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Chairman, even when we were looking at the records of some of them at Mercer, I started speaking to one because she seemed exceptionally young. I asked her age. She was sixteen.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: You said a juvenile.

Mr. Trotter: I am not saying a juvenile, I am saying 16 and over.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Of course there are. I did not say there were not any young women there. There are some young women who cannot be trusted in an open institution like Ingleside because they will walk off.

Mr. Trotter: There have not been any under 16 years old at Mercer as far as I know in probably the last ten years, when they used to bring so-called incorrigibles from Galt. I have never at this stage said you had juveniles at Mercer.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: No, but you were saying there were young girls there—

Mr. Trotter: Sixteen, 17, of course there are.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Very few, very few.

Mr. Trotter: And some of them are immature—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Most of them are immature.

Mr. Trotter: At 16 and 17 do you consider them old women?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: They are young girls.

Mr. Trotter: All right. Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, if you had seen the detention cells and how they live, and the attitude and the whole outlook on life, you could not for the life of you imagine a girl requesting that she stay down there and eat jam sandwiches. And for any council to come along with that kind of nonsense is almost an insult to the commonsense of the people of Ontario. Now, the committee says on page 27:

The detention cells in the west wing have windows and lower ceilings, but do not have artificial light within. Artificial light is supplied from lights in the corridors without. These cells are approximately five feet by nine feet six inches.

Well, as I mentioned just a short time ago, the artificial light from the corridors without is just about useless for reading. All they can do there is sit. It may be that you prefer the old Calvinist idea, you sit there and think about your sins, but later on even in this report of the council of the hon. Minister they say that boredom is the greatest enemy of any inmate and this is something I want to emphasize later. I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that none of us, neither man nor woman, would want to sit down—whether he or she was eating that famous meat loaf they serve at Mercer or jam sandwiches—would want to sit down there if he or she could possibly avoid it.

Now, at page 31 of the advisory council's report they say this, that the grand jury's investigation of the educational programme at Mercer was inadequate to justify the recommendations the grand jury made. The council said that the foreman and one of his fellow jurors visited Mercer on a Saturday afternoon when the institution is operating with a limited staff and it is quite understandable that it would be difficult to have access to all the samples of work, and so on.

Well, from what information I received, Mr. Chairman, from what I have seen, no matter what time of day or what day of the week you visit there, you are not going to see much in the way of exhibits of any kind of activity except in the laundry room and around the sewing machine. Sure, it is true they have a schoolroom, it looks clean and neat, but there is not much learning taking place. Sure, they have a domestic science room, but when the grand jury went through they found that there was rust in the sink and there was nothing in the refrigerator. In other words, the sink was not being used very much.

Admittedly, when the Opposition was there some activity was taking place, but after all we gave them four days warning and surely, Mr. Chairman, you cannot blame me if I am a bit sceptical at seeing one class in domestic science taking place. I have a great tendency to believe what some of the former employees, very well informed people, have told me. For example, they had in one case an exhibition of handicraft. They are particularly proud of some bones they got from the kitchen and painted up. Actually, it is well done, I am not criticizing that, they actually make good book shelves; and if you ask when that was done they say, "Oh, some time ago." I had been told beforehand that they were ten years old. Finally the authorities admitted it would be about that time. There is no exhibit of handicraft work being done in recent years, so if any of my fellow members of this House ever go there, I would suggest they bear that in mind.

I think one of the newspaper reporters of the Globe and Mail, Lotta Dempsey, even she, when she went through, found out that there was rust in the sink in the domestic science class. So if we saw some activity there, again I say, you cannot blame me, Mr. Chairman, for not being overly impressed.

You know, one thing that is so important—and this is not just having to do with Mercer but it is the whole system of reform institutions—the whole theory is that you must give people some dignity, some opportunity to learn. I am not saying that everybody is going to learn, but that you are going to have far better results if you at least give them the opportunity and the encouragement to apply themselves in handicrafts, through education or even hairdressing. Now, a trained hairdresser comes and the girls get their hair dressed or whatever they do once every two weeks. I asked, "Do they teach them?" And the answer was no. A lot of those women could learn to be hairdressers. It is a type of trade for which there is a market. Why can they not use the facilities—they are there—and make some attempt to give the girls a trade in which they can make an honest living?

So they work at dressmaking machines and on this they work long and they work hard, but it is the type of work for which there is not going to be any demand when they get out into the workaday world.

So, it is true, there are facilities at Mercer to train girls, but they are not being used. It amazes me that the committee, the advisory committee of the hon. Minister, could come out with such a report, that it seems to lose sight of the fact of what is actually being done.

You know, you can walk into a building and say, "Yes, it is clean," but they do not show you what they are doing. Just to give you an example: You come out in the corridors in front of the girls' cells, they have radios, phonograph players, TV sets, and it looks as if at times it would not be too boring, but you go over and you turn on a record player. Of course, nothing works. You lift the lid up and there is no record player in it. You find out that the radio is a combination radio and record player, and the radio does not work. That could happen any time, but you look at six of them and none of the record players works, and only one of the radios work. You try a little yellow radio there, and it does not work. You go into the gymnasium, and the radio there does not work. There are four TV sets, and two of them do not work.

So this is a sham that you see there. You wonder what really does go on. If you did not take the time to check, it would look so good.

There is a combination radio and record player there with the records underneath. You pick up the records and they are so old that they are only printed on one side. I picked up one, made nearly 40 years ago by a recording star named Alma Gluck. They had her record there—"Whispering Hope."

An hon. member: She was very popular.

Mr. Trotter: It is a good song.

An hon. member: She was a popular artist.

Mr. Trotter: Maybe she was, but that record would be a collector's item. I checked the other records that they had and they were all of the same vintage, going back for years, Mr. Chairman.

This is what I think is so wrong. You are not mollycoddling if you give someone the opportunity even to listen to some decent music—even "Whispering Hope." I happened to spot that because I like some of that music; Mitch Miller has an excellent recording of it. Why is it such wild spending if we can give some modern records and a decent record player to the girls there? Again it is something that is going to affect their whole attitude when they get out into the world. You have little chance of reforming people under those types of conditions.

At page 31 of the advisory council's report, it makes another broad statement that leaves a lot of questions begging. It says:

At the time of the grand jury inspection, there was a vacancy on the teaching staff left by a qualified teacher who had recently resigned.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, there was only one teacher there—a Mrs. Steinberg. At one time, at Mercer, there was a physical education teacher, a home economics teacher, a sewing and handicraft teacher, and a school teacher. Now there is only one teacher. Why?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: When was that? When was that that they had all those others?

Mr. Trotter: They had them in 1956; there were a whole lot coming and going.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Does the hon. member not appreciate the reason for that, now that we have three in the complex? Most of them now are at Ingleside where they can do the most good with the younger ones and the first offenders.

Mr. Trotter: Even so, you have girls there at Mercer practically full time.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: No.

Mr. Trotter: And even among the girls who have gone to Ingleside, again I say some are brought back.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Of course.

Mr. Trotter: Of course they are. What are you going to do, let them go up the flue? That excuse of a complex is feeble.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I did not mean to interrupt the hon. member.

Mr. Trotter: At the very time in the history of this province, Mr. Chairman, when we are preaching the urgency of education, we in The Department of Reform Institutions, as symbolized by Mercer, do less.

At page 31, even this council that does all this apologizing, is starting to admit that the textbooks on some subjects have not been kept up to date. You may recall that the grand jury dwelt on this because it said in the foreman's report that if you judged by the content of the books in Mercer, the inmates would not have known that there was a World War II. The latest geography book they had was dated 1947, and certainly when I took a look at the library, there was nothing to contradict the grand jury's report.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to know what textbooks have been kept up to date. The hon. Minister's self-appointed advisory council says this:

Your council expects that the whole question of textbooks will be re-examined as part of the educational programme, with adequate staff and security.

After all, at one time an inspector from the board of education used to go to that school. Why they did away with her or him, as the case may be, I do not know, but they certainly need to be inspected and checked on. I would like to ask, Mr. Chairman, when the hon. Minister has an opportunity later on to reply, where in the world is he ever going to get adequate staff? How long are we going to have to wait? Here is one of the well-located buildings. It might be a poor building, but it is in a good location; it is central, in a wealthy city, in a wealthy province, and can we not afford teachers? Can something not be done? When are we going to have adequate staff? It would seem to me that the grand jury's criticism, despite what the hon. Minister's council says, was more than justified.

Again, the council says:

In our opinion it is unfair to judge the Mercer educational programme solely by the programme of the King Street institution.

Mr. Chairman, why should we not judge its programme by this institution? It has been standing there since the 1880s; it has been virtually the main and only institution for women until very recent years. To come and tell us all these new things that are being added on may be very fine, but they are still, in the main, pilot projects and they are of a very recent vintage.

Admittedly, Ingleside is an improvement. We are glad to see it. We think there should be more Inglesides and no Mercers. But the heart of the whole system has been Mercer reformatory on King Street, and this is the legitimate symbol, the legitimate organization, by which we should judge The Department of Reform Institutions.

Mr. Chairman, despite its attempt to pull the grand jury's report apart, even the hon. Minister's advisory council ends up saying this:

Your council recognizes that the facilities available at an institution such as the Mercer are inadequate.

I am certainly glad to see that even it comes to that conclusion—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: You mean it only whitewashes sometimes.

Mr. Trotter: All right, here comes a typical whitewash statement, and this is why I feel that the council just made no attempt to go into the heart of it, or if it did find out, it avoided the problem. The council says this:

A gymnasium was also available, though it appeared to your council that it was inadequately equipped and insufficiently used.

Mr. Chairman, I had an opportunity to ask some questions on that when I was there and I think I got pretty ridiculous answers. When the members of the Opposition were there, we asked why the inmates did not play volleyball or basketball or some other healthy physical exercise, and we were told that pregnant women might get injured. Even at that time, there was one inmate known to be pregnant and another one who was believed to be five months pregnant, although it had not been decided whether she was pregnant or not.

You may recall the hon. member for Downsview mentioned in the House that he had gone through the records and found there was one pregnant with a question mark beside the word "pregnant." Now I do hope they have found out. But whether it was one or two, surely this is no reason for throwing out completely the use of the gymnasium, in which, incidentally, the radio did not work. Again, I say this is why you have this sordid talk of lesbianism, and why you have such a poor record of rehabilitation—because you do not use the facilities that could be used.

The council said one very great truth on page 33:

Boredom is perhaps the greatest curse of present life.

You may recall, Mr. Chairman, and I will not dwell at length on this, that when I was speaking on the Throne debate, I said the greatest weakness in this system as exemplified by Mercer is the administration's refusal or utter inability to see to it that the inmates use their time in a proper and constructive manner. I say again, why can they not use the gymnasium?

So many of these inmates are young people; they are 16 and over. Let us bear this in mind, that most of the inmates, if not all, have a record of coming from broken homes, and of having nothing but a difficult life in childhood. If we, as a government, continue a rough and difficult treatment for them, or even worse than what they have been receiving, we are going to have little hope of reforming these people. It is far more inexpensive, regardless of the humanitarianism, to have a decent system and reform at least a good percentage of the inmates, than to turn them loose and have to pick them up again on another charge, have them go through the whole court system, and leave them as free boarders in our institutions. It is time that we set about bringing about a system in this department that justifies the name reform institutions.

There is little or no outdoor activity at Mercer, and again this has to do with activities. Yet at one time there was. You might think that in the wintertime it is too cold. I asked if there were any clothes for the girls in the wintertime, and they said, "Oh yes, there are." They opened the door of a cupboard and they showed me some old sweaters, all thrown together like junk. They did not look too inviting to wear, or to go out in. Yet at one time, a number of years ago, there was a skating rink at Mercer, there were teachers, there were matrons interested enough to see to it that a skating rink was set up, that the girls had equipment, and that they got skates. Where they have gone to, I do not know. But at least there was some attempt made a number of years ago. Why all this has been forgotten, I do not know, but it is certainly the duty of the hon. Minister to find out why and to see to it that some improvements can be made.

The hon. Minister's advisory council does not think much of the recommendation of the grand jury that the educational programme should be turned over to the Toronto board of education. It says this seems unrealistic. The council says the classroom teachers under the public educational system do not have the specialized training or the experience necessary to teach in a penal institution. Well, where are you going to find them? If our educational department and our educational facilities cannot produce teachers, who in the world can? Of course it is specialized training, but you have not had specialized teachers up there for a long time. Very few teachers who have been at Mercer had specialized training. But certainly I would suggest to you that the board of education could produce something far better than what this particular department has been able to produce.

Mr. Chairman, at page 50 of this report, the hon. Minister's council deals with the grand jury and one of its complaints is that the grand jurors had no special training. Of course they did not. The grand jury is called from the general public.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Why do you not read the whole paragraph?

Mr. Trotter: Sure, I will put it on the record if you wish. This is the particular paragraph I want to deal with, because it shows to me that if anybody is biased it is the council of the hon. Minister. You want this read in, Mr. Minister?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Yes, read it.

Mr. Trotter: Right. From page 50:

We found that these jurors had no special training or knowledge in matters of penology or criminology and were not qualified to express opinions on the complex problems arising in the operation of penal institutions or the treatment and rehabilitation of prisoners. Yet the report contained many expressions of opinion rather than findings of fact.

The report was based on two inspections of the main Mercer building on King Street. The other buildings included in the Mercer complex (page 4) were not inspected. We found that although information was available as to facilities and programmes, the jurors did not avail themselves of such information but rather indulged in irresponsible statements such as, that the last teacher employed on the staff was apprehended for shoplifting and resigned.

Just at that point, I want to stop.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: May I suggest you finish that paragraph?

Mr. Trotter: Yes, I am going to finish it. I mean to finish it. It so happens I want to stop here and make some remarks.

First of all, people who are picked as grand jurors, as we all know, are from the general public. If they have special training, they are not supposed to be on the jury—and let us remember this, that the jurors called in were not conspirators. They were forced to come in. They were served—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We will go into that later, too.

Mr. Trotter: No, I am on my feet.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Do not stick your neck out.

Mr. Trotter: And so they come in, and they go about and bring in a report. But any of these grand juries seldom has an expert on it; particular experts are forbidden by law. Doctors or lawyers simply cannot be on them. So to say these men have no special training, would almost destroy the jury system; it would almost say—in fact, it does say—that no person of the general public is really capable of giving an opinion on how the government spends the taxpayers' money. I say this is a ridiculous statement on the part of the Minister's council.

Then it says this:

They make irresponsible statements, in that the grand jury said this, that the last teacher employed on the staff was apprehended for shoplifting and resigned.

That is true.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, finish it.

Mr. Trotter: That is quite true. To say that it is an irresponsible statement is wrong; it is a statement of fact. And then:

The foreman of the grand jury admitted to us that this had not been verified and we found that the charges had in fact been withdrawn.

He is not saying that the person was convicted, but there were charges and the charges were withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Would you suggest that was a proper statement to have made?

Mr. Trotter: He said exactly the truth.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We are very careful even of letting the public know that any releasee—an inmate who had committed a crime—had in fact committed a crime, yet here is a person who had not even been charged with a crime and it is publicized. That is a terrible thing.

Mr. Trotter: She was picked up and charged but the charge was withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well all right, an innocent person. Why would you publicize it in this way?

Mr. Trotter: They stated the fact that she was charged and resigned.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: In other words, there was more care taken about the education and the comfort of the inmate than there was about an innocent person.

Mr. Trotter: Well, that is a pretty feeble argument. They were making a statement about the staff and it was perfectly correct.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am surprised at you, as a lawyer, saying that.

Mr. Trotter: The council says of the grand jury report:

It should be noted that the report was hastily prepared, and in the words of the foreman, "I dictated this report to a good friend of mine in my living room in about 15 minutes."

Whether a man can do it in 15 minutes or half an hour, there are many people who can spend a long time thinking about a subject and then quickly draw their chains of thought together. In fact, I know one of the best lawyers here in the city of Toronto who can draw a contract in a very rapid period of time after reading things over. This is an ability some have. When he says he did it in 15 minutes I would say it would be a credit to the man because the report reads well. It reads well enough that it stirred this government up; it reads well enough that men such as Father West of the Anglican Church, who knows a considerable amount of penology, said it was a good report; it was good enough that in part it was supported by the Elizabeth Fry society, and certainly supported by a number of people whom I know to be well informed on the subject. So, whether the man took 15 minutes or 15 hours certainly is not a legitimate attack on the report itself.

Again, I would just like to say this, that the grand jury again pointed to different organizations that the so-called Mercer complex had worked with. Then it said the reformatory got along well with all of them, except the Elizabeth Fry society. I noticed also that the report said the Elizabeth Fry society had facilities for the treatment of nine girls. This is what surprises me, that anybody who has criticized the government, even in trying to be helpful—it seems anything they do is downgraded. For example, the hon. Minister's report says that the Elizabeth Fry society has facilities for nine girls. And yet when I read their 1963 report I find out that they have extended help to 516 people and among them—and this is what interested me—they served 206 people between the ages of 16 and 25 years. I asked for copies of this report. The background of this is prepared by their executive director.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Elizabeth Fry of where?

Mr. Trotter: Elizabeth Fry here in the city of Toronto.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Elizabeth Fry of Toronto, is it?

Mr. Trotter: Yes. It is Phyllis G. Haslim, executive director, Toronto.

At that time, they treated 516 people. But then, to have a government report come out in this fashion, it is rather downgrading an organization that really has done a tremendous work. It is well respected among the public and has a great number of members, 414 paying members. I think that it was most unfair, most unjust. I looked over some of the reports of the Elizabeth Fry society, going back to 1955. I find that in many instances they have been most complimentary to the government and they have at times made suggestions, but as years have gone on, as you got up to 1960, you see creeping into their annual reports their objections and what they term as their frustrations in the fact that certain things were not being done for the educational facilities, that not enough was being done for rehabilitation.

To me, it is a tremendous amount of evidence that a group taking an active part who have the knowledge and the ability to speak out should deserve a great deal of credit. But it does not bring much credit on the administration that whenever anybody seems to criticize, whether they are trying to be helpful or not, they are immediately jumped upon and anything they do is downgraded, as certainly the Elizabeth Fry society was in that report.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Where was that, where is it in the report?

Mr. Trotter: Where they mention the nine people—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That is what they have accommodation for; that is all that is saying.

Mr. Trotter: Yes, they said they had accommodation for nine people.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, that is true.

Mr. Trotter: Yes, but with so many of these other groups, when they were speaking of them, they could be reasonably complimentary. But with the Elizabeth Fry society they said on two different occasions in their report, that they had complaints about Elizabeth Fry, that Mercer got along well with all the other associations, except with Elizabeth Fry.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That is not critical of Elizabeth Fry, it is a fact.

Mr. Trotter: And then, of course, from my reading of it, I felt that when they pointed out that they had only space for nine people—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: But you are reading that out of context.

Mr. Trotter: They were trying to downgrade—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: You read that within the context in which they were mentioned; there is nothing wrong with that at all.

Mr. Trotter: It is certainly the way I took it and I took it with some considerable justification.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in this problem of penal reform, whether it be at Mercer or any place else, we might ask, what is needed?

Well, in this report, even at page 40, they give an answer. They say:

The first essential is to assess the problems of the new admission and the underlying causes that have contributed to her anti-social behaviour.

Well, nobody can disagree with that. I hope that this is going on throughout the reform institutions and I hope it will now begin to be carried out in Mercer. Certainly it was not being carried out. For example, even the select committee of 1954 recommended that cards be kept so that the matrons in charge of the floor where the inmate was kept in the cells, should be familiar with the girl's background and her problems and how she arrived at an institution. This was so that the matron or the guard who is in charge would have some understanding of the inmate.

There was certainly none of that at Mercer, because I would ask when I was going through. I do not think they have held conferences of their staff which again was recommended in the report of 1954 of the select committee. These things that have been recommended for so long have not been carried out. Again I urge the hon. Minister to accept them and again to read—this is one part of the council's report I can accept—to read page 40. And the other thing they say:

The second essential is to gain the inmate's confidence and endeavour to obtain her full co-operation in that part of the institution's rehabilitation programme most likely to suit her needs.

Well, Mr. Chairman, how can any system, how can any matron gain anybody's confidence with the treatment that they receive?

It being 6 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF REFORM INSTITUTIONS

On vote 1901:

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Chairman, before we rose at 6 o'clock I was speaking in regard to some of the things that are needed in order to bring about a change in attitude in our reform institutions and I mentioned that, on page 40 of the council's report to the Minister concerning Mercer reformatory, they stated that one of the first essentials was to assess the problem and secondly to gain the confidence of the inmate. A third one was that an assessment of the inmate's ability and potential should be made by a psychologist and a psychiatrist.

Now, in this report it says at page 40 that these special services are in operation at the Mercer complex continually. Well certainly, partly they are, and to some extent at Brampton and at Ingleside they are more available, and to a very small extent at Mercer, because even in the report itself it makes mention of the difficulty to get personnel.

The report says at the bottom of page 40:

This factor together with serious staff recruitment difficulties has tended to slow down and in some instances curtail the operation of the services available within the main Mercer reformatory.

Well, Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt in my mind from what I have seen of Mercer and what I have been able to learn that the actual assessment from a psychiatric and psychological point of view is relatively very small. I think efforts are being made to try to improve it, but certainly the record in the past has not been good and it is still far from really coming to grips with the problem. Certainly, I think, and these are facts—the actual figures I do not have but the hon. Minister (Mr. Grossman) will have—that over the last number of years, and I have said this earlier, there has been a great number of psychiatrists and psychologists, either working full time or part time with The Department of Reform Institutions, who have literally given up in disgust.

This is one of the difficulties, sir, that they have not been able to retain trained help in The Department of Reform Institutions because of the attitude of those in command, and I say the main responsibility for this attitude rests with the hon. Minister of The Department of Reform Institutions and the department itself.

Now, they talk about gaining the confidence of inmates. For example, again the report says at page 41:

In contrast to the conclusions reached by the grand jury during its brief visit to the Mercer—

And incidentally, Mr. Chairman, any visit or visits of a grand jury to any institution are going to be brief, but the amazing thing is that they were so accurate and so much support could be found to substantiate the findings of the grand jury, but they say:

In contrast to the conclusions reached by the grand jury during its brief visit to the Mercer, we find these rehabilitation services to be very much in existence. The availability of these services is known to every inmate in the Mercer but there is no compulsion for them to accept. Many prefer to go their own way and return to their families or former friends. Since they are free to make their own decisions there is little that can be done about it.

Now let us just dwell upon this business of being free to make their own decisions. Here are inmates who come into an institution like Mercer that is strictly custodial. They make no decisions for themselves, then they are suddenly thrust out into the world where they have to make all their decisions. There is not even a simple thing like a canteen where, if they were allowed so much for a day's work, even a few cents, they could spend the money on a choice of cigarettes or greeting cards, or anything that might be used to write home to the family or to anyone else.

Every possible thing, the cigarettes they smoke, the toothpaste they use—any small decision of any kind is taken away from them.

Literally there is no choice in the matter of food. If only there was a canteen where they could buy a chocolate bar, which, incidentally, is not allowed in the institution. They are people who have become so restricted in their thinking that you completely destroy whatever hope or element there is for reform. Again, this is something that is a part of the attitude of the system. Even worse than the old buildings—mind you, the old buildings give an atmosphere that is bad enough, and even the council's report admits that this is the type of building in which you cannot properly carry on a reform institution—but worse than the buildings is the attitude; and this is something that needs to be radically changed in the hon. Minister's department.

The training of the staff—now I know that improvements have been made in The Department of Reform Institutions, I think for the first time in the history of the department we were told that they had a week's seminar. I do not think that this included the matrons at Mercer but at least it is something to the credit of The Department of Reform Institutions that the people in charge of the inmates are getting some extra training. These seminars are good, but this just happened this year, Mr. Chairman. In all the years that we have had a Department of Reform Institutions, they can now come to us and say for the first time—and it is long overdue, and I hope that it is a symptom that despite whitewash reports, the hon. Minister is going to make a real effort to bring improvements to this department. But when we know of the many failures in trying to re-establish women—particularly seeing that I am dealing with this report—in society, I think that the statement made on page 47 of the report is nonsensical when it says:

We find that the criticism and the comments of the grand jury have no foundation in fact and that the rehabilitation of inmates from the Mercer is real in spirit and achievement.

Certainly, it is not in spirit, and if it is in achievement, it is more by luck than anything else, that despite the co-operation of many church organizations, the Elizabeth Fry organization and other people who are interested, the rehabilitation efforts have been very poor, particularly at Mercer. The possibility of these girls getting jobs, because of their lack of training and their lack of help when they get out, from the placement services, is very meagre indeed.

I am not saying that none gets a job or that none is found for them, but in the vast majority of cases, very little is done, and penologists will tell you that when an inmate is released, whether a man or a woman, from an institution, how they go in the future depends on the first days after they have been released from jail. So many of the women from Mercer do not even have proper clothing, especially in cold weather, to go out and get a job and to approach a proper employer. The most a girl can have in her purse, as a result of being at Mercer, is about $10, and I think they are paid about six cents a day for the work they do.

So we have a tremendous amount to do in these fields, in the attitude and training of the staff, and providing decent buildings and even more, in the training of the inmates. But you cannot train the inmates to live in this world, unless you have the proper facilities to help them.

I still do not think, with all the protests of the hon. Minister that we have a proper classification service in The Department of Reform Institutions. This is a whole broad picture. There are still too many inmates and not enough help to classify properly those people who come under the control of The Department of Reform Institutions.

Then you have the problem of the alcoholics and the drug addicts. It is my belief that the day will come, and it should come, that drug addicts and alcoholics will be considered sick people who should be kept in entirely separate institutions—more properly a community that can support itself—rather than continually being sentenced and put into jail. The worst thing that can happen to an alcoholic is a jail sentence. They have become alcoholics or drug addicts because they have lost their self-respect. The next worst thing that happens to them is to have a jail sentence. A record as long as they live.

This is something: The alcoholics and the drug addicts should be out of penology altogether. They should be treated as sick people. I hope that the day will come when this administration, the government of Ontario—it will probably be a Liberal government by that time—will bring these things about.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): We do not intend to wait that long.

Mr. Trotter: We will treat these people in a proper manner, because at the present time, although something has been done to help these people, the atmosphere for drug addicts and alcoholics is nowhere near what is needed to meet the problem. I do hope that we can develop a proper system to take care of them.

One system that might work for alcoholics—as it might work for many people who are in our prisons and in our reform institutions for other causes—is the live-in work-out system practised in the state of Wisconsin, where inmates actually live in an institution, but during the day they go out to work and in this way help to support themselves.

One of the final items I would like to mention, Mr. Chairman, is a matter that was brought up when the present hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Wardrope) had this department. It is a matter that has been recommended by the United Nations congress for the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders, and that is the payment of wages to people who are in our prisons and in our reform institutions.

Now this is only common sense, sir. There is nothing more dignifying than good honest work and we should have these people who are in our institutions working, keeping themselves, and also keeping their families. After all, in the city of Toronto alone, the welfare department pays out $100,000 a year in support of the families of the men who are in prisons here in Ontario. If these people were working and not only supporting themselves and their families, but in many instances, as part of their sentence, paying back those they have stolen from, we would be going a long way forward. I think penologists throughout the world recommend that this is a reform that is needed and in the future it is bound to come.

I know that the present hon. Minister of Mines talked hazily about this, but it seems to have been forgotten, just as the present hon. Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Roberts), when he was Attorney General, talked about having special farms for alcoholics. This was talk; nothing materialized. This is why I get sceptical and cynical when I hear the promises from even the present Minister of what they are going to do, because I have heard promises, promises, from that side of the House over quite a period of time now, and far too often these promises just do not materialize.

But these are the changes that are required in this field, and without them we are not going to improve the situation any more than we have in the past. Again, as I said at the beginning, while in 1950, 35 per cent of the inmates were in our reformatories twice or more, now the figure is 50 per cent. We are losing this battle of reform and it is time for action from the government, which in the past has given very little action.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, I rise tonight to take part in this debate and congratulate the hon. Minister upon the wide-ranging speech which he made this afternoon, a speech which did outline a great deal of policy he is undertaking and a lot of bits and pieces of work that is going forward.

Certainly, I think I agree with what he said at the beginning that across this province he has a dedicated and hard-working staff doing a very difficult job. That job is one of the most important ones going on in any department in this province. The hon. Minister this afternoon gave us an outline of the kind of work he is undertaking and hoping to do. He uses words such as "the finest," "the best," "we are in the lead," and this kind of phraseology. But through the whole thing I could not help but think that in it all, he is more reacting to pressure here and there than outlining and following a long-term, organized plan for his department.

I was interested in looking over the annual report, to read of the achievements and also of the facts and figures presented there. But I was also intrigued, Mr. Chairman, when I opened the cover of these books and I found quotations from two great persons. Inside the first cover is a quotation from Sir Winston Churchill, and inside the second cover, as I opened the book, I found another quotation, from the hon. Minister of Reform Institutions. I suppose it is an indication of ambitions and humility perhaps, and at least we wish him well that some day in the future he may achieve the eminence of some of the great men of the world.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am just trying to emulate him.

Mr. Young: Yes, all right.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: There is nothing wrong with that.

Mr. Young: Last year, on March 11, to be precise, the hon. Minister made his first speech to the House in his present capacity. At that time he outlined the work of his department and told us then what he hoped to do. He was a new Minister and so we could not blame him for any of the things that had not been done. We could look at some of his deskmates, of course, and say, "Why did you not do better?" But we had to give this Minister the benefit of the doubt at that time.

At one point in his speech, he discussed addictions, you remember, and he said that although many factors are taken into account, the strongest factor is the motivation and desire of the inmate to be cured of his addiction. Obviously, after a year of experience in his portfolio, this Minister, too, is addicted to certain things—exaggeration among them. He sees things which just do not exist and presents them as facts.

He has charge of a department, which, while doing many good things—and we give him credit for that—is fundamentally archaic and he refuses to see it. He has superintendents who are ill from overwork and he cannot get replacements. He advertises for staff and his ads go unanswered by qualified people. Many of the best of his staff members in some institutions are leaving for other jobs, and he is faced with having to replace them with others who may have lesser qualifications. He cannot find the specialists he needs to do the jobs in the various institutions. They will not come into the kind of department that exists at present. His position of chief social worker stands vacant, and offices in various institutions, which should be occupied by various specialists in the field, stand empty.

The hon. Minister sends through his system a much larger proportion of our Ontario population than do his counterparts in England, Holland, Sweden and many other democratic countries, which are better equipped to handle the youthful offender outside the penal system. Yet in spite of this, he insists that Ontario is ahead in the field of penology. The hon. Minister talks about research, and yet so far he has given his research department no adequate staff. We hope that will be rectified very quickly.

He introduced a training schools Act and makes little provision for the personnel and machinery in the institutions to make the Act operative. He refuses to outline before this House a long-term plan to modernize the archaic institutions that still exist within the system, and he clings to the pathetic belief that places such as Mercer—of which we have heard so much tonight—and Guelph, can be effective instruments of rehabilitation. Then when he is backed into a corner he shifts the blame for inaction to the federal government and its failure to implement the Fauteux report.

This hon. Minister lives in a dream world of his own making. He tries to persuade himself and us that things are going well in his department, and that if he talks long enough and fast enough about the philosophy of rehabilitation, somehow what he says will, through some miracle, come true. That is not to detract from some good rehabilitative work that is going forward in some of the smaller institutions in this province. But this hon. Minister, Mr. Chairman, needs to be cured of his addiction, and to quote his own words, to be cured he first of all needs motivation and desire.

We are told that the early concept of a custodial prison came from the Puritans. They felt that some place should be provided where the person who had erred could be confined to a quiet place where he could meditate upon his sins. Eventually it was hoped he would emerge penitent. So the penitentiaries were built. Perhaps a bit of quiet meditation of this kind might be good for the hon. Minister. He might emerge less addicted to his illusions and he might be ready to take a more realistic look at his department. Perhaps he would recognize that while some good things are certainly happening, the department—as a department of reforms—is just not doing the job it ought to be doing today and plans are not yet underway for that job to be accomplished.

On March 10, last, the hon. Minister, in his statement about Guelph, said, "This is no kindergarten, this is a prison." Not a reform institution—a prison. The hon. Minister may talk all he wishes about the philosophy of reform but he still thinks of punishment. The emphasis is present. It cannot be otherwise in institutions as large and unwieldy as Guelph; it cannot be otherwise in places such as Mercer.

The hon. Minister needs to start a little healthy self-examination and a bit of therapeutic confession of faith. That done he had better quit shelving his responsibility to the federal authorities. The Fauteux report may or may not be implemented, but the people who run afoul of society's laws are here right now. They must be dealt with right now. The young people who desperately need proper treatment facilities cannot wait for the federal government to make up its mind. That is one thing, it seems, that the federal government just is not capable of doing these days. So this government must begin, and begin now, to speed up the programme of reforms, to train the people needed, to offer the salaries necessary, to rebuild the whole department, to establish the institutions through which rehabilitation can be carried out and in which the emphasis, right through, can actually be changed from punitive to redemptive.

There is, of course, an intriguing alternative to this process and I bring it before the House. If the federal government in fact does intend to assume responsibility for all offenders with sentences of more than six months, it should say so, and it should say so now. Perhaps my hon. friends to the right can carry this message down to Ottawa. That would make a difference all right. It would remove from this department the major institutions for late-teen and older offenders. The jails and the regional institutions that we hope will replace them are now the responsibility of the municipalities. And, of course, we are proposing that the training schools as well as the hospitals and halfway homes that would supplement them should be moved to The Department of Public Welfare. That eliminates the present Department of Reform Institutions. The committee on redistribution has eliminated the hon. Minister's riding, and that disposes of him. It all looks like a very practical and tidy solution to the problem and it may well be a consummation devoutly to be wished, Mr. Chairman.

But the hon. Minister says he objects to the training schools going to welfare—he is fighting it—and while the federal government is looking for Rivard and keeping professors with wrong thoughts out of the country, it is too busy to bother with lesser offenders. It may be a long time before it can get straightened away to deal with the Fauteux report, so that we have the problem to wrestle with and the hon. Minister has it on his own doorstep. The hon. Minister must accept his responsibility to deal with the situation that exists right now. So let him build the new institutions. If the federal government can make up its mind, and if it does decide to implement the Fauteux report, then financial adjustment will be made to compensate the province for its out-of-pocket expenses. I think this is only realism, and it will be done no matter what government may be in power down there in Ottawa when this takes place. In that way, Ontario can accomplish two things, Mr. Chairman: It can move toward a goal of a genuine reform system, and it can also make sure that Ottawa gets a proper institutional setup as a going concern.

Last year in this debate I urged the hon. Minister in his next budget to set before the House a definite plan of development. He has had time to assess the need. He should now tell this House and the people of the province what he hopes to do in modernizing some of the reform institutions during the next decade. No one expects it to be done at once but there needs to be assurance that it is being tackled with determination. So far we have been getting little bits and pieces of announcements unrelated to a master plan. Let the hon. Minister set out the steps that should be taken during the next decade with definite timetables of development and costs.

He may not be here to see it all implemented but that is beside the point. Let him lay out the plan for himself and his successors to follow. Then we will know where we are going. Let us debate that plan here in this House and set it out as a target for development.

The fundamental need of such a plan, of course, is staff. This portfolio has been jumping from Minister to Minister with startling rapidity. This kind of instability cannot help but be reflected down through the whole department. The deputy Minister has buckled under the strain; some of the chief officers in large institutions want out.

There is a fundamental conflict in a job when a superintendent is expected to do a redemptive job in an institution that is not designed for it, and where, try as he may, he can do little more than carry out custodial tasks. There is something wrong, too, when a Minister advertises his positions of responsibility in this way: In the Globe and Mail of February 26:

Ontario, province of opportunity, requires matron, $3,600 rising to $4,200. Several positions are vacant in the Mercer reformatory, Toronto, for matrons. These incumbents carry out custodial duties such as the maintenance of security and discipline, correction of irregularities, giving guidance to inmates in accordance with the regulations, and general rehabilitation work. Incumbent may live in or out and according to existing exigencies. Qualifications: Grade 8, preferably Grade 10 education; age between 25 and 45; ability to pass IQ test required; integrity, self-control and mature judgment essential, good physical condition.

That is for $3,600 to $4,200. And then:

The Department of Reform Institutions, Ontario Training School for Girls in Lindsay; supervisor, starting salary, $3,600; education, Grade 12, preferably; age 25 to 45 years only; experience with teenagers an asset; must be prepared to do shift work; civil service benefits.

These are for positions, of course, where the incumbent will deal with young girls who need sympathetic treatment and care.

Something of the importance that this government attaches to this work is seen in the schedule of salaries in other departments. For example: a dairy herd improvement field man is offered exactly the same salary scale—$3,600 to $4,200—and so is a fish culturist, Grade 1. I am not saying that these positions are not important, Mr. Chairman. They are. But it seems to me that a person dealing with emotionally disturbed and anti-social young people needs more intensive training and a different kind of approach from a field man or a fish culturist. Accordingly, it would seem that higher salaries are called for, and I hope that the hon. Minister will give this his serious consideration.

The hon. Minister has been trying to replace senior staff from time to time, without too much success. The fact is that people are not being attracted because they can see no cohesive philosophy of correction operating here. They hesitate to invest their lives in a department where there is no clear philosophy and no clear goal; where no long term plan is laid down for building a genuine corrective department, with all its necessary personnel and equipment. The hon. Minister will continue to have this fundamental difficulty with staff as long as he goes at the thing piecemeal.

I would like to point out that right now the hon. Minister has a unique opportunity to build staff. His deputy is ill and he needs assistance desperately. Nothing is preventing the hon. Minister from combing the continent for a top-notch person in the reforms field. Whatever it may cost it will be a good investment. Give him any title that is meaningful and give him responsibility to reorganize the department and lay out a long-term plan; tell him to fill the chief social worker's position with a top person in that field and to get the best; let them move together to get outstanding people who can and will respond to a challenge of achievement. Once this is done and a clear indication is thus shown that the department is going places under people who are leaders in their field, others who want to invest their lives meaningfully will be drawn into the service. This will mean higher salaries for top-notch people. The hon. Minister has said that he can get the money but he cannot get the people. He cannot get them now under present circumstances, but they can be attracted if the department is given purpose and direction, as I have indicated.

I quite realize that there are a great number of dedicated and able people within the system right now—I have mentioned that and I stress it again. They are doing a good job in many areas; teachers, custodial officers and workers of all kinds are doing their best to meet the need, but their best is often just not good enough. The salary range offered does not provide the qualified people needed to do a top-notch job.

The Trillium, spring edition, 1965, says this:

There has been a serious attempt in both The Department of Health and The Department of Reform Institutions to use the modern approach in the handling of unfortunates committed to their care. There has been little thought given to the employees who are on the job every hour of every day. There has been no attempt to make the job attractive or worthwhile. The salaries and general working conditions in both departments have barely kept pace with the outside race of progression, even though they started from a miserably low base.

There has been talk of better training and higher qualifications. There has been no recognition of the fact that by and large the ward staffs in the Ontario hospitals and the custodial officers in reform institutions are, in fact, the real agents of rehabilitation. They are the ones who get to know and understand their charges. They are the ones who encourage, watch over and care for their charges.

Politicians are quite willing to quote statistics showing how the turnover in inmates has greatly increased, and take unto themselves the credit for the speedy return to normal life for people who once had little hope for seeing the outside of an institution, once they were committed.

The credit belongs to the professionals also on the job, but deplorably small in number. The morale of inmates will fluctuate with the morale of the employees with whom they are in daily contact. The morale of the employees is presently very low.

This is from the Trillium editorial in a recent edition.

In addition to starting at the top of the department, the hon. Minister should speed up his training programme. The McMaster course is all to the good, but as far as I can gather there seems to be little tie between this department and the school of social work. The hon. Minister has mentioned a research project going on, but surely it would make sense for the department to maintain active liaison with the schools and to provide supervision for students who would undertake field work in the institutions along with their theory. Young people in this way might be encouraged to enter reform as a life work, particularly if the whole field were to be given dynamic meaning and purpose and if the economic rewards were commensurate with those in other areas of endeavour.

In looking to the future, this province, of course, must give full attention to the young people now growing up in such great numbers in our society. The earlier an offender is spotted and treated, the better for society and for the child.

Time was when recidivism was rare; the offenders simply went to the gallows and that was that. It solved the problem. Today with a more humane approach to offenders, the cost of recidivists to society will be very large—in amounts of actual money; in custodial care; in police and court costs; in the care of their families and in the loss of productive wealth while they are incarcerated. To this can be added the human dislocation and suffering, incalculable, but none the less real.

Everyone recognizes the importance of treatment at the earliest possible age, of getting the young offender back on a socially acceptable path. In school, the youngster periodically comes up against a set of examinations—sometimes he fails. If he does, someone is expected to give him a very stern talking to, but he is given another chance possibly with special help. But he stays in the school unless he is completely incapable of handling the work there. The boy who has stolen a car, comes up against another kind of examination; he has failed in the test of conformity to society's code of behaviour, but just as in the case of the other failures, he needs help. To remove him completely from his examination subjects—that is, the standards of society—and then expect him to pass his examination after his release, is now being recognized as not the best kind of policy, Mr. Chairman.

That is why increasing emphasis is being placed on probation service, on working with the young offender in society and helping him to adapt and if his home or his environment is too incompatible, finding another environment in which he can live and learn, but within society.

This work is certainly bound to be expensive but in the long run it will pay off. We are dealing with a commodity—human life—which we all regard as supremely valuable. Even in some cases, if it takes one case worker for a problem child for a period of time, it may well be worth it, if we can restore that child to healthy attitudes and modes of behaviour.

Then, too, in the case where children have to be removed from a home situation, specialized hospitals and foster homes are much to be preferred to the present system of training schools, but not yet have we tackled the problem of professional diagnosis and specialized treatment in this regard in a real way. These matters will be debated in more detail during the estimates and when the training school bill comes before this House, but it seems to me that in addition to some major changes crying for immediate action in the senior field, the major emphasis must be placed on the treatment of the young offender.

Major amounts of social capital must be invested here both to redeem the child at the earliest possible age and to save society from very heavy expense if and when the wayward child turns to an adult criminal.

Again I stress that this process is part of a welfare pattern and this work should be incorporated into that department, but if the hon. Minister and this government insist on keeping it where it is then immediate action is imperative if too large a proportion of another generation of young people is not to be frittered away through neglect.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to turn to another matter in our reform institutions, which has concerned me to a great extent over the past few weeks. We have been lacking in certain specialized areas of care. We heard a great deal about that this afternoon, and the hon. Minister has outlined some of the areas in which he hopes to give that kind of specialized care. The hon. member for Parkdale has talked about specialized care and the need for it. But there is an area to which I draw attention tonight. I want to cite an incident to emphasize the necessity for this kind of care and for more specialization and perhaps more detailed diagnosis and carrying out of the kind of activity which is needed.

In his statement to the House on March 10 in regard to certain incidents in the Guelph reformatory, the hon. Minister made reference to the examination on my part and by the hon. member for Riverdale (Mr. Renwick) of certain documents in that institution. He spent some time on that and brought out certain details which this House ought to look at. The documents related the history of a young man, Ronald Cross, from Belleville, who died in the institution on August 20, 1964. This case first came to our attention when the hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald) received a call early in September asking him to make sure that all the evidence was presented at the coming inquest into the death of young Cross. Mr. MacDonald at that time called the supervising coroner for Ontario, Dr. Cotnam, regarding this matter, and he can perhaps speak for himself as to how that conversation went. Our interest was aroused and on September 10 came the report of the inquest, in the Guelph Mercury. This raised certain questions in our minds and I called the parents of Ronald Cross, who live in Belleville, and then went down at a later time to talk to them about the concern they had had in regard to the death of their boy. They told me about certain conversations they had with another chap, particularly, from the same town, who had known Cross in the reform institution at Guelph.

Then the hon. member for Riverdale and I visited Guelph reformatory. We examined certain records there and spent some time at it. The records showed, and the doctor at that time confirmed, that for some days prior to his death, Cross had been confined to the detention cells in the institution and that while there he had been seen by the doctor who prescribed certain medicines for a stomach ailment. We then secured the transcript of the inquest held in Guelph on September 9, 1964.

I presume this matter has been called to the attention of the hon. Minister prior to this time and I hope he has obtained a transcript of the evidence put forward at that inquest. And I hope he studied it to determine the answers to certain questions that must have arisen in his mind concerning the case, and certainly questions that arose in the minds not only of the parents but of other people concerned with it.

I would like to read, and at some length, from the transcript of the inquest, an inquest which took place in the magistrate's court, Guelph, September 9, 1964. The coroner was Dr. H. F. Farmer, the Crown attorney, J. M. Kearns, QC. There were five members of the jury and we were told that under the circumstances, since this man died in a penal institution, an inquest would be automatic and mandatory.

Now, the witnesses who gave evidence are listed as Robert Nash, clerk of records; Sergeant S. W. Richardson, in charge of the main working party when Cross died; L. C. Yeo, custodial officer; F. Cook, custodial officer; Sergeant Corcoran, custodial officer; E. J. Harloff, assistant superintendent; Dr. G. A. Mellow, senior medical officer; Dr. Marcinkovsky, physician; Dr. Slinger, pathologist; and Charles Sanderson, the superintendent.

The cause of death is given in the evidence here and on page 27 we find these words:

On internal examination the abnormal findings were an enlargement of the heart with trachea fibrous tissue in the muscle of the heart and congestion of the lungs, liver and the spleen. Now, my interpretation of these findings and my explanation of the cause of death is this: I think this man had a sudden heart failure.

This is Dr. Slinger, pathologist:

The cause of the heart enlargement I don't know. But I feel that it had been there for a long time, probably years, and that a situation of increased stress, not necessarily abnormal stress, but somewhat increased stress imposed an extra burden on this diseased heart and that a disturbance in rhythm of the beating of the heart may then have occurred. Ultimately, the heart stopped and produced the finding of congestion in the lungs, liver and spleen which are commonly seen in any case of sudden heart failure.

And on page 26 of the same evidence:

The heart, it is said, weighed 480 grams—

Dr. Slinger again:

Now the normal heart weight is roughly proportionate to a person's weight and for a person of this man's weight the heart should weigh not more than 350 grams. So that this heart was approximately 50 per cent larger than normal and it was enlarged in both the right and the left ventricle.

Now, there was a previous existing condition known, and Dr. Slinger on page 28 of the evidence says this:

I think that he had had this heart enlargement for a long time. What the cause of it is I do not know.

And on page 19 further information:

He first told me—

This is Dr. Marcinkovsky:

He first told me he hadn't any sickness at all. After examination, when I was listening to his heart, I know this, that his was not completely well as it should be. There was nothing striking. When I tried to pursue the history, inquiring about shortness of breath, he admitted he did have a little shortness of breath. After exertion I asked him in comparison to other boys the same age, and so on, doing the same job of exercise, he said yes, he thinks he is shorter of breath than anybody else and I marked that here. As for the heart, I found there were no murmurs. There was some indication of heart disease. I tried him at exercise, like running for a little while on the spot. I listened to his heart and I found some slight murmurs, but I put here in my findings, I found that under "rheumatic heart" at the end where we asked disability, if any, I put "rheumatic heart condition, mild, fit for general work, fit for moderate work, no competitive sports, and no heavy exertion."

The question came to the same doctor:

Did he ever come back to you and complain of anything about having trouble with his heart?

A. Yes, he came in November. The end of November he told me to excuse him from calisthenics. I excused him from this.

Q. Have you a report of him coming to you in November?

A. Yes, on the medical copy, on the first sheet there in front of you. It says in November, "excused from PT, while in the institution." Excused from physical training.

He did not complain at that time of the work and I did not consider any work done over there by inmates as far as I know, that he could do.

Q. Did you see him after he came from Burtch?

A. Yes, I did see him. It would be two or three weeks prior to his death.

Q. What was the occasion that you saw him?

A. He lost his excuse from physical training, and he came to me again to ask for such a note.

Q. Did you examine him again?

A. Yes.

Q. In what condition did you find him?

A. More or less the same as it was in October.

Q. Have you a record of that?

A. No, because he came to me at noon on sick parade when we usually do not bring with us these medical cards and we do not record unless there is something very important.

And on page 36, the evidence of Mr. Sanderson—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Why do you not read the balance of that?

Mr. Young: I beg your pardon?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Why do you not read the balance of that on page 23?

Mr. Young: Page 23, all right, if you wish it.

Q. You consider this all right for ordinary work, not too hard?

A. Well, let us put it this way. I would consider if he was going to do bush work or mining work or maybe piece work—definitely I would forbid it, but knowing the amount of work that they do over there, I would say any kind of work, in my opinion at that time, he could do—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: This is the opinion of the doctor and should be right.

Mr. Young: "—even though I had put that 'rheumatic heart disease; mild.'"

We go forward then to page 36. The only other question, this is of Mr. Sanderson:

Q. No knowledge of any relatives of his having died under the same circumstances?

A. Yes, I have a report here, a presentence report submitted to the court. This was confirmed, yes, that is the word for it. When Mr. Harloff visited the family, a brother who, at the age of 17—this was four years ago, he would be 21 now—was attending school and he simply rolled off the chair with exactly the same condition. He was dead immediately. There is a record of a father not being able to work because of a heart condition. The family is on relief.

Now, the question comes about the family itself, as to whether they were notified of the inquest, and on page 15 we have the question, Mr. Harloff answers:

Immediately upon receiving information from Dr. Mellow—

This would be of the death:

—we immediately notified the local provincial police detachment, Dr. Farmer, yourself, and, thirdly, the next of kin. In this case it was his mother, Mrs. Cross.

Q. Does Mrs. Cross know of this inquest today?

A. I could not say.

Q. Are there no relatives in the court room? Were they notified by you?

A. Yes, by myself, personally. I telephoned them immediately.

Q. But you do not know if any of the relatives were notified that there would be an inquest today?

A. I could not say.

Then, on page 35, along the same line, Mr. Sanderson is asked the same question:

Q. Do you know whether his mother knows of this inquest being held?

A. No, personally, I do not. I did not just think of it. I did not know if we should. I just did not think of it. It might have been an oversight on my part.

Q. Under normal circumstances, all those acquainted with it, they turn up at these inquests?

A. Well, if there is anything, I did not think of it. The people in Belleville—they are in Belleville—they are in straitened circumstances.

Now, we come to the questions as to the assignments that Cross undertook during his period there. On page 30:

Q. Now, would you get a report from the doctor after the examination of every patient? That is correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Every person that went out there?

A. That is right.

Q. Did you have a report on this man?

A. Yes. He was admitted on October 30. He was placed at work on November 1 in our tailor shop.

Then the question:

What were the circumstances? Did you have a talk with him about going to the tailor shop?

A. No, I would not. He would appear before the employment committee that dealt normally with the ordinary procedure. He was in the tailor shop for one month, approximately. On December 2 he was transferred to the Ontario training centre at Burtch. The training centre, part of the institution, houses some 40 inmates. There they receive a more specialized type of training than we can give and the conditions and surroundings are much more open; that is not the closed supervision that we have to have here.

Q. I see. How long did he stay at Burtch?

A. He was there from December 2 until April 2. He was returned. The record from Burtch showed that he had failed to adjust in the surroundings of the training centre.

Q. Did you see him then?

A. Yes, I saw him then. I pointed out to him that he was returned and that he would be placed at work. I said he would be returned to the tailor shop. This is the place where he was before. He asked me to be allowed to go to our main work party. There was going to be one of two places—the tailor shop or our main work party—where he would be under close supervision for some time until we could see how he was adjusting. He said he had worked in the tailor shop, he did not like it, and could he please go to the main work party. I had this card with me at the time and I was able to see what was on it—no heavy exertion; rheumatic heart disease; mild. I drew this to his attention. He said that it was not bad; it did not bother him; he knew the type of work. He said, "I can do it. I have friends in the main work party. Can I please go to the main work party?" He went to the party. He remained there for a period of slightly over a month. He appeared normal. He was transferred to our kitchen. He was in the kitchen for a short period of time.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Do you mind reading the balance of that, on that page?

Mr. Young: Quoting further:

Q. Who would transfer him to the kitchen, and why?

A. The employment committee. This main work party is more or less a holding unit. People go in there, we draw from—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. member would mind—he must appreciate the fact that he is taking some of this out of context. It gives a completely distorted picture. I would suggest if he is reading on page 33, that he fill in the part he has left out there. I think it is very germane.

Mr. Young: I do not mind filling it in at all. It is simply a matter of saving time, and I felt it did not change the meaning at all of any of the records here.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: This is very important.

Mr. Young: The hon. Minister can fill it in if he wishes.

He did not like the kitchen. I have a report here. The officer who made the report is present. It is dated May 26. The report states that a couple of weeks ago the above-named inmate asked me for a work board out of the kitchen. He said he hated working inside and that he wanted on the main work party. He was returned to the main work party and that was the final dealings I had with him.

Who committed him later to detention, I am not sure.

One more excerpt from the evidence here. On page 5:

Q. What were they doing in the main work party?

A. They were moving land fill from a gravel-pit area, so-called, to a stockpile. This inmate in question was loosening up the dirt for those who were taking it away in wheelbarrows to remove it.

Q. Loosening it up?

A. Loosening it up with pick and shovel to make a convenient heap for the boys with the wheelbarrows to load it up and take it away.

Q. Any complaints from him at all about the work?

A. No complaints about the work.

Mr. Chairman, in connection with this evidence, there are certain questions that perhaps ought to be answered, and I would like to outline these questions because I think they are very pertinent in this situation.

The first question I would like to put before the House is this: This man obviously had a serious heart condition—the X-rays taken when he was admitted would have shown this. Why was this fact not prominently noted in his medical record? It evidently was there but not how serious the condition was. Why would he be allowed to go to the main work party, even though he may have asked for it—which I understand is the hardest work in the institution?

Question No. 2: Why was no mention made at the inquest of Cross being in detention for several days prior to his death, and of this evidence we saw in the institution that he was in detention from August 12 to August 17?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: There is no hard work in there.

Mr. Young: Was it because he could not stand up to the work?

Question No. 3: Why was he sent to detention in the first place? Was he complaining and was he sent in there? We do not know, we would like it answered and the parents would like it answered.

Question No. 4: Why was no evidence submitted about his medical problems while in detention? Dr. Mellow told us in Guelph that he had seen him in the hospital. He evidently was sent there from detention and the doctor had ordered stomach pills for him.

Question No. 5: Did the doctor at this time carefully examine him to make sure that it was indigestion? Even a layman understands that the symptoms of stomach and heart troubles are often similar and one may be mistaken for the other. In view of the condition of this man, and in view of the fact that he was known to have a serious heart condition, was adequate examination made at that time?

Question No. 7: Why was no evidence submitted as to when Cross returned from detention to the main work party? Was he returned directly to the work party, or kept in cells for a time and then returned? As one can understand, after five days in detention on a restricted diet and with no exercise, it would be a rather hazardous move back to the main work party for a man with a bad heart.

Question No. 8: Why was no inquiry made as to whether Cross complained of trouble on August 20, the day he died? I ask this because his mother names a person, Grant Wiltshire, from her own town of Belleville, who was in the work party that afternoon and who says that Cross did complain of pain that afternoon and yet was not allowed to go. I quite realize that this would be an unreliable witness and I grant this. But why then was not Wiltshire and others who worked with Cross in the work party called to the inquest, because here one could corroborate the other. And then inquiries could have been made at that point as evidently they were not, as to whether he had complained and his complaint had gone through to the custodial officer in charge.

Question No. 9: Why did Dr. Mellow state at the inquest as found on page 18:

During the time he was confined in the institution never once did he complain, give any complaint suggestive of any heart or lung embarrassment, never once. Never once did he come to me saying his work was too heavy or anything like that.

Now this may well be true. He may not have specifically said he had trouble with his heart but certainly the doctor told us when we were there that this boy had come to the hospital, that he had examined him and given him medication for his stomach.

Question No. 10: Who determined who should be called as witnesses at the inquest?

Question No. 11: Why was the family not notified of the date of the inquest? And while it may well be true that the family itself may not be wealthy, surely in a situation like this some arrangements might have been made for that family to come and attend the inquest of their own son.

Question No. 12: Why were the inmates who worked with Cross on August 20, not called? I mentioned the difficulty here and quite realize it. But cross-checking could have been done in this case.

Question No. 13: Why were the custodial officers and other officials who dealt with Cross while in detention, not called? Evidently, as far as I can examine the evidence at the inquest, these people were not called.

Question No. 14: What happened to the five pages missing from the record book: the five pages which are mentioned in the statement on March 10—were mentioned by the hon. Minister? The question was asked at that time, how the mother knew about the deletion of these pages. The mother did not know. This is just another illustration of the way that many of the so-called facts are mixed up in this statement. The mother did not know, the mother did not mention it. The first time the missing pages were mentioned at all was by the superintendent when the hon. member for Riverdale and I were in the area of the detention cells. When we asked to see the book at that time, he told us that there were five pages missing and later he produced the book in his own office and showed it to us. Then why are these missing? I quite appreciate the fact that it was mentioned—and it was mentioned by the hon. Minister in this House—that any one of 50 people possibly could have removed those pages. But evidently this was not brought forward at the inquest and it seems to me that this was rather important evidence that should have been noticed.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if—

Mr. Young: There is one further question—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I know, but the hon. member is directing questions at me in matters relating to how a coroner conducted an inquiry. Surely he does not think that this is within the jurisdiction of my department to tell a coroner how to run an inquest?

Mr. Young: I am bringing the hon. Minister's attention to a certain problem which was within the scope, I am not asking the hon. Minister—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: No, but you are asking me these questions.

Mr. Young: I am putting these questions on the record to be answered by whoever can answer them, Mr. Chairman.

And the 14th question, the final one is this: Were the witnesses heard one by one and excluded from hearing the testimony of other witnesses during the inquest?

Now, I quite realize what the hon. Minister has said, that an inquest does not come under the purview of his department. I mentioned as I began to relate this incident that he had brought this first of all before this House in his statement on March 10. I also mentioned that there are certain facilities that should be offered within our reform institutions, specialized facilities which are not being properly offered at this time.

Now, this young man may have died at this time no matter what. He may have died, even though he may not have been in detention. He may have died regardless of whether he was in the main work party or not. But certainly the using of a pick and shovel, even at his own request, at a time like this, could do nothing but add to the difficulty that he had. And surely more care should have been exercised here to direct this young man into some other activity or work. Even though he may have wished to go with his friends in the main work party, some other kind of treatment and some other kind of therapy should have been available for him at this time.

I think the parents had a right to be at the inquest and this is a place where the department could have offered some help. They have a right to have answered the questions that I have placed on the record tonight. Who answers them may be immaterial, but they have a right to have those questions answered. I think the other question that the hon. Minister himself must answer is whether we have facilities today to handle a case such as this one, a borderline case but a case where it was well known that a serious heart condition existed and where an unfortunate accident took place. If we have not these facilities then we ought to be addressing ourselves to the problem of developing these facilities and doing the job that ought to be done so that we can have the proper classification of an inmate of this kind to steer him into the kind of therapy which will be at least adequate for his difficulty and adequate for his treatment.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, first, of course, I would deal with some of the questions that were raised by the hon. member for Parkdale. I think I would be less than doing my duty to my colleagues if I failed to reply and make some comment on the suggestion or a statement that was made by the hon. member for Parkdale regarding how little this department, this government cared or how little an interest this government had in reform institutions when so many members left during my speech, and this proved a lack of interest on the part of the government. Of course, I appreciate that it has always been a policy of the Opposition as soon as they feel that they can, at some particular time, put on the record that there are few on this side of the House to take the opportunity to do so. Someone reading Hansard might get the impression that what the hon. member said did, in fact, mean that there was a great lack of interest. Before he said that he should have looked around at his own colleagues or those who happen to be there and those who happen to be missing. At least my leader, the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) who, I think, is at least as busy as his hon. leader (Mr. Thompson), stayed for about three quarters of my comment. His leader left about 10 or 15 minutes after I got underway. I am not suggesting there is anything wrong with that.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, on a point of privilege, I happened to be sitting here. I want to make it very clear that I was sitting here.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That may be. Does anybody know where the hon. Prime Minister was sitting, or where some of my colleagues were?

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Why does the hon. Minister not deal with substantial matters?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, all right. I think the hon. member should have dealt with substantial things. I will deal with them. I will deal with them. I do not think there was anything wrong with the hon. leader of the Opposition not having been present, or some other member.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, let me state again that I was present. I was in the House.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. leader of Opposition was not in his seat. I say there was nothing wrong with that, and there would have been nothing wrong had he not been here at all. Presumably the hon. member has many obligations and many commitments and has many things to do, and so does my hon. leader and the members of the government and the members on this side.

An hon. member: How about getting down to answering the questions?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, we are looking after that. The hon. member for York South knows I never ignore these things, he must know that, I never sidestep these questions, I always answer them.

First of all, Mr. Chairman, we never suggested as the hon. member for Parkdale suggested that we did, that the Mercer buildings compared favourably with the best of the institutions in this country. It was not the institution. I was referring—and if the hon. member would like me to I will go back in my speech to where I was talking about the programme—I was referring to the programme and not the institution. Obviously I could not be referring to the physical building because I myself in the same comment stated that it was an outdated building and it needed replacing, so I just wanted to get that clear.

As far as the programme is concerned, it does definitely compare very favourably with most of the correctional jurisdictions across this country and across the United States as well.

Now, there is also some statement—the hon. member for Parkdale also said we had a difficult time keeping professional staff there. I think the expression used was that they were in and out like a revolving door. I do not know where he got that impression. I would like him to name for me if he can those psychiatrists and psychologists who have been in and out of Mercer all those years.

Mr. MacDonald: Most of them have not been in.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, of course, they have. We have Dr. Boothroyd, the psychiatrist, who has been there about 15 years, and Dr. Boothroyd, incidentally, in addition to being the consulting psychiatrist for the department, is an associate professor of psychiatry at the University of Toronto and head of psychiatry at Sunnybrook hospital—no mean accomplishment. I think he is a very able gentleman, and he has been there 15 years and does not find things so depressing that he cannot put up with this terrible department of ours.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): How many hours a week?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: As many hours as are required.

Mr. MacDonald: Anybody can survive that.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We have Dr. Flint who has been there for 13½ years. We have Mr. Marshall, the psychologist, who has been there just about four years, and five years with the department. Mrs. Yablo, psychologist, has been there for 3½ years.

Mr. Singer: How many hours does she put in a week?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We have as much staff there as is required. If we needed others and could not get them we would bring them in from another institution.

Mr. Singer: Have you talked to Mrs. Yablo and asked her that?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: One thing at a time. We would always like to have more psychiatrists and more psychologists if we could get them, but they are just not available.

Mr. MacDonald: That is the point we have been trying to make.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: All right. This does not affect the point I am making here. The point I am making here, Mr. Chairman, is that this is not just a problem with Mercer; this is not just a problem with The Department of Reform Institutions, it is a problem with every jurisdiction all over the world in all departments. There just are not enough psychologists, there are not enough psychiatrists to go around, and the hon. members certainly know that, I am sure they do.

The hon. member also started to talk about letters that he had received and the information he got from some of the ex-inmates. Of course, he did not mention some of the letters he got which spoke very favourably of the institution.

Mr. Trotter: One minute! On a point of order here. I said at the beginning that most of my information came from actual personal interviews with people who had been staff members or ex-staff members, the majority of whom had been teachers, psychologists, psychiatrists or people who actually had considerable experience in penology in the Toronto area, and it went from 18 years ago up to December, 1964. I did get some letters from inmates, but very few. I really did not get my information from the inmates. I talked to a few, but not very many.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: If the hon. member wants letters as a result of that business at Mercer, I have dozens and dozens of copies, not only from ex-inmates, but from present inmates, from professional staff who were with the institution in the past, and people like that. I mean, if you are going to pay attention to this sort of thing we can deluge you with them. This is not the kind of thing that you can settle on the basis of this kind of information. You have to get your information from these people who are qualified to give it.

Insofar as the library is concerned, I do not intend to deal at any great length with the M.A.C.T.O. report and I will explain why very shortly.

But I do not know why the hon. members were not able to see the books that were there, because on the first day we went out there when this thing first hit the newspapers, we took the press out there, and even according to the press report the visitors found several hundred books on the shelves. And though the library does not claim to supply all the material asked for, we were, for example, unable to supply the women inmates who complained to the press that they were not allowed any pocket books or any form of scandal sheets. This was their complaint, and therefore they had to be content with magazines, library books and newspapers. This is what they complained about. I think that the report by the advisory committee, which shows that well over 900 books were added in the last five years, is an indication that the inmates of Mercer are being supplied with reading material which is related to their interests and ability. This library was built up to its present standard for the use of the Mercer inmates, and not to suit visitors of any kind, whether they be grand jury foremen or members of this Legislature.

I do not know why the hon. member did not notice this, everyone else seems to have noticed it except these two people—

Mr. Trotter: Why would they not show them to us?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member did not have to be shown; why did he not just go to the library and look?

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I cannot understand that. In other words the Minister's advisory committee on the treatment of the offender and the chief librarian whose job is practically 80 per cent doing this sort of work and the librarian in charge—all of these people are carrying on a sham. It is ridiculous!

Mr. Trotter: Even the hon. Minister's whitewash report said that.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Now let us deal with this "whitewash." Someone has to make a decision as to whose word to take, Mr. Chairman, and we are back at the old position again where you listen to a lot of wild statements by some ex-inmates.

I do not care what penal institution you go to, you are going to find a tremendous amount of beefing and complaining. As I think I mentioned in the House before, inmates have a tendency—I hate to use the word again because it sounds as though I am trying to act like a social worker—the term is manipulate the people they are talking to. If you go in and discuss matters with them they will tell me one story and they will tell you another, depending on what they think you want to hear. They want to ingratiate themselves with the person they are talking to, because they want to get a feeling of importance. This is the way they feel they can get it. If this is where you are going to base your evidence, there is nothing anyone else can do.

Mr. Trotter: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I spent about a month checking into the background of Mercer before I went there and in that time I do not think I talked to a single inmate. I have talked to a few since that time. Again I repeat, all the personnel I talked to were highly qualified; so quit talking about my getting back to inmates.

Mind you, I think a lot of them should be believed. I tell the hon. Minister this: No matter how bad he thinks these inmates are, over a period of years different people who have interviewed them, there is a pattern established of what went on. I most certainly believe that in essence what they have said, even the inmates, even the worst of them, has been the truth. So quit trying to throw the blame back on the inmates.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am not trying to throw anything back on the inmates at all. I am trying to point out to the hon. member where he is getting his information and that his research was not research at all—and it was not.

Incidentally, I have been asked to announce that the score is Montreal 2, Toronto 0.

An hon. member: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That just proves what I have to put up with—somebody rooting for Montreal.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the term “whitewash” has been much used in connection with the advisory committee report. I do not know why one or two hon. members insist on smearing—which is what they are doing—the members of the Minister’s advisory committee.

First of all the hon. member makes the implication, by the way he handles his words, that this council was appointed especially for this particular inquiry. I know he knows otherwise, and he did not say that; but this is the impression that he would leave. This committee was appointed about five years ago. They are outstanding citizens, experts in their field. Just to put it on the record again, the chairman is the Reverend Martin W. Pinker, who is—I will not go into the details because they are on the record—an outstanding man in the field of penology.

Her Honour Judge Helen Kinnear also has an outstanding record in this field—I do not know why anyone would want to suggest that she would want to do a job for the government incidentally, she was appointed a judge by a Liberal federal government—and in about two or three weeks, she is to be given a signal honour by the John Howard society of Ontario for her outstanding work in this field. Another member of this committee of course is Mr. Joseph McCully, presently the dean of Hart House and the former deputy commissioner of penitentiaries for Canada—an outstanding record—and who, incidentally, was also given the same signal honour some years ago by the John Howard society. Other members are His Honour Judge Harry Waisberg; the Venerable Archdeacon Myron Davies; and Mrs. Cameron McKenzie.

Now why would anyone want to so charge such outstanding citizens, who give of their time freely without compensation, unless the hon. member feels that the $20 per diem that they get for attending a meeting would motivate these people to do a job for the government or for the Minister? I do not know why he would do this; I do not know why he would feel that they are obliged to do this. I cannot understand it.

Of course, the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Sargent) before the report was even presented, and I think the hon. member for Yorkview also, said that this report was going to be a whitewash. If they cannot depend on the report of outstanding people like this being an objective, honest report, I do not know on whom they can depend. But, of course, it is an old story; you ask a government or somebody to appoint a commission, a commissioner or an investigating committee, and unless the report suits the Opposition, then it is a whitewash. This has been said before. I leave this in the hands of the public as to whom they will believe; whether they will believe such outstanding citizens or whether they believe the sort of people who have engaged in wild statements in respect of Mercer.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): The Elizabeth Fry society, for example, did they engage in wild statements?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: If the hon. member raises the question of the Elizabeth Fry society I would say this: The Elizabeth Fry society came out immediately with a statement that they—I want to make sure that I use the proper terminology—I think the terminology they employed was that they agreed with the report. I forget exactly how they put it.

Mr. Bryden: Give the statement that they made about the grand jury report.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am referring to this and I am trying to get the exact statement so that there will not be—I will read it:

On Friday, November 6, reports to the effect that the Elizabeth Fry society backed the report of the grand jury appeared in all three Toronto newspapers and on radio and television. All stated that the Elizabeth Fry society endorsed the grand jury report.

The fact that this was qualified by the statement: "Where we have been able to verify the facts," made very little difference. Then, as a matter of fact, they said in the bulletin I think, which the hon. member read, that they would then investigate the report in greater detail.

I think they appreciate now that they jumped the gun and should not have hurried out with such a statement; first to endorse and then to say that they are going to investigate. As a matter of fact, when you get down to it, the charges by the original grand jury were, I think, about eight in number. The Elizabeth Fry society finally, in their final report, backed up two of them. I think if they had to do it all over again, they would do it just a little differently. They made a mistake.

Mr. Trotter: Is the hon. Minister speaking for them?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I tell the hon. member that obviously if they backed up the report which had eight condemnations and then finally came out and backed it up in the case of two, obviously they must have made a mistake. On investigation they found that they could not back up the other six.

Incidentally, the Elizabeth Fry society are not too strong about replacing Mercer, for your information; which shows the dilemma that there is in this work, listening to all these experts.

The Elizabeth Fry society say: "We are not so concerned with the physical facilities at Mercer except we feel that your detention rooms could perhaps be improved upon."

Mr. Bryden: Well now, this is a typical Grossman twist. What they said was that the physical facilities were not the thing of first importance—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: What was I just saying?

Mr. Bryden: The hon. Minister said that they said they were not too much concerned with the physical facilities. You see—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I will put it in the hon. member's words; they did not say that a new Mercer was of major importance—

Mr. Bryden: That is not what they said—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: —of first importance! Is that what they said? Perhaps I will be able to get this and read to the hon. member exactly what they did say. They are concerned, they said, about the programme, about the treatment programme.

Now, there is always a difference of opinion. When we build the new institutions there is generally a complaint that the new institutions look too much like institutions and there are some people who think that they should not look like institutions, they should look like old residences and all that sort of thing. Quite frankly, and I will be honest with the hon. members, as far as I am concerned if I get money from the Treasury and I have to make a choice between setting up new buildings, there are a lot of other places I could put this money into rather than putting up a new Mercer on King Street. We could put some money into Mercer on King Street and improve some of the things which need improvement, but rather than put a million and a half dollars there I would put it into more training schools or some other facility. The fact remains that we do not need money for Mercer, because we can get as much out of the sale of the existing property to put up a new institution.

Mr. Trotter: Well, why do you not do it?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: This is what we are doing and I told you we are doing.

Mr. Trotter: We have been hearing that for 44 years.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well now, Mr. Chairman, this is a sort of a vicious circle. They say why are you not doing it; and I say I am doing it; and they say we have been hearing it for 44 years.

What do you want me to say? Should I have brought the new building in my hands here and shown it to you?

Mr. Bryden: We want you to stop talking and start doing it.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I said I was doing it.

Mr. J. F. Edwards (Perth): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. Everybody is yakking all over the House, they have been doing it for years. Why not address the Chairman and stand up, instead of speaking in this manner?

Mr. Bryden: The hon. member had better be careful, he is liable to throw himself right off balance.

Mr. Edwards: Oh no, I will not. As far as you are concerned, you have been off balance for years.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member suggested that they were helping me in their criticism because it would help me get money from the Treasury. I will say right now that aside from some very minor requests, I have had everything this year from the Treasury board and from the government that I have asked for. You have not done me any good here because I have, in the presence of all my colleagues, to say; and some of them may be annoyed because they could not get everything they wanted, so you have not helped me in that respect. I do not know how you could make that statement when I announced that I have had Treasury board and Cabinet approval for a new training school in northern Ontario which will approach in cost, I suppose, some $2 million; when I have had an approval of a new building at a new institution to replace King Street Mercer, and put it out in Brampton; when I have had not only approval, but we have already purchased the RCAF station at Hagersville which, when it is finished, will cost us some $750,000; when I have had approval for staff for the department of research, and numerous other things I cannot recall at the moment.

That is a pretty good bite to take out of the Treasury in one particular year, and I want to say I am very grateful to my colleagues in the government and the Treasury for having approved of these funds so I can proceed with these projects.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): What has held you up in the past? You had the funds in 1964 that you did not expend—$3,670,000.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member by having gone through estimates, surely understands this by this time. You just cannot take money from one vote to another, because he would probably be the first one to complain if he came here next year and said: "We voted you $5 million in vote No. so-and-so; you had no right using it for another vote." This calls for a different kind of planning and a different kind of procedure.

Regarding the suggestion that we should not use the federal government as an excuse; I think there is a certain irresponsibility to this. I am not using, and this government is not using, the federal government's lack of action to implement the Fauteux report as an excuse, because we have, by and large, directed our attention to the juvenile aspect. Most of our efforts in the department and most of our money has gone into juvenile institutions, because we know this will remain our responsibility. But surely the hon. members would not expect me to go out and spend $4 million or $5 million on institutions and have them halfway finished, or perhaps completely finished, and then find out they were obsolete because of the new type of responsibilities we would have had to assume? This would be irresponsible on our part. And the reason for the delay—I explained this before when the matter of the Mercer came up, and I will explain it again—was precisely the federal government's announcement. I emphatically repeat that I had had approval from the government and from the Treasury well before October or November. It was away back, I think, in July when I had approval for a new institution for women. With any sense of responsibility we just had to stop that and I had M.A.C.T.O., the Minister's advisory committee, proceed on an investigation to find out how we could go ahead with such an institution in such a fashion that it would not become obsolete in case of a change in responsibility. In other words, can you put up some buildings which will do this job which we could convert to, say, a juvenile institution or a male institution or something of that nature? That is what they were proceeding with when they were interrupted by the necessity for an investigation on account of the grand jury's report; they have resumed that at this time. Incidentally, they had an architect assigned to them from The Department of Public Works to help them with this plan. I hope that that will once and for all lay the canard that we do not intend to do anything about Mercer, or that it is the same old story all over again.

I tell the hon. members here that barring any unforeseen circumstances, which we cannot prophesy right now, if there is any possibility of us not proceeding with a new institution for women, it will not be at a time when I am head of this department. This is not only a commitment, but money has been laid aside. As a matter of fact, when The Department of Public Works estimates come up, you will see money in the department for planning.

And perhaps it might be just as well to read some communications I had with the hon. Minister of Justice. This, perhaps, will document what I have said, so you will not get the impression that this is just a lot of talk. On February 14, 1964, I wrote to the hon. Guy Favreau requesting an early meeting to discuss some of our projected plans in the province of Ontario, telling him that they are directly related to federal action in the implementation of recommendations of the Fauteux report and must, perforce, be postponed pending definite information as to the plans in this respect. On March 11, about a month later, the Minister of Justice replied and stated, amongst other things, that: "I should be very glad to meet you in my office, etc." and set a date for March 26. On March 18, we accepted and we wrote to him what we thought should be discussed. We told him:

It is suggested that while the implementation of all recommendations of the Fauteux report are of interest, federal planning and intentions concerning recommendations 30 and 31 are paramount. Discussion around these two recommendations will, I am sure, lead to many other avenues for mutual exploration.

On June 8, I wrote to the Minister of Justice, after having met with him, outlining the problems which we had at that time discussed. In other words putting on the record some of the problems we discussed with him. I stated:

In my presentation to you, I mentioned three of the recommendations of the Fauteux report which directly affect the future planning of my department. Therefore, I would appreciate being informed just when we may expect that these recommendations will be implemented. These recommendations were Nos. 12, 30 and 31. Recommendation No. 31 states: "The provincial governments should be responsible for the care and treatment of penal institutions of persons sentenced to imprisonment for maximum terms of six months or less; persons sentenced to imprisonment for longer than six months should be confined in penal institutions operated by the federal government."

In my presentation to you I pointed out that our construction programme was largely dependent upon the implementation of this recommendation. While we are maintaining our present institutions, the location and construction of new modern institutions is being withheld until we know definitely of the federal plans.

On June 22 I received a photocopy of a section of the record of the 1958 Dominion-provincial conference on correctional reform from the assistant deputy Minister of Justice, which showed that the Dominion should proceed to plan for a revised penal system of such character that it would be in a position to assume responsibility for persons sentenced under federal laws to terms of one year or more. Such plans are to be formulated on the basis that the Dominion government will have decided that sentences under federal laws of more than six months, but less than one year, should be eliminated.

On July 27, 1964, the Minister of Justice wrote, stating:

As I understand it, your primary concern relates to the implementation of recommendation 31 of the Fauteux report. That recommendation was to the effect that the provincial governments should be responsible for the care and treatment in penal institutions of persons sentenced to imprisonment for maximum terms of six months or less, and persons sentenced to imprisonment longer than six months should be confined to penal institutions operated by the federal government. I can quite well understand that your construction programme will be largely dependent upon the implementation of this recommendation.

Now, surely all reasonable people must understand that. I would like to have a programme in mind, for example, for the reduction of the size of Guelph and we are doing everything we possibly can by setting up forestry camps and training centres. But these can only hold a certain type of prisoner; you cannot, for example, trust everyone in a forestry camp that is an open institution.

In the final analysis, to reduce the size of Guelph we are going to have to put up newer, smaller buildings. It would be the height of folly for this government to spend the taxpayers' money to, in the first place, even locate such institutions, which may not fit in with the plans of the federal government at all, and then to set up a programme within them, when you do not know what sort of a programme to establish. Obviously, a programme for prisoners who are going to be sentenced to six months or less has got to be entirely different from a programme for people who are serving longer terms than that.

I hope that settles the minds of the hon. members of this House insofar as the reasons for withholding certain plans. It is not a question of passing the buck at all; as I have just pointed out, I have had a tremendous amount of money approved to go ahead with plans which we know, in every likelihood, will not be interfered with by any change in the federal government's plans.

There are other matters which the hon. member raised in regard to Mercer. I think we could go into this at great length and go over all this story again. As far as I am concerned, this council of very estimable and capable gentlemen, brought in their report. I stated, when I tabled the report in this House, that insofar as it was possible and practicable, we would carry out every recommendation they have made. This we have proceeded to do. I do not think anything could be fairer than that. If the hon. member wants to call it whitewashing, and that sort of thing, then this argument could go on, back and forth, for two or three days; and I do not see any point in engaging in it.

The hon. member for Yorkview suggested we should set a programme for ten years. We agree; we would like to do this; but I think I have explained why we cannot set up a programme for ten years. What we are trying to do is devise a programme for juveniles for ten years, although even this is very difficult. It is very difficult. Who knows what the situation will be ten years from today?

I think we can lay out a skeleton chart. I think we can talk about locations and set out a programme for a ten-year period, which is precisely the period we were thinking of; and, insofar as it is possible to do so, we plan on doing so; but we certainly could not start on this for adult institutions. I am sure the hon. members will agree, in view of what I have said, that it would be stupid to go ahead with such a plan for the adult institutions.

Insofar as this Cross matter is concerned—

Mr. Thompson: May I ask the hon. Minister a question on the federal-provincial discussions which take place on penal reform and on the Fauteux report? Could you tell me, sir, what the machinery is? You are obviously wanting to get the Fauteux recommendations initiated and the federal government to assume its responsibility with respect to this. What kind of machinery do you have in order to initiate action by the federal government?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, actually the federal government has not made its decision yet. This was our great disappointment. Some time ago it had decided—it was pretty well understood—that it would go ahead with this plan. All our plans were based on it. I am sure all the provincial jurisdictions across Canada were basing their plans on this assumption. But, lo and behold, the hon. Minister of Justice, a few months ago, came out with a public announcement that he would soon announce the federal government's policy as to what the penal programme would be; and he set up a committee to study this. I think it was a parliamentary committee, I am not too sure.

Mr. MacDonald: Why did Fulton sit on it?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: He set up a committee to go into this matter. Quite frankly, as I say, all jurisdictions have their problems and I do not really want to be critical of the federal government, but we all know—those of us in this work have a pretty good idea—what needs to be done. I do not know why he set up the committee. This had all been thrashed out with the Archambault commission and with the Fauteux commission; and to set up a committee at this stage does not seem to us to do anything but retard progress in this field. But no decision has been made.

In other words, the federal government presumably is waiting for recommendations from this committee; then it will make its announcement again. In my view, what is happening here is the same thing that happens in a city when you lay down a redevelopment plan and do not go ahead and expropriate the properties and plan your redevelopment. All that happens while you are doing this is that a cloud hangs over the area and the area becomes worse than it was before, because no one is making a move. Obviously this is the position we are in, insofar as our adult institutions are concerned. We are struggling with it as best as we can, as I pointed out. We will always be able to use forestry camps.

Oh, yes; I should have mentioned that one area into which we have gone is that of regional detention and classification centres. We presume, because we are dealing with short-term offenders in the county jails, that this will be something which will fit into whatever plan comes into existence.

So we are trying to deal with those things which we feel are not going to be affected. Unfortunately, I happened to be a Minister at the time when we finally got approval for a new women's institution; and, in the middle of the whole business, came this statement by the federal Minister. This is precisely what happened. I hope this answers the questions in respect to our problem of holding these things up—it is because of the federal government's action, or inaction.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Minister, I do not want to interrupt you if you are going to be answering other questions; but, on this question of your moving into forestry camps and other areas; I would feel you, by now, must have a fairly accurate picture in general of the type of person who comes for six months less a day—the age of the people, the kind of problems they have. I think that, in a speech made by a former leader of the Liberal Party, it described age, the alcoholism factor, the number of broken homes, the very low educational accomplishment, and so on. In view of this could you be, and are you, concentrating and focusing on treatment for these kind of people, because these are the ones for whom you are going to have to assume responsibility?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I think I mentioned earlier, I am sure I mentioned in my speech, that in the view of most people in this world, this chronic petty offender to whom we are referring, does not really belong in the penal system as a structure today. There is some study going on, and this is as far as I can go in this respect.

However, even if we did not touch this, even if this department did not touch this, I think the hon. members must agree that we have bitten off quite a chunk this year. As a matter of fact, I think, if I had to do it over again, that I would not have embarked on such an extensive programme; because really it is a little too much for the department. People are working overtime, and it is only because they are such devoted people that they are prepared to go ahead with this. I would have carried out this programme over a period of two or three years. But even if we did nothing else, and carry on for the next two or three years on the programme we have started here and the programme I have outlined in my speech, I think this would be quite a bit.

But even in this respect, in this area, it may be effective—in the area the hon. leader of the Opposition is talking about. It may be that the federal government's views in this particular area may touch on matters which would preclude us from going ahead with any plans here, too. It is just too dangerous a thing to proceed on. We feel it is much wiser to proceed with those things and, Lord knows, there are enough of those things to do which we know we are going to be able to handle, and which we are going to have to handle.

Mr. Thompson: One other thing which seems to me to be fairly clear is that I cannot for the life of me see why you are congratulating the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. Allan) saying you can even get all the money you needed at this time, and you would think it was a very sizeable amount. Then we have an hon. colleague here reading out the advertisement with respect to matrons and others and the paltry salary you are going to offer these people. Surely this would emphasize that you would have to give a decent salary?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Of course the hon. member knows so well that each department and each Minister is presently engaged in the matter of setting salaries for his staff. The hon. member, I am sure, knows that salaries are now the subject for negotiation between the civil servants and the government—the civil service commission—and I think it would ill behoove me, or any member of this Legislature, to engage in this subject, because it could affect negotiations.

Mr. Bryden: Oh, what nonsense.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, that is my view.

Mr. Bryden: You people do not engage in any negotiations—

Mr. MacDonald: It is your responsibility.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am sure that is not a ridiculous argument. Certainly the hon. member must know that it would be a chaotic situation for every department to set its own salaries.

Mr. Thompson: May I ask the hon. Minister: Have you gone to the civil service commission and asked them to recognize that there are staff shortages? And also, from the point of view of salaries, that they should be raised? Have you done this for your department?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am sure the hon. leader of the Opposition knows that is a question I cannot answer.

Mr. Thompson: Why not?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Because, by the mere process of polling each Minister, to put one on the spot by saying "Why did you not go to the—"

Mr. Bryden: We are putting you on the spot right now.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Whatever we do by way of salaries, the government takes the collective responsibility for.

Mr. Bryden: Now there should be—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bryden: I am talking to fellows who just voted themselves an increase that was bigger than the amount they would receive.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member for Yorkview mentioned that we have no research staff. As a matter of fact, we have had approval just recently for an additional four staff in this section. He also said that we should have a greater connection with the University of Toronto school of social work. This is precisely what we do have. Our director of research—it is a cross arrangement with the University of Toronto school of social work—works part-time for them and part-time for us. Really, he is working most of the time for us. This arrangement was made deliberately.

Mr. Young: Are you doing field work of the kind I mentioned?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Oh, yes, the students taking field work in the department are students of psychology. Nine are at present under Dr. Ross, of our department and the University of Waterloo. Seven are already engaged and are taking their field work with us this summer under the supervision of three university professors. This is being enlarged as we go along. We are managing to get good co-operation and collaboration with the universities, so this is going to expand to an even larger extent in the future.

Now to deal with this Cross case. I really hesitate to do this, because this is again a situation where a coroner had an inquest and a coroner's jury dealt with this thing. How far do you go with this? Surely our responsibility, when the coroner's jury makes a decision, ends there? They made their decision and the decision was that there was no negligence on the part of the institution.

Quite frankly, I do not think the hon. member did the right thing when he took pieces of evidence out of the coroner's report, because it does not give a clear picture; obviously, I did not want him to read the whole report.

Mr. MacDonald: Did the jury do the right thing in getting only part of the evidence?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member would not expect me to make any comment about the way a coroner's jury did its duty. I am sure the hon. member must agree to that.

Mr. MacDonald: Did the institution play any role in choosing the witnesses?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Choosing the witnesses for who?

Mr. MacDonald: The coroner's jury.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I do not know about that, but surely if the coroner wanted any witnesses they would have had to call for them?

I want to point out, Mr. Chairman, what concerned me about the way the hon. member handled the evidence. The part he read, he said did not bother him. He knew the type of work; he said: "I can do it, I have friends in the main work party. Can I please go to the main work party?" Then the following he omitted:

Q. Had he worked at anything else before he came to the reformatory?

A. The records show that last year he took a national survival course. He had four summers of carnival work.

Q. Carnival work?

A. Yes. International shows, or something of that nature. He worked at construction work, he worked as a pin boy. In other words, it was normal type of work that he had been doing outside. He said he could do this work. I said give it a try; this is the thing we do on occasion where, for some reason transfer to a certain gang may be a little questionable.

The hon. member left that out, and I think it was very important to give a true picture.

This inmate was sentenced at Belleville on October 11, 1963, to 12 months definite and 12 months indefinite for breaking and entering. He had a record of one previous short term in Guelph for an unindictable offence, and two jail terms for similar reasons. He was 19 years old when he entered Guelph on October 30, 1963. The pre-sentence report prepared by the probation officer contains the following pertinent information:

Employment: The subject has had varied jobs, among them the following: At the Bowl-O-Drome in Belleville he worked for six months. He quit this job and went to the El Rancho restaurant for one year as a dishwasher, terminating his employment because he did not like night work. He was then employed by a construction company for one month. He earned $48 a week and was laid off when the work was completed. He was employed at one time for five months in the mill department of MacFarlane Gendron Manufacturing Company Limited. He has been four summers travelling with a carnival company known as "the world's finest shows." His last employment was as kitchen help in the automotive building during the General Motors preview showing of the 1964 cars. Last year he took the six weeks survival course at the armouries and later tried to join the permanent army and failed because he could not pass mental ability tests.

Health: The subject stated his health is generally good, but I learned from his mother that he has a heart murmur, as noted above. His older brother died suddenly of a heart attack. However, the subject did not mention this heart difficulty to me.

Presumably this is the end of the pre-sentence report.

Cross was transferred to Ontario training centre Burtch on December 2, 1963, and was there until April 2, 1964. In this period he was frequently in trouble for misbehaviour. When it was clear that he could not adjust to the open setting, he was transferred back to Guelph. From April until August, he was a fairly consistent behaviour problem, but he was not put in detention until, on August 10 and 11, he was brought before the superintendent on the two consecutive days on a series of charges, such as gambling, possession of contraband, and possession of money. He was put into detention on August 11 and released on August 16 or 17. The work record of this inmate at Guelph is as follows:

On November 1, 1963, he was sent to work in the tailor's shop. On December 2 he was transferred to Burtch. On April 2 he was returned from Burtch and interviewed by Mr. Sanderson, the superintendent. When he was told that he would be returning to the tailor shop, he asked to be allowed to work with the main work party because he did not like the tailor shop. It was pointed out to him that the doctor had advised no heavy exertion because of mild rheumatic heart disease, but he said it did not bother him; "I can do it. I have friends in the main work party. Can I please go to the main work party?"

Because of his previous work records before coming to the institution, this did not seem to be any exaggeration. If he could do a national survival course, he should be able to stand up to the moderate exertion of the main work party. He was told to try it and see if he could work where he wanted to. He stayed there for slightly over a month and then the employment committee transferred him to the kitchen. It is normal practice at Guelph to use the tailor shop and main work party as places of close supervision, and to transfer boys to other work areas after a short period.

Cross did not like the kitchen and asked to go back to the main work party because he hated working inside. He was returned to the main working party in May. Cross was examined by Dr. Marcinkovsky when he entered the institution. He told the doctor that he had no sickness at all; it was only after examination, when the doctor noticed a slight irregularity of the heart, that he admitted there might be some shortness of breath. The doctor reported that Cross had a rheumatic heart condition, mild, was fit for general work, fit for moderate work, but no competitive sports or heavy exertion.

Cross never complained about work. The only request he made to the doctor was to be excused from calisthenics. He was given permission not to do calisthenics. Never once during the time he was confined to the institution did Cross complain of any heart or lung ailment.

When Cross collapsed on August 20, he was taken to the hospital immediately and was pronounced dead on arrival. Officers who picked him up to put him in the station wagon said there was no movement, no breathing whatsoever, from the time of collapse. The pathologist at the inquest stated that his postmortem showed an enlarged heart, but no evidence of a heart attack. The coronary arteries were quite normal, and his explanation was that this man had had a sudden heart failure. He stated:

I feel that it had been there for a long time, probably years, and that a situation of increased stress, not necessarily abnormal stress, but somewhat increased stress, imposed an extra burden on this diseased heart, and that a disturbance in rhythm of the beating of the heart may then have occurred and ultimately the heart stopped.

He made the point that such cases are certainly recognized, but they are not common. The verdict of the jury was:

We, the jury, inquiring into the death of Ronald Franklin Cross on August 20, 1964, at the Ontario reformatory at Guelph, find from evidence submitted that death was caused by abnormal heart condition, that the officials of the institution were aware of his health condition and that everything possible was done for his welfare, and that there was no indication of any neglect on the part of the officials.

The coroner remarked on this verdict:

I have not been a coroner very long, but that is one of the best verdicts I have seen in my short tenure and I think it will finish the inquest.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know what we are supposed to do when a coroner brings in a result like that. Insofar as who should have informed the mother is concerned, I will go into this. First, let us deal with why he was put in detention. He was put into detention after he had appeared on a series of charges, as I pointed out, culminating in two consecutive days on which he was caught gambling and in possession of contraband, including money. It is completely untrue that Cross was put in close custody because his work reports were poor. He did appear before the superintendent once on this charge; his punishment was the loss of privileges, which means, for example, that he is not allowed to see the Saturday movie at the institution. It is worth noting that Cross had been a continual behaviour problem. At Belleville, he had been frequently warned by the police; his work record was poor. At the training centre he was constantly in trouble and, in the reformatory at Guelph, he continued the pattern. The hon. member for Yorkview, when he had inspected Cross's file at Guelph—

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, would the hon. Minister tell us from what he is reading?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am giving you a report from our institution, from our staff.

Mr. Renwick: Is this the hon. Minister's report?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Yes.

Mr. Renwick: Is it a report the hon. Minister has been furnished with, that he is now reading to us in place of the evidence of the—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: No, this is not the evidence. I am reading you now the report from my staff.

Mr. Renwick: Does the hon. Minister think that the fact that this boy was confined to the detention cells for a period of five or six days immediately preceding his death had no relevance whatsoever at the coroner's inquest?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am not qualified to make that—

Mr. Renwick: Is there any indication in the report the hon. Minister is reading to us as to who decided which witnesses would be called at the coroner's inquest?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, the Crown does that, I presume.

Mr. Renwick: The coroner does not necessarily decide who is going to be called as witnesses at an inquest.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Who decides that?

Mr. Renwick: The Crown attorney was present to take charge of that particular inquest. I would like to know who decided which witnesses would be called? Who made the decision that no members of the main work party who were with Cross that day would be called as witnesses? Who made the decision?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member is a lawyer—I am not. I merely presume that a Crown attorney and the coroner would decide which witnesses to call.

Mr. Renwick: How would the coroner, who had never met Mr. Cross, how would the Crown attorney, who obviously had never met Mr. Cross, make their decisions without consulting the superintendent of the reformatory?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Again, I am not a lawyer, but I would ask the same question of any coroner's inquest. How would a coroner and a Crown attorney in the city of Toronto, with almost two million people in it, when he has a case—and I am sure he does not know in practically every case who the deceased was, or his family—how does he go about getting the proper witnesses?

Mr. Renwick: Does the hon. Minister not think it is exceedingly strange that no member of the main work party was called to give evidence, the men who were closest to that boy when he was working throughout the day, and who were with him when he collapsed on the march back?

I am not going to have the hon. Minister tell us that one cannot rely on the word of any inmate. This seems to be the answer the hon. Minister gives on every single occasion on which he wants to cloud the whole issue.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, I do not recall making that statement here at all. I am saying that if you are not satisfied with the coroner's inquest, and the way it was handled, take it up with the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart). He is competent to answer those questions and I am not.

Mr. Renwick: I do not know how we can get it across to the hon. Minister that we are not questioning the coroner's inquest. We recited what the evidence was. We are now trying to get from the hon. Minister what, if anything, he has done as a result of this inquest. Does he, for example, consider, or has he made any recommendation to the superintendent at Guelph that if a similar event should occur again in that institution the members of the boy's family should be notified when there is going to be an inquest? Has he done anything about that?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, if the hon. member will wait, I was going to deal with this aspect of it. Just wait; I wanted to deal with the detention first, why he was put in detention.

Then I was going to say that the hon. member for Yorkview, when he had inspected Cross's file at Guelph, remarked: "Cross was obviously quite a different person from what his mother thought he was."

Mr. Young: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman; this again is an illustration of how inaccurate that whole statement was. I made no such statement about Cross. I made such a statement about another chap by the name of Clark. I made no statement whatsoever of that kind about Cross.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: All right, if the hon. member says that I take his word for it.

Why was the family not notified of the inquest? Again I say that this question is misdirected. All witnesses who gave evidence at the inquest were subpoenaed. I think that the institution felt the family would have been subpoenaed. This is what my staff says; I have not seen this before and I concur with it wholeheartedly because these are the views I have just expounded. I think the institution felt that the family would have been subpoenaed by the Crown attorney and expected that they would have been there. Mr. Harloff, the assistant superintendent, attended the funeral with the family and spoke to the parents. He took it for granted that the Crown attorney or the coroner would have informed them of the inquest.

Aside from that, if the hon. member wants to get into a matter of the responsibility of the Crown attorney or the coroner, I would suggest he take it up with a person qualified to answer that question. I am not.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out in the last point on which the hon. Minister spoke that the coroner himself stated at the inquest—and the hon. Minister has a transcript of this evidence:

Evidence will be presented by witnesses who have been subpoenaed and, after you have heard them, if there is anyone else here that wishes to give evidence, you are entitled to hear it.

And at the end of the inquest, on page 37, the coroner stated:

Gentlemen of the jury, under normal circumstances anyone else who is here can certainly volunteer any evidence, anything relating to it. Unfortunately, no one else is here today.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: What does the hon. member want me to do about that?

Mr. Renwick: All I am suggesting is that someone other than the coroner decided who were to be witnesses at that particular inquest. I want to know whether or not the hon. Minister saw fit to inquire from the superintendent whether he made up his mind as to who would be called as witnesses.

Mr. Grossman: I think this is not the responsibility of our department.

Mr. Renwick: Will the hon. Minister permit me just to summarize briefly, so that we do not get lost in a maze of evidence, what happened. It has nothing whatsoever to do with what the boy's previous employment was. It has nothing whatsoever to do with whether the boy asked to be sent to the main work party or did not ask. It has nothing to do with whether he made any complaint about the work at all.

All I am saying is that this evidence discloses the following facts: It discloses that there was, on the record of this boy at the Guelph reformatory, a pre-sentence report which indicated that there was a tendency in this family to have this particular kind of ailment; that his brother, aged 17, had fallen dead from his chair at school with this same ailment; that his father was confined to his home with a heart condition and the family was living on welfare. Second, when this boy was admitted to the reformatory and examined, his examination disclosed that he had this heart condition; that, on two separate occasions, he was examined during the course of the time he was in the institution about his heart condition and the doctor confirmed that he had it.

The doctor confined him to moderate work at the very most, work which would not have anything other than a moderate increase in tension. The superintendent of Guelph reformatory assigned that boy to pick work in the main work party. All I am asking is: Do you think that, in those circumstances, the superintendent should assign a person to the main work party? And have you done anything about it since that time?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: What would the hon. member expect the superintendent to do with a man who refused to work in the tailor shop? Has the hon. member any idea of what goes on in a penal institution, if you do this sort of thing? Would you have forced him into the tailor shop?

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, I happen to be in the unfortunate position—I do not know whether anybody else has been—in that I spent a little bit of time in an institution; a reasonable amount of time, about eight months, so I know quite a bit about the atmosphere in institutions. I know quite a bit about the fact that it is impossible, from within the framework of an institution, to register any complaint, and what I am asking the hon. Minister is: Is there any way in which he would take the word of an inmate who made any complaint of any kind?

We have obviously attempted, by the sworn evidence of the coroner's inquest, by an inmate who is dead—we cannot criticize him—to point out that this boy was not treated in the way in which he should have been treated; that there was a lack of concern for his heart condition on the part of the superintendent. This is all we are trying to point out. The hon. Minister says he has no responsibility—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I did not say that, either; let us get that clear. I was saying he had no responsibility in respect of the way the coroner's inquest was conducted; that is all I said. If the hon. member is suggesting that arising from the report should have been matters which concerned me, he may rest assured that I was concerned when I found out that someone had unfortunately met their death in an institution—which happens every now and then. But, in reading the report, what other conclusion could I come to than that there was no one who was derelict in their duty in the institution? If there was any evidence that that was the case, the hon. member may rest assured that there would have been a thorough investigation. Someone's knuckles would have been rapped, at least.

The hon. member also mentioned—I do not know which institution he was referring to, and I will not embarrass him by asking—he wanted to know whether any inmate could register a complaint. If he has any idea that in our institutions that it is impossible for an inmate to register a complaint, I invite him to come to my office—I suppose that is in order—and see the hundreds of letters I receive from the inmates. They can go right to the top if they have a complaint to make, and he may rest assured that I give them my attention. I will say this: A very large portion of them are without foundation, and I have satisfied myself on that.

I think that the hon. member will agree that I cannot investigate every one because after a while it gets around that the Minister is reading these things. As a matter of fact when I first came into the department I insisted on answering each one of them personally. My officials told me that that was a mistake. They said that if letters from the Minister were being shown around he would be deluged, because that is the way these boys will operate. That is precisely what happened, so I had to stop.

I gave my reply to a member of the staff who answered and gave it to the institution superintendent who gave it to the inmate. Now there were one or two instances where I was a little concerned and followed them through. I satisfied myself that there was no injustice done. But I want to allay the fears of the hon. members of this House if they have the impression that an inmate cannot register a complaint. They can and they do.

Mr. Renwick: Just so there will not be any misunderstanding, I was not confined in my remarks to one of the hon. Minister's institutions. I was speaking of an incident where I spent eight months as a prisoner of war for the purpose of illustrating that I know exactly the kind of psychology that develops within any form of institution. They are precisely the same kind of institutions when the pressure is on.

I would like to ask the hon. Minister, in light of the inquest and in light of the evidence that was produced, did he see any reason to make any recommendations to the institutions as to what procedure should be followed should similar incidents occur in those institutions.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: No. As a result of reading the coroner's report I saw no reason to do that. I will be quite frank with the hon. member but really I think that he should, to do himself justice, read over the statement that he made when he compared the atmosphere of our institutions to a prisoner-of-war camp. Surely he could not mean that. On sober second thought he must realize that this is a terrible thing to say.

Mr. MacDonald: Don't be so unctuous.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Does the hon. member for York South suggest that is a true statement, a true comparison?

Mr. MacDonald: I would take his word; he knows.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: He knows about our institutions and can compare them? Then the hon. member does believe, with the hon. member for Riverdale, that this is the case? I take it that the hon. member believes that the Elizabeth Fry society, the John Howard society, and all of the church organizations have been going along for years and years working in our institutions in an atmosphere like a prisoner-of-war camp and saying nothing about it? That is a shameful thing to say.

Mr. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. Minister could let the matter drop. I was thinking of a psychological atmosphere where a large number of men are confined in a given institution. The psychological result is identical, regardless of whether or not they are incarcerated for antisocial behaviour or for any other behaviour.

I would like to ask the hon. Minister whether the only channel for complaints within the institutions is to the Minister?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Aside from making a complaint to the superintendent, our inspectors visit the institutions frequently and they ask inmates if they have any complaints. Now I know that the obvious reaction to that is that it is pretty difficult for an inmate in an institution, a penal institution, to take a chance and make a complaint. I realize the implications of such a thing, or at least the thing that you would think about, and I do not underestimate it. But within the framework of whatever you can establish, whatever plan it is humanly possible to provide for a man to make such a complaint, we have done it.

If the hon. member has any suggestions, I would be very pleased to hear them. I have thought about this myself. I have tried to put myself in the position of a man in an institution who feels that he is being persecuted by staff, is being persecuted by a superintendent and is trying to get a message out and I thought: How does he do it—even if he sends a letter out it is censored.

But one thing we forget about in all this discussion is that there are chaplains going in and counselling and speaking to everyone of these inmates quietly and personally. I am sure that an inmate would not hesitate to tell a chaplain or a social worker about his problems, because he knows that this would be kept confidential. I think that is a great protection.

I pointed out that there were 222 chaplains visiting just the local jails alone, and there are permanent chaplains in our own institutions. The inmates would tell them. There are all sorts of these people going into our institutions. It would be impossible for a man not to be able to get his protest out. I am sure that this did not occur in prisoner-of-war camps.

Incidentally, it might be interesting for members to know that our director of research, Dr. Grygier, is quite familiar with the kind of psychology that applies in a prisoner-of-war camp; he spent many years in a prisoner-of-war camp in Siberia. He has often told me about this. You may rest assured that he has this in the back of his mind any time he is doing some research.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, before we leave this point, I would like to make a few comments. The hon. Minister is obviously partially correct in saying that many aspects of this coroner's jury report do not come under his jurisdiction, they will come up with the hon. Attorney General's estimates and perhaps we can get it all on the record. However, it is rather difficult to separate it from things that do come under his jurisdiction.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to remind the House that this is not the first time that a death has occurred in Guelph as a result of failure to abide by the medical diagnosis that was on the card of the inmate. Indeed, some few years ago—I forget exactly how long ago now—a young lad committed suicide in detention. He committed suicide in detention after having been put there when on his record was a psychologist's note, made after he came into the institution, to the effect that he was so disturbed that he should never be put in detention. This was just ignored, forgotten, or what you will. He was put in detention and he committed suicide.

Now my hon. colleagues have already spelled out to you that here was pretty solid evidence, both in terms of the family record and in terms of the medical staff's examination of the inmate at Guelph, that he did not have the kind of heart that could sustain strong work and yet he was put out on the bull gang.

However, Mr. Chairman, the reason I rise at this point is that I would like to add one other aspect here with regard to the rather puzzling fact that key people were not called as witnesses. I received information a few days before this coroner's jury inquest was held, and as a result of that, I called Dr. Cotnam and informed him that it had been suggested to me that all of the evidence would not be put before this coroner's jury. I suggested that with this forewarning, word could be passed on to the coroner who was involved so that he would be sharply alerted to make certain that every conceivable witness who might be in a position to contribute relevant evidence would be called.

I got a call back, either from Dr. Cotnam or somebody in his office, I cannot quite recall that aspect of it now, indicating that anybody who wanted to come, could testify. I suggested in a return call to Dr. Cotnam that this was not good enough, there are some people who are not free to come, for a variety of reasons. I said, I repeat once again, the coroner who is going to be responsible for this inquest knows in advance that there are some people who believe that all of the witnesses are not going to be called.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in spite of that, we have now had it drawn to the attention of the House that there was no mention made at all of the fact that this lad had been in detention; and while in detention, he would not only be solitary, he would not only be relatively inactive, he would be on a limited diet. He went directly from that out onto the work gang with pick and shovel. There was no inquiry as to complaints on the part of Cross with regard to his health on the day of his death, and there has been a suggestion from another inmate, who comes from Belleville, through his family, that Cross had been complaining on that date. There is no answer yet, no conclusive answer, as to who called the witnesses, though I suggest that the hon. member for Riverdale is likely accurate when he suggests to you that a new coroner, as you drew attention in the jury report, is likely going to get his advice from the superintendent of the institution and others as to who should be called as witnesses. This would seem to me to be a very logical conclusion.

The family was not called; they were kept out of the picture. None of the inmates involved at the time the lad dropped dead at their feet were called. None of the officers who were supervising, if they did not want to take the word of inmates, who picked the body up and took it to the hospital were called.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Oh yes, they were.

Mr. MacDonald: Were they called?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Yes. There is evidence here—

Mr. MacDonald: Some were not called.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The important men were called:

Q. Were you the officer in charge of the main working party at the Ontario reformatory?

A. I was.

The main officer in charge.

Mr. MacDonald: Fine. People who were in charge of detention were not called. People in the institution simply were not called in spite of the fact that the coroner was alerted to the fact that they were not going to get the full story.

I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that on that basis, for the hon. Minister to accept the conclusion that no one was derelict in his duty, is a pretty shaky proposition—because the jury's decision was based on selection that omitted some key witnesses and, conceivably, some key evidence.

If the hon. Minister has not been aware of it up until now, perhaps he will be persuaded to re-examine this whole situation.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, quite frankly it is not hard to imagine what would happen if I, on reading this over, felt that someone may have been a little more careful or something of that nature, and reprimanded somebody on the staff. They could have taken exception to that and perhaps even grieved, and said: "Look, you are making an imputation here and we were completely cleared by the coroner's inquest." I think they would be justified in going to grieve and saying they were being berated by their officials for something for which they were not responsible.

I do not think it is quite as black and white as the hon. member—

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. Minister is very suave and smooth, but the simple fact of the matter is that the coroner clearly would get advice from the superintendent of the institution.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I do not know that; I do not know how the hon. member does.

Mr. MacDonald: I find it inconceivable that the coroner and Crown attorney, who are going to hold an inquest into a death in an institution, are not going to discuss with the superintendent as to who is going to be called as witnesses. That being the case, I find it very strange indeed—indeed, doubly strange in the light of the alerting that I or Dr. Cotnam were able to give them—that key people in the picture were not called.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, on vote 1901, we noticed that the vote for salaries was substantially raised from $540,000 a year ago to $663,000, an increase of approximately 20 per cent. Would the hon. Minister care to explain the reason for the sizeable increase? Is it adjustment in salaries?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am told there was an overall increase in salaries.

Mr. Newman: Would the overall increase be approximately 20 per cent?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Oh yes. There is also an allowance here for the new positions that have been established, and there is an allowance here to pay their salaries when they are appointed. Administrator of jails, female jailers, and so on.

Mr. Newman: Thank you, Mr. Minister. Likewise, one year ago, I asked for consideration to be given to training fellowships to students in psychology and social work attending American universities, not only Ontario universities. Has the hon. Minister considered that at all? It does not matter actually what university the student attends so long as he is willing to come back and give service to us here in Ontario. I think it probably would be most difficult to get a student, but at least the scholarship or the assistance should be available to a student who may be taking psychology and social work outside the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: What would be their point in going outside?

Mr. Newman: Well, in my own instance, it might be a lot closer for the individual to cross the border to take a course than it would be coming to Toronto.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I imagine in a case like that that the hon. member has a point. I think that is an unusual situation. I think in a case like that we would give it every consideration.

Mr. Newman: You will give it consideration?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I would think so.

Mr. Newman: That is very good. I am glad to hear that, Mr. Minister.

Under the grants in item 10, we have the organizations listed there, but nowhere do I see an organization that has pioneered in the rehabilitation of the person who happened to be incarcerated in an institution. I refer to St. Leonard's House. Are there going to be grants made available to them by this department?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: No. The grants are made by The Department of Public Welfare. They are getting grants now.

Mr. Newman: I agree with the hon. Minister; they are getting grants, but the grants are actually not substantial enough for them to be carrying on the work that they would like to carry on. It is very limited. They are in the process of expanding at this time. They are buying properties in the immediate vicinity of the present St. Leonard's House and they hope to be able to practically double the work they are doing today. The hon. Minister is more than likely familiar with the type of work they are doing, and with the three years' experience they have—two and a half actual years of experience. The recidivist rate with their organization is 26 per cent, whereas the provincial average is, I think, between 50 and 60. Certainly to an organization like that there should be some more substantial assistance or encouragement on the part of this government.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, I think the first thing is that, we had better dispel the idea that a halfway house shows a recidivist rate of 26 per cent. That compares so favourably with the provincial institutions generally that perhaps we ought to go into a whole chain of halfway houses. It is not quite as simple as that. The hon. member must remember that a halfway house selects its clients. In the first place, it starts with people who, in the institution, have declared their intention to try and reform. They then get people who would rather deal with a voluntary agency than with a government rehabilitation officer. Then, when they make application to the halfway house, the halfway house chooses from its applicants those whom it feels are more likely to benefit by a stay at the halfway house. So they pick the cream. This is all right; I find no criticism with it, and it is a good thing. It is as if we were to take the rate of recidivism at our Brampton training centre and say: "This is doing so much better a job than all our other institutions." At the Brampton training centre, our proven rate of recidivism, I think, over a period of years, is 34 per cent. I think this is the figure, or something like it. The reason it is that good is because we also pick and choose for the Brampton training centre—we take those most likely to succeed, as it were, and take them out to the Brampton training centre. It is an open institution, as the hon. member knows. Incidentally, there is one thing I wish the halfway house supervisors or operators would keep in mind—the suggestion that, after two years, they can establish what their rate of recidivism is, is not too valid. I hope that after five years the same rate will prevail. But it is not really correct to start talking about rates of recidivism after two years.

Obviously, it is not a good practice for different departments of the government to be giving grants to the same organizations. If they need more money and if more money is justified, they should still get it from the same source.

There is also the philosophy that someone in a halfway house should not be getting money from The Department of Reform Institutions. We try as much as possible, for the time being anyway, to keep them at arm's length so that the people who are going into the halfway house will not feel they are going with government or with the organization that incarcerated them. And this is part of the philosophy.

Also, we are attempting to hold the line for at least two years while our department of research does some research on the halfway houses to find out just how effective they are. It would be our hope that none of them expand in the meantime, so that they can see how effective their work is over a period of six years.

I have been to St. Leonard's House; they are doing a good job and, as I say, they are getting grants from The Department of Public Welfare.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Minister, they are attempting to increase their counselling services. They could use additional trained social workers. Would the hon. Minister consider providing them with a trained social worker?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: If the Minister had any more trained social workers, he would keep them himself.

Mr. Newman: Well, then, would he consider providing them with psychologists or paying the services?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: If we had any more psychologists we could use them ourselves.

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Chairman, this would come under item 10 of this vote; it also arises from the remarks made by the hon. Minister when he was replying to me about the Elizabeth Fry society. He said they came out with a letter as much as to say they were sorry for what they had said. I have been going through my correspondence, as these letters came to members and friends of the society; and the letter which first came out on November 10, 1964, was followed by a number of others. There is certainly no indication, in my reading of these letters, of backing down. It does not mean to say they agreed with everything the grand jury report said, but they have not agreed with the full report. And just so the hon. Minister's remarks can be corrected, I want to put into the record this letter of November 10, 1964 from the Elizabeth Fry society, under the signature of its—I guess it would be—president, Mrs. John Manley. It says:

Dear member and friend:

During the past week you will have read or heard on radio or television much comment concerning the report of the grand jury about Mercer reformatory for women. As a member and friend of the Elizabeth Fry society of Toronto, you may have asked how conditions mentioned in the grand jury report have been allowed to exist. We are all well aware that this society has three basic aims—rehabilitation of female offenders, education of the public about the problems of the offender, and public action in penal reform.

Since this society was formed in 1952 we have in many respects suffered frustration in bringing suggestions and recommendations to The Department of Reform Institutions. Many, many times our inquiries and suggestions have been ignored. For instance, specific inquiries about the educational programme within the institution have been made without success. We have always been concerned about the type and extent of mental care in the reformatory and have continually tried to interpret to The Department of Reform Institutions our feelings in this area. We consider that good health and hygiene habits should be taught and that adequate medical and preventative dental care should be available as part of the rehabilitative programme of the institution.

In the 12 years of this society's existence, we have had six different Ministers of Reform Institutions. This has meant that in many cases, even with the best of intentions, our Minister of the moment has hardly had an opportunity to familiarize himself with his department, much less consider our criticisms and recommendations in depth, before being replaced by a new Minister.

In addition to this, the fact that previous grand jury reports with respect to Mercer reformatory have generally been so uncritical and, on the contrary, even complimentary, that each preceding Minister has probably felt it unnecessary to give any priority to our recommendations for changes.

Imprisonment is usually considered to be the least effective way of dealing with a person who has broken the law, because it removes the offender from a normal life situation and places her in an artificial environment. By reason of the limitations which are inherent in a prison setting, there are naturally problems and difficulties which cannot be eliminated entirely, but there are also possibilities for people to mature and change in such a setting if full use is made of the girl's time in custody.

Most would agree that it would be desirable for a women's reformatory to be housed in more adequate quarters than the present Mercer building.

There again, I might interject, the hon. Minister mentioned that they were not finding fault with the building. Well, here they do. But they go on to say:

But it is important that we recognize that, if a good staff is provided and a flexible programme is allowed to develop, the aging condition of the building is of secondary importance.

In general, the board of directors concurs with the findings presented in the most recent grand jury report and we are studying their suggested recommendations. It feels that the citizens of the province of Ontario should be gratified that this grand jury has had the courage to express its views. It is our hope that because of the very serious charges made in the grand jury report an investigating body, such as a select committee of the Ontario Legislature, will be appointed and will avail itself of the advice of impartial and informed persons who are knowledgeable and active in the various fields concerned with correction.

We wish to assure you that the board of directors of this society will continue to press for needed reforms in this very neglected field.

I will not read the second letter which followed. The letters came out on December 14, 1964, about a month after, setting out their views and certainly showing no backing down.

They did not agree with everything the grand jury said but they said nothing, I would say, in these letters which are on public record, to be sorry for. I think the comments, in what I have read of their literature and what the John Howard society has put out, show that both those groups are very much on top of the subject. It is unfortunate—whether it be a grand jury or a volunteer society which speaks out—it is too bad, that they have to undergo the criticism they seem to have had from the government.

One thing which is most important in regard to the John Howard or Elizabeth Fry societies, or any of these voluntary groups which do social work, is that they not be inhibited from speaking out. I am glad to see this particular group was not, simply because of the fact they receive government grants. In the long run they save the government a lot of money by the voluntary work they do and the fact that they also go out and get voluntary funds.

These groups need our support, and they deserve the support and respect of the government. The criticisms they have made of the government have been quite legitimate. I know they have done it in the past. It is not one particular individual within that group; it has been a number of individuals speaking for the board of directors over the years who have made various recommendations which have not been accepted. Although I think that now, on the quiet, there has been a change in the medical administration at Mercer, this was one of their main complaints and obviously so justified. They obviously had good reason for speaking out.

But I did want to put that correspondence on the record because I think it speaks for itself; it seems very reasonable, and full of common sense. I see no reason in what they have done for them to back away from anything they have to say.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, I think the first thing I would like to get clear is that there has been no criticism of Elizabeth Fry by me or my department. That may have been the impression everybody got because they presumed, I suppose, that the Elizabeth Fry was on one side with the so-called grand jury and we were on the other. I never at any time criticized the Elizabeth Fry society. The hon. member read that portion which said:

Since this society was formed in 1952 we have in many respects suffered frustrations in bringing suggestions and recommendations to The Department of Reform Institutions. Many, many times our inquiries and suggestions have been ignored.

That is one of the mistakes, in my view, that the Elizabeth Fry society made. I told them quite bluntly about this, and they agreed they might have worded this a little differently. Because to talk about what happened eight or nine or ten years ago and relate it to what has been going on in the last one and three-quarter years was quite unfair. I asked, and I invite the hon. member to ask, the Elizabeth Fry society whether they ever were ignored by me since I have held this job; whether any of their suggestions were ever ignored.

As a matter of fact, at the time this whole story broke, we were studying and discussing some of their suggestions with them; one of them had to do with their complaining about medical facilities. As a matter of fact, no matter what would have happened as a result of this grand jury, as a result of a suggestion of the Elizabeth Fry society, this probably would have been carried out. Because of the way it was handled, they have a problem now of attempting to reconcile their position with the staff. We want them to work with the staff. If they do not collaborate together their work is going to be, by and large, useless; and I do not want to see their work go by the boards. It was a matter here of tactics and public relations in the way they handled this. But I repeat; I have never said anything against the Elizabeth Fry society in criticism. On the contrary, rather than refuse to listen to their suggestions, we have been holding regular meetings with them and considering all of their recommendations.

Mr. Trotter: But their troubles must have started long before the grand jury report; their troubles could not have been a result of it, because I see from a report of the rehabilitation committee of Elizabeth Fry way back in 1960:

Owing to unfortunate circumstances, our committee has not been active at the Mercer, but we look forward to resuming our work there in the not-too-distant future.

Then they got back working, and then they make different references through annual reports over the years, of the problems they have had. I hope that has come to an end. If it has, fine; because it is an excellent organization. From what I knew of them directly and indirectly in the past, their people are among the highest trained—that is, those who have been working full-time—and I hope they do work together, because if you do not have this type of people working, you will not have that large voluntary segment in the community which is needed. I, for example, would get one phone call from someone who maybe took your side of the argument over this grand jury and say: "What do women who live in the Kingsway and Rosedale know about these problems?" The truth of it is that there is a lot of experience and interest throughout not only the Elizabeth Fry society, but all these volunteer groups. I am glad to hear that the hon. Minister is now getting along with them; he can accomplish a great deal, I am sure.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I get along with them; I hope they will be able to get along with the staff.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister has made some reference to the expansion of the research department; I presume it is under this vote. I wonder if he would enlarge on that and tell us what is actually planned for enlarged staff, the number of people, when he expects the work to expand, and what kind of programme the research people will be undertaking during this coming year?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Staff: One statistician, one research associate, one research assistant and one secretary. Description of the programme: To develop research strategy to aid the department in correctional treatment; conduct research operations; organize correctional conferences at the department; submit internal reports and reports for publications; survey scientific publications, maintain close contacts with the universities and research institutions and government research units, and support relevant research programmes at universities in Ontario.

As to any specific programme, I am trying to recall those which I outlined in the speech that I made at the inception of the estimates. We are doing research in the training schools. There will be a great deal to be done when the Hagersville school opens, because we are going to try some new experiments there.

We plan on doing a great deal of research in the compilation of statistics, which is the bugaboo in this whole business. We talk about rates of recidivism, but by and large they are all guesswork and we are doing a lot of work in co-ordinating this. I just cannot at the moment remember these specifically.

Mr. Young: I take it this extended staff will be available as soon as available?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: As soon as we are able to get them.

Mr. Young: As soon as you are able to get them, which may or may not be soon.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I have been interested in the figure on staff training. I add that up and it comes to $66,000. In relation to your whole staff, looking at your annual report, you have 1,500 members, I think. $66,000 for training comes to $40 per employee. I would feel that—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Twenty-five hundred.

Mr. Thompson: Twenty-five hundred. I am not sure, but it would be something less than $40 per employee. I read this, and I want to congratulate the hon. Minister on the report; I think it is set out clearly for us. It interests us how you refine the staffs. From the list of your staffs, I would say that you might have about 934 who, by the terminology of their jobs, appear to be custodial people and you have about 81 who I would call rehabilitation or reform people, according to the title of their jobs.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Does the hon. member want to know what professional staff we have? Is that what you are asking?

Mr. Thompson: I listened to you this afternoon, and I noticed you had given larger figures than you have in this report. In the report you have 27 teachers, and you have 23 grade instructors. If I quote you correctly—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: 37 teachers.

Mr. Thompson: I am reading from your annual report.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member is reading part 1, which is the adult institutions. The staff I was referring to included both the adult and the juvenile.

Mr. Thompson: Can I base it on what I have read from part 1? In part 1, it appeared to me that there were 934 custodial personnel and that you have 81 persons whom I would call reform or rehabilitation. I would feel, sir, that there is a complexity in the job that is both custodial as well as treatment. You cannot get away from this, but I would think that with some of the custodial staff that the emphasis you are trying to give is how to give them in-service training on treatment. I question, in view of having categorized so many in this part 1, who appear to be custodial personnel, whether you have got enough of an allotment, $66,000, for staff training.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We have all the money that we can absorb at the present time for expanding the schools, and expanding the staff training. This is all the money that we can see that we are going to need in the coming year. We are expecting to expand it even more as time goes along. There is no use asking for more money than you can absorb. This is a slow process; it is an on-going process and people tell me this is sufficient money for the coming year. We are taking all those who are willing and whom we can encourage to take the programme. Of course, the more we can encourage, the more money it will cost and we will get that money.

Mr. Thompson: May I ask you again? It seems to me that the salaries you offer are low. I notice for matrons that $3,600, was raised. I was surprised at this. I thought you would be giving a larger amount. I know I am labouring a point which you answered, but could I ask you, do you think they are low?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am afraid the hon. member is trying to get me—

Mr. Thompson: No, I am not trying to embarrass you, I just want to know—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, it is the same answer.

Mr. Bryden: Yes, embarrass him.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: It is the same answer. I do not deal with salaries. These are the subject for negotiations. The staff is represented by a bargaining unit known as the civil service association. They will be negotiating and bargaining for their salaries and working conditions, and this all has to be handled at the same level. We cannot have each Minister giving his own views in public on what salaries should be, because we may have different opinions. As I said before, the government takes collective responsibility for what the salaries are.

Mr. Thompson: I ask the hon. Minister this, and I really am not trying to embarrass him. I will tell you, it is not embarrassing me at all—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Of course not.

Mr. Thompson: I would say that probably to get qualified people anywhere you have to pay them a decent salary. The hon. Minister is talking about the fact that he cannot get psychologists and he cannot get others. I honestly believe that one of the reasons these people cannot be obtained—and there are other reasons—is because you do not give enough emphasis by way of remuneration to them.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That really is not so. Salaries may be a problem in some areas, but we pay psychiatrists at the rate of up to an average of $25,000 a year, by paying them $50 a half-day. It would be very difficult to get a psychiatrist to come and work at $25,000 or $30,000 or $40,000 a year. They all do very well, and they are not particularly anxious to be associated with a particular institution. They like to be free-lancers, and find their work much more interesting. Salaries are not a problem there. It is just trying to get people in to work. It is difficult all over the world. Correction is not the most attractive work for some people. Those who we do attract we are very grateful for; they find the work a challenge and they find it very interesting.

There are not too many that way. There are some jobs open which pay very good salaries and we still cannot attract people, because there is just a shortage. It may very well be that we may in some of these positions offer a great deal more money and all we would be doing would be to have one department competing with another.

I do not know! Salaries may be, as I say, a factor in some instances; but particularly in those areas the hon. leader is talking about, psychology and psychiatry, I do not think this is the case.

Mr. Thompson: The hon. Minister has, in part 1, listed about eight superintendents. I wonder, of those superintendents—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Twelve superintendents, eight assistants.

Mr. Thompson: I wonder if among those superintendents and the eight assistants any of them have a social worker's degree? Have you given emphasis to taking training—reform training? Have any of your top men got a degree?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We have one; Mr. Keane at the clinic has a social worker's degree. The others in the adult institutions do not have. I believe we have two superintendents in the training schools who have degrees in social work.

The hon. leader of the Opposition, of course, will appreciate the fact that this is another difficult area. In adult institutions particularly, experience in an institution is very important. It did not take me long to find that out. As was mentioned, to understand the psychology you have to know what they think about, you have to know about the culture that goes on in the institutions, the sort of society that they have. This means that by and large you have to promote from the ranks; and there are very few people with degrees of social work who are prepared to start off, for example, as custodial officers. This is the reason, I suppose.

In a training school it is a little different. We would like to get everyone with these degrees, although this is not necessarily a sign of the kind of ability we want.

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Chairman, getting back to grants, I am very interested in the Salvation Army, $30,000. I understand and I know that the Salvation Army is very active in the correction field. I can think of Harbour Light, where alcoholics are rehabilitated. I know that many have gone to this particular institution and have received a great deal of help from it. I know that they carry on correctional services in many other areas as well and it is my understanding that they spend roughly $238,000 in the correctional field every year.

Now I am wondering, in view of that the amount $30,000 does not seem very much. I just wonder if the Salvation Army has approached the hon. Minister for more money?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We do not see any reason to pay out more money when we have not been asked.

Mr. Gaunt: That is what I wondered, sir, have they asked you for more money in addition to the $30,000?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We find these people are very helpful in this field and I should say they are probably the most popular with the inmates. They do a very valuable work and, generally speaking, they do not ask for money unless they have a good reason for it. When they do we give them very good consideration. I would say, too, that this is not necessarily the only money they get for correctional work. They get money from the Red Feather, of course; and I would not be surprised, I think they may get some money from the federal department as they do a lot of work for them as well. But I think they are looked after in a satisfactory manner and I think they are quite satisfied with what the department is doing for them.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Chairman, if I may ask one additional question. Did they ask for this $30,000 grant or did you just say here is a grant of $30,000? What I am trying to say is: Is it automatically forthcoming on your part or did they request every year a specific amount which they required?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Over the years this has not always been $30,000. The grant has varied. It has been built up over a period of years. When they find they need more money and there is a good reason for it they usually approach us and are generally treated very well.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, if I may just pursue this for a bit, the hon. Minister said that they had not asked for more and therefore they had not put more in the appropriation this year. Is this equally true of the John Howard and Elizabeth Fry groups?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I think the same thing applies. When they ask for it and we feel they are justified because of the programme they have we give them consideration. Of course we cannot give everyone all the money they want. But I think by and large every one of these organizations have been well looked after by our department and are satisfied, as satisfied as anyone dependent on someone else for grants can be.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, Mr. Chairman, I just want to suggest that the hon. Minister is being rather coy in his reply as to where the initiation of action came and what you are responsible for—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: It comes from them.

Mr. MacDonald: Yes, but I just wanted to suggest that it might be in the best interests that some of the money that is available for rehabilitation should go to these organizations. I do not want to suggest that you reduce your rehabilitation work in your own department, but I am sure the hon. Minister is aware of the fact that in many instances former inmates, for psychological reasons, do not want to go back to a government rehabilitative service. They find that this is associated with the establishment, this is part of the government. They have developed something of an animosity towards the government and the institution—they will react much more positively and therefore the possibility of rehabilitation is all the greater if it is an independent organization.

I draw attention to the fact that your total allotment to the three independent bodies is $30,000 to the Salvation Army, $20,000 to John Howard and a total of $14,000 to Elizabeth Fry, including the Ottawa and the Thunder Bay districts. So you have a total of $64,000, as compared with the overall rehabilitation total which is part of the rehabilitation and parole services figure. But in addition to the fact that they may respond more positively to an outside body—well, I think I have made my point, that it seems to me that if you were to place more money with these bodies they could do that much more work in addition. The point that I want to make comes back: They can enlist voluntary help and you always have a limited staff, in fact, too little staff, in terms of doing the personal work that should be done. If you had more opportunities for an expanded programme in the independent bodies, I think there are many people throughout the community who have a growing interest and a growing social conscience in this matter who could be drawn in and attracted on a voluntary basis at no expenditure of money in terms of salary. Therefore, much more effective work would be done.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Obviously I am in a difficult position; I have to be careful. The hon. member said that I was being coy. I have to be in a situation like this. The hon. member certainly does not expect me to say something which is going to encourage those organizations to be hammering at my door tomorrow morning for more money.

Mr. MacDonald: Why not, if they need it?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: They do this anyway, when they feel they need it. We have to decide whether in our view we have this money and how to divide it. As I say, I think there is a good working arrangement between all of us and everybody is generally fairly happy, or as happy as they can be when they depend on somebody else for grants and have to go with hat in hand to ask for them. I know that it is difficult for them; it is also difficult for us.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, in item 10, does the vote here include the province's share in the establishment of new regional jails?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: No.

Mr. Nixon: That would be on the last vote then?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: No. There is no money in there for regional jails. In the first place, you would not know what is put into it; you would not know next year whether you had an agreement with some of the counties to go ahead with it. This would have to be done by special warrant.

Mr. MacDonald: There is no agreement at all as yet?

Mr. Nixon: I wanted to ask—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am sorry. This will all be done by public works anyway. The grants will be given by public works because it is a building grant. It is a grant for construction. There would not be any money in this year's estimates—

Mr. Nixon: Could I ask the hon. Minister: I presume that it would be under his direction that the regions would be roughly mapped out, and that the discussions with the representatives of the region would take place. Is that so?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: This is being done by our department.

Mr. Nixon: I wonder if the hon. Minister could tell me on what basis the regions are laid out? Is there any comparison between the regions as the hon. Minister selects them and those which are perhaps under the jurisdiction of The Department of Economics and Development or the departments of Education or Health or Highways, or any of the other departments?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: No. I think that the hon. member will agree that the choosing of locations for county jails or multi-county jails or regional detention centres might not necessarily bear any relationship to another kind of region. It just would be impossible to co-ordinate them that way. We are doing what we can to get counties to agree, to go together on this plan on a voluntary basis. The encouragement we give them is the 50 per cent grant, and other co-operation we have offered, such as training staff and so on. We must approve; we give them some guidance in the grouping they should be in; but this is not necessarily hard and fast because sometimes an alternative may be suggested by some of the counties; in our view it works out very well.

So we agree to encourage them and we generally try to leave it to them with some encouragement from us. This has been very successful to date. Quite a few of them are interested in the plan, and the grant will come after their plans and locations have been approved.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I would say that I do not think it is obvious that the regions that would be laid down for this purpose must necessarily be different from regions laid down for some other purpose. As a matter of fact, I think that it is odd that government policy is not laid down a bit more rigidly in this as a background for the development of regions in general. Surely it would be one of the strongest forces favouring the development of regions, as perhaps the select committee envisages them, if there was some uniformity in the regions as applied to the various government departments; but if I understand the hon. Minister correctly, initiative must come from a group of counties which may perhaps have been indicated by the hon. Minister to begin with. Is that so?

These counties must get together in some sort of a committee, to begin with, and then come to the hon. Minister and ask him for approval of tentative plans. Is that so?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We will initiate some discussion with the counties when we feel that the time is ripe.

Mr. Nixon: So a region is picked out.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: No.

Mr. Nixon: How does the hon. Minister know whom to call in then?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: After going out and speaking in the various areas, we make an appeal for some interest in this, and it works. They start asking us questions; one county may ask with whom we think they should be in, and we say that we think they should be in this group; and some will come in with a group. There is no pattern to it, no specific pattern at the beginning.

Mr. Nixon: Certainly the hon. Minister does not want to be accused of telling them what to do in any way.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That is right; and it is working out very well. Quite a few groups of counties have shown an interest in this. Some of them, we feel, are on the verge of signing an agreement in regard to setting a fixed boundary for some of them—in other words, setting up the regions in what might be sort of regional areas as far as other departments are concerned. I would appeal to the hon. member not to throw a monkey wrench into it at this time because we might have to wait another 15 years for some of them to get to the position where they are now—where they are ready to go ahead with regional detention centres.

Mr. Nixon: Does the hon. Minister have a team under his direction with this as its responsibility?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Yes.

Mr. Nixon: I would appeal to the hon. Minister to take a considerably stronger position of leadership in this, through his representatives who go out into the regions or into the group of counties, because it seems to me that you have to go out with a plan that is semiformal and say, "This is what we propose; this is where the building might be located; and this is what your share of the cost might be," then leave them to discuss it themselves. If you wait for them to even collect together and form their own plans, it is going to take—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am afraid I did not make myself clear. That is precisely what we do, except for location. We feel that it is important not to discuss location in the first instance, to avoid disagreement from a parochial point of view. We suggest to them which grouping they should be in. We have all the facts and figures as to a projected cost, what it will cost each county. We have a chart made up showing the accommodation they have to provide for, and all the details they are going to need to arrive at decisions.

It was at this stage, because we had so many who appeared to be ready to make a decision as to the location and so on, that we formed the planning committee—which I announced here some time ago—of prominent citizens who are experts in their field. They will be advising the counties now as to their feelings where the location should be—or if the location which the counties among themselves have decided is a good one—and have it approved by the committee and by the government.

It is working very well. We are giving them lots of guidance and lots of direction, except that we are not swinging a big stick. We have found that this is very successful.

Mr. Nixon: Certainly I can understand the hon. Minister's hesitancy at, say, suggesting a location. But to pass on some, I suppose, rather personal complaints which have come to me as the representative of one of these areas, I would say to the hon. Minister that when these people are called in from a number of counties to a central meeting, they expect something pretty definite. They do not want to have to come to too many of these meetings, they want the plan there, fairly complete. If the hon. Minister does not want to give a suggestion as to location, I can understand that; but these people have felt that perhaps he is too hesitant about being definite about his proposals. I would just pass that on as something that has come to me.

This regional autonomy is a very important thing, but the hon. Minister can be too afraid of showing the leadership that is surely his responsibility. We are at a point of departure, if we are going to go along the lines recommended by the select committee, not particularly about jails but in the whole area of regional development. This is one place where the councillors from a number of counties with no real leadership among them need someone to step forward and say, "I will be chairman." They are going to look to the hon. Minister and his representatives to bring this thing forward, not with undue haste but with all deliberate haste, I would say.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am very interested in the hon. member's comments. I will not ask him who it was, but I wonder if he could tell me how long ago it was that this group met with him?

Mr. Nixon: I do not even know what counties are involved. It had to do with Brant, Norfolk, and, I believe, Haldimand, Oxford—there is quite an area there which seems to have a variety of boundaries. These people said that they would come into the meeting and it was very interesting. They had come long distances and, of course, they left their businesses in order to come to this special meeting. The representatives of the hon. Minister left at noon; I suppose that this is planned so that the local people will be left to discuss it among themselves, but they did not know what they were talking about—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I think that the hon. member will find that that was held some time ago, because it has been refined much more from the early stages. All this is prepared for them, and they go home with everything except the money in their pockets and the decision as to location.

Mr. Nixon: Do not be afraid to give leadership.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I am prepared to go even further than my colleague. Let me give a bit of the background of this. We have discussed this in previous years and I think I have made an issue of this since the last time these estimates were before the House.

I think we can go back at least as far as 1954, when the select committee headed by Mr. William Stewart reported to this House and unanimously recommended that the province take over all penal institutions. That report was a very elaborate report. And at least four or five gentlemen on that committee were Cabinet Ministers, who signed the report, agreed with it. There were at least eight volumes of evidence; there was a big, thick volume of conclusions; and it was one of the best select committee reports I had seen in my time here—I was not a member of the House at that time but I have been through it. It recommended unanimously that the province take over all of the penal institutions.

The select committee concerning The Department of Municipal Affairs has twice made this recommendation. It made it two years ago and it repeated it in the report that was tabled in this House just two days ago; repeated it for greater emphasis. I wonder if the hon. Minister observed the actions of his colleague, the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis), when he took what was regarded at that time, just a year ago, the very brave step of consolidating school areas. That was from the top down. I wonder if the hon. Minister paid attention to the activities of his colleague, the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall) when he had the conference on regional government, the emphasis that was placed there by his officials and by the outside people who were brought in. I wonder if the hon. Minister listened to the hon. Prime Minister's speech, or read about it—the speech that he delivered in London last September?

The hon. Prime Minister certainly laid it on the line to those listening to him that unless municipalities co-operated voluntarily, they were going to be put in the position where they had to co-operate. I wonder how closely the hon. Minister has read the report of the select committee? That committee came to the unanimous conclusion that if there is going to be anything like regional government or regional control, it had to come from the top down.

It is no good any longer to dangle the carrot of a few extra grants and hope that there will be a revolution or any real change bubbling up from the bottom, even with all the goodwill and all the fine conferences that have been convened from one end of the province to the other. I wonder if the hon. Minister can remember all the troubles that have taken place, not only in the Don jail but in institutions all across the province where there is a conflict between the employees as to who is their boss; who fixes the rate of salary; and who shall they complain to when they are unhappy? The recommendations are repeated again that the province is the logical place for this authority to rest. With all of that evidence, and another mass of evidence that I will not bother to go into at this time, how can the hon. Minister still pursue his dangling-the-carrot policy? That is all he is doing.

The hon. Minister is not going to live long enough, nor is any member of this House, to see his policy effectively change the system of institutions in this province. If the hon. Minister is serious about this, he will pay attention to all of these matters I have enumerated and the many other matters that I am sure he is as aware of as I am. If this is going to be done, and done properly, the province is going to have to take over these institutions.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, before the hon. Minister replies, I would like to make a few more comments and then perhaps we can wrap it all up in one. I assume, from what the hon. Minister says, that he has no agreements as yet, that a number of them are in the mill, but no agreements have been made among any of these councils?

I want to lend my support to the comments of both the hon. member for Brant and the hon. member for Downsview. It seems to me that if this is going to be achieved, two things have to be done. The boundaries have to be mapped out—even if after discussion, they are altered later. If the province is not mapped out into what the hon. Minister feels are correct boundaries, arrived at with the advice and the detailed information he has, he is going to end up with tag ends—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We have done that.

Mr. MacDonald: I would suggest that it should be done and it should be circulated across the province. If in some area they do not move now, they can start to move three or four years from now, or perhaps the conditions are such that they should be moving now. If they know that the hon. Minister is providing some leadership, they might respond to it. Or, if they do move four or five years from now, they will know that there is some sort of a pattern that they should consider. That is point one.

The second point is that I hope before we go very much further that the hon. Minister, along with all the other hon. Ministers—indeed, I suggest that it is the hon. Prime Minister and the Cabinet that should be taking the initiative and co-ordinating it—find out what co-ordination there should be among the various regional developments that are emerging in the province, whatever be the objective and purpose of regional development.

I do not like to hear the hon. Minister come in and say: "Do not throw a monkey wrench into the works now, you may set it back 15 years." Maybe it should be set back for 15 years. Maybe it should be set back at least some time so that you find that the Minister goes in this direction, some other Minister goes in another direction and another Minister goes in his direction and it is found that it would have been wiser to co-ordinate them in one common pattern.

This is the complaint that I make. But there is a final and even more important thing. The hon. Minister, on many occasions earlier in his estimates today, has been talking about the rather uncertain period in which the department is living, with the prospect that everything above the six months sentence is going to be taken over by the federal government at some point. This leaves the hon. Minister with the under-six months' sentences or his training schools.

A couple of years ago the John Howard society presented us with a brief which gave a graphic picture of what was happening among those who were convicted and went into our various institutions. The great proportion of them never end up in the hon. Minister's institutions now; they end up in the county jails, which have absolutely no facilities for rehabilitation. They have virtually no facilities for classification. They are plain, pure human storage—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member is reading my speech.

Mr. MacDonald: I gave it years before the hon. Minister read it when I was dealing on behalf of our group here in the House.

Now if the hon. Minister is heading for a department which is going to cut off at six months, I would think that would be another reason why he should be forging ahead and providing the whole of the province with a pattern for bringing the county jails together, so that this can become the basis for what may be—if it is ever established—the first real rehabilitative programme in the province of Ontario. Up until now, the hon. Minister has ignored county jails and I suggest that sometime when he has lost everything above six months, it may be a good thing if all the county jails come into this department, because they will be separated, with each county going off on its own, the Minister looking after the training schools and those up to six months. There is obvious logic in co-ordinating the whole thing.

In anticipation of a clarification or an implementation of the Fauteux report, forge ahead and get the groundwork and the plans laid, so that when the federal government relieves the hon. Minister, he can then start to move and deal with the major portion of a reform programme—those who have been in the county jails and have had nothing at all up until now in the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for York South has said exactly what I have said when I was out to these counties speaking to them. We have about 15 or 20 counties involved now. We try giving them direction; perhaps I made a mistake in not being strong enough in explaining what our plans are in this field. We have given them lots of direction; we have laid out the province. But we are, quite frankly, not going into an area saying: "This is how we want it," because the divisions, as we have planned them, are usually natural divisions which the counties themselves, with some encouragement, arrived at.

It is working, I tell the hon. member for Downsview. It is not the policy of the government to take over the county jails, and this is working; it is working very well and that is why—I will be quite frank—that is why I am a little bit sensitive on the subject, because—

Mr. Nixon: Why does the hon. Minister say it is working so well—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Because it has taken a long time—

Mr. Nixon: It is taking a long time—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Of course. We started this last year. I visited so many counties; you have to get county councils together and explain it to them. Then you have another meeting and they go back to their various counties and get approval from them. It is not an easy thing to do.

Mr. Singer: This can go on indefinitely—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: But they are not going on indefinitely—

Mr. Singer: There is not one successful—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We will have a few successful ones very shortly, unless they start getting the impression that they may as well wait because the province is going to take up the responsibility, anyway.

Mr. Singer: Well, is that a bad impression—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Yes, because those who may be hesitating will use it as an excuse to hesitate.

Mr. Singer: Why should they not? Surely it makes sense? The hon. Minister cannot confine crime into regions. Crime is province-wide, and the care and the attention of those people who have to be detained should be a provincial responsibility, surely? This is what the select committee on municipal affairs said twice in two reports. This is what the Stewart committee said as long ago as 11 years. Why is the hon. Minister trying to say it is not so?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That what is not so?

Mr. Singer: That it is not so that you can still regionalize this sort of responsibility, Mr. Chairman.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Because we are doing it.

Mr. Singer: I think the hon. Minister is completely wrong. His very concern that he is expressing tonight—that somebody, by speaking in this House, is going to upset some applecart—further establishes this fact in my mind. I think he is trying to convince the regions that the only way they are going to get a modern penal institution which they are going to be able to use is if they go into this kind of scheme. I think he is trying to pull the wool over their eyes and I think he is trying to avoid the proper responsibility that lies with this government. This should be a government responsibility. To expand just a bit on the remarks of the hon. member for York South, if you are going to have proper staffs, if you are going to have fair rates of pay, if you are going to have proper training, if you are going to have some sort of rehabilitation, you have got to do that over the broad body of the province. You have got to do that centrally. If you are going to avoid the sort of fight such as the very serious one concerning the Don jail here in Metro, just a few years ago, about whether Metro paid them, or the province paid them—it was kicked backwards and forwards a dozen times between the two levels—surely there has to be a clear understanding that the province has this responsibility?

If the hon. Minister is doing anything less than that, certainly in my opinion and in the opinions of my hon. colleagues this is the wrong approach. The administration of justice, the cost of looking after people who are in this type of institution, should be a completely provincial responsibility. It should be administered from the top down; it will not bubble up from the bottom by dangling the carrot of a few extra dollars.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Again, Mr. Chairman, I just take objection to one thing; the remark that we are pulling the wool over anybody's eyes. You are not going to pull the wool over any of the county councils' eyes. They know what the score is, they know precisely what is going on. Some of them are progressive enough to go along with this:

As far as it being a provincial responsibility, you could argue it is a federal responsibility. Crime knows no provincial boundaries either. We are trying to do the best we can with the responsibilities we have.

Mr. Singer: Well, what about that, the hon. Minister—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We are not—now I have the floor—

Mr. Singer: There is an Act called The BNA Act which delineates this.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: As far as the problem in respect of Don jail is concerned, that occurred a couple of years ago. This does not really apply because the situation that occurred at that time, which does not exist now, does not occur in the county jails either, because we do not do the appointing of staff. They appoint the staff. They pay them and are responsible for them, and with the administration of the federal Department of Justice grants and with special maintenance grants from my department. They are doing a good job with the facilities they have. What we need are new facilities.

We know the reasons why, they were outlined to the hon. member for York South. These are precisely the reasons that we have expounded for a year, and as I say we are going along well with it, giving lots of direction. It is working well and we hope, as I said in my remarks before the beginning of the estimates, we hope very shortly we will have some agreement. I am bringing forward to this House an amendment to The Jails Act which will provide for the manner in which the regional detention centres will be governed by a multi-county set-up. We have to provide this for them and it is just beginning to jell at this time. As I say, I am sure we will be able to show some success in a short time.

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that the present Minister is going on in this vein, because despite the fact that the Stewart committee recommended that The Department of Reform Institutions assume control and operation of district, county and city jails the situation has gone on since that time, for ten years—11, the hon. member for Downsview says—and what existed 11 years ago exists today. This is what the select committee said about our system at that time. It said:

The existing city and county jail system is outmoded and unworthy of the people of Ontario. It is completely out of step with modern conceptions of the decency of the individual and the hope of his salvation from crime. Jails do provide punishment by the very nature of their conditions, but in keeping with 19th century thinking they provide nothing else.

They are degrading to juveniles, innocent persons and the mentally ill, and they certainly do not provide the incentive to reform that would protect society to the greatest degree possible against further crime.

Now that is what was said 11 years ago about our system here in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I say it now.

Mr. Trotter: And it is the same thing.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I say it now, but we are doing something about it now.

Mr. Trotter: After 11 years! Who has been in office all this time? This has gone on for 11 years; and now, even when you start off, you are ignoring the recommendations.

Mr. Singer: Who was on that committee?

Mr. Trotter: They had a lot of experience. The present Speaker of the House was on that committee. There was the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Downer) and W. M. Nickle. They have pretty well disappeared from the scene.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Who else was on the committee?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Who was there from your side of the House?

Mr. Trotter: The hon. member for Grey South (Mr. Oliver) and Mr. Manley, so that there have been a lot of changes in that time.

At the same time, all the work that went into that report has by and large stood up quite well. Many recommendations were made—but the one that has been almost ignored completely, along with the one recommending the tearing down of Mercer, is the one having to do with our county jail system. There are jails in this province that are easily 100 years old and they are literally storage places for human beings, as the hon. member for York South said.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We are doing something about it.

Mr. Trotter: I know, but it has been a long wait and I will believe it when I see it.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I agree, but we are doing something.

Mr. Bryden: It is a year after—

Mr. Trotter: Eleven years have gone by and there is not too much hope.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Chairman, in the fullness of time may I get involved?

I like to start my speeches at about 11.30 in the evening. That is about the time when I come to myself. I like to get into these debates. You are talking about ten years ago. I remember coming here—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: We will give you lots of time.

Mr. Bukator: I beg your pardon?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I say take your time, there is lots of time.

Mr. Bukator: Oh, I am not going anywhere, believe me.

An hon. member: We could sit here until July.

Mr. Bukator: As a matter of fact, the hon. Prime Minister himself looks very fresh. He stepped out in the hall three or four hours ago and had a good rest. No doubt he is now ready to go for the rest of the night.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Do not be rude.

Mr. Bukator: By the way, how did the hockey game work out?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I do not know, I lost my carrier pigeon.

Mr. Bukator: Back in 1950 we came to Queen's Park to speak to the former Attorney General, as I have said before in this House—that was the hon. Dana Porter—about this very problem. In 1950 Reverend Foote, I think, at that time was the Minister of Prisons and Reforms.

I wish I could get a little more attention. I listened very patiently to everybody.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): Go ahead, I am listening.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am listening, George.

Mr. Bukator: I am very pleased that the hon. Minister is listening.

The Minister of Prisons and Reforms at that time was Reverend Foote. The Attorney General at that time was Dana Porter. We came here with a brief from the county of Welland. That was 15 years ago, not ten years ago, I guess maybe 15 years ago. We came here with a report from the county of Welland stating that the administration of justice costs were borne at the wrong level. We felt a little more of it should be borne at the provincial level.

Then five years later you get a report on it and they stated then—that is ten years ago—that the province should bear more of the cost. Now, I am pleased to hear at 11.30 this evening, just about five minutes ago, you conceded this point to us, that we are doing something about it.

I am not going to take any more time of the House, Mr. Chairman, because this is an honourable Minister and when he says he is doing something, we will come back another year and see what has been done.

Mr. Chairman: Is vote 1901 carried?

Several hon. members: No, no!

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I was interested in recalling the previous debate on the whole aspect of county jails. I think that the present hon. Minister in the previous debate was extremely interested and sympathetic when we were talking of the staffs in these county jails. I remember when I spoke on this that there had been a headline in an article by Monroe Johnson in which he was suggesting 500 people—it was an article that was in the Toronto Daily Star—suggesting that 500 inmates who have committed no crimes are in these county jails. Then he went into this describing the fact that the staff in these county jails are getting less salary than a labourer. I was looking through to see the interjections by the hon. Minister at that time.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I never interject.

Mr. Thompson: Well, let us not say “interject,” but giving a good plug. In fact, I will quote you on it. I quoted a description by a newspaperman of the whole situation—describing the salary scales and the conditions as shameful—most of these men and women working in the county jails are law-abiding citizens—and saying that they should be considered as unfortunates—the governors, the turnkeys, the matrons, in 37 county jails in Ontario. He then described the scanning of salary schedules applicable to county jails today as only able to bring astonishment that governors and guards alike had not indulged in an orgy of corruption as a means of augmenting income.

On two occasions there was a plug put by the hon. Minister. The second was—and I quote his words: “I thought the hon. member would give him”—this was by Monroe Johnson—“the chance of an extra plug.” This was away back in 1959 when we were discussing this.

It seems to me that we should be doing much more in this area. I agree wholeheartedly with what the hon. member for York South has been saying and what my own hon. colleagues have been saying, that surely this is the basis for your whole future planning.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I said that in my speech.

Mr. Thompson: But we also feel that going over this time after time is like an old cracked record—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Now we are doing something.

Mr. Thompson: This, by the way was the first speech I ever made in this House.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: And I paid attention to it.

Mr. Thompson: You not only paid attention but, as I say, you gave a little plug to push the thing on.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I remember those pearly words of wisdom; I am doing something about it.

Mr. MacDonald: Six years later.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am more in a position to do something about it now.

Mr. MacDonald: How about the government of which you have been a member?

Mr. Thompson: The point is that we want to see results from this. We want to see results and we do not think you are getting them.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, dealing with this same topic, I have the resolution passed by the city of London just last year, May 20, 1964; and, if I may, I would like to read this into the record:

The city of London: That the following resolution be adopted and forwarded to the local members of the Ontario Legislature, all counties and urban municipalities within Ontario, the association of Ontario mayors and reeves, and the Ontario municipal association, for their support:
and the resolution reads:

Whereas under existing legislation local municipalities are required to provide the jails and lock-up facilities to pay the salaries of the jail guards, to pay for court-houses for county and supreme courts, to pay coroners, pathologist, post-mortem and inquest fees, to pay for witnesses and jurors, to provide accommodation for division courts, magistrates' courts, to pay magistrates and their staffs, to provide accommodation for a legal law library for lawyers, to provide for transportation of prisoners, the administration of all accommodation for juvenile and family courts and other expenses related to the administration of justice; whereas municipalities use only a small part of these facilities in the enforcement of local bylaw cases, but by and large they are neither a service to local taxpayers nor to the municipality. On a broad, general basis, these are services which are provincial and federal in scope, whereas when compared to the direct expenses met by local municipalities, the amount of money returned to the municipalities through fines and forfeitures is insignificant.

Therefore be it resolved that the Ontario government be urged to carefully note the inequities in this situation and to take whatever steps it considers necessary to assist municipalities by removing these costs from the list of municipal financial obligations and to assume the entire cost of administration of justice, including the cost of building and maintaining court-houses and jails.

Approximately one month later, on June 18, 1964, the following resolution was adopted by the council of the city of Windsor—

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Do not bother to read that; we all got copies.

Mr. Newman: You see, we followed the hon. Prime Minister's home town. They apparently thought it was a good idea but it was not adopted.

—that the recent resolution adopted by council of the city of London, Ontario, urging the federal and provincial governments to remove from costs presently incurred for those aspects of the administration of justice which on a general basis, may be considered to be federal or provincial in scope, be endorsed.

So my community agrees with the hon. Prime Minister's community.

All we wait for is action.

Mr. Trotter: I have one question here. Does the department have a director of social work?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: No, the position is open.

Mr. Trotter: How long has it been open?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: About three years.

Mr. Trotter: What is the salary that job would pay?

Mr. White: Does the hon. member want to apply?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: How much should we pay? How much should we offer?

Mr. Bryden: Is this a guessing game?

Mr. Singer: You told us a little while ago you had nothing to do with that, you would not want to interfere.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: $7,800 to $9,500.

Mr. Trotter: Is there any particular reason why it is not filled, because it is rather a shocking thing to go three years—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That is because social workers are hard to find.

Mr. Trotter: Surely at $7,500 you could get—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: $7,800 to $9,500—and if you find somebody who is suitable and is qualified, we would consider starting them at something better than the minimum.

Mr. Trotter: There must be some good reason why they do not want to work for the department.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: A lot of departments are short of social workers. There is a shortage of social workers.

Mr. Trotter: But for a period of three years to go by there is certainly something wrong.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Because they do not like to take the shellacking they have to take from the public sometimes.

Mr. Trotter: I was wondering if the hon. Minister could find out for me—maybe he could do it either in the morning or on Monday—could the hon. Minister supply me with the turnover of psychiatrists and psychologists, over the period of the last ten years, who have been in his department? Remember, I said they have been going in and out like a revolving door.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Will you settle for five?

Mr. Trotter: Settle for five? All right, I will settle for five.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Trotter: All right, five years; but preferably ten, because you will find an even greater number have gone in and out in the last ten.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We will try and get it for ten. I was just thinking of the work involved at this time. I will try and get it for the hon. member.

Mr. Trotter: I think this will be a very interesting point.

Mr. Chairman: Is vote 1901 carried?

Mr. Singer: No, no. I thought the hon. Minister was getting a little inconsistent. A minute ago he said if someone complains and wants a higher salary, or is capable and has sufficient qualifications to warrant it, he would consider it. Earlier this evening, the hon. Minister indicated that he had nothing to do with salaries. When salaries were being questioned, he really had nothing to do with them; it was the civil service commission.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We can recommend to the civil service—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: Now, just let the hon. Minister answer.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We can recommend to the civil service that because this job is difficult to fill, we start them at something better than the minimum, within the scale. We have nothing to say about the scale and about what the minimum and maximum is, but we could recommend that they could be started at something better than the minimum.

Mr. Singer: That is the point my colleague the hon. member for Parkdale made a little earlier; and the hon. Minister thought that it was a shameful thing to suggest that he would go to the civil service commission and suggest that the salary levels for social workers be changed.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That is something entirely different.

Mr. Singer: Why is it different?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Because the hon. member is talking about the negotiations which go on as to what the range of the salaries shall be. We are not talking about that. I was not saying that we would have anything to say about the raise of the salaries; I am only saying that if a person has certain qualifications we could apply to get his salary started at something below the minimum within that range, but not to set the range. I think that is plain enough.

Mr. Singer: I am sure the hon. Minister meant above the minimum—as in this last remark of his. But, as I understood it, what he said before is that if somebody came, sufficiently qualified, he would recommend going above the maximum of the scale. Is that not what the hon. Minister said?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I could not do that.

An hon. member: He did not say that.

Mr. Singer: The hon. Minister cannot pay this director any more than $9,500?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That is right.

Mr. Singer: Then has it not occurred to the hon. Minister that on this position—and it is an important position which has been vacant for three years—perhaps he should go to the commission and say that he has this important position and, at $9,500, he is not getting applicants, and perhaps the top salary should be $12,000?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, the answer I give to this is the same answer I gave before: This is a matter that is not decided by any particular Minister. What the Minister discusses with the head of the civil service commission, or with the treasurer who heads up this department—he is responsible for this department and we do not stand up there individually and announce to the Legislature—I think—

Mr. Singer: All right. The hon. Minister does not want to make any announcements. I am sure that he will remember with me what Mr. Macaulay did when he was charged with the responsibility of setting up a new department; equivalent salary scales in any other department did not matter. He was able to gather in, in a very short period of time, a brand new civil service staff for a brand new department at good high salary levels which were able to attract, by and large, very capable people.

If the hon. Minister is going to do his job he has got to go, in the same manner Macaulay did—I do not know if this hon. Minister is as persuasive as Macaulay is—and get those salaries up high enough so that he will have a staff to be able to give the service the people of Ontario need.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. Minister would indicate what active efforts have been made by this department to recruit a person for this job. I am not an expert on salaries in this field, but I believe that this is a relatively good salary in the field. I regret to have to say that people with qualifications and skills—and social workers are not more highly paid than the community at large—but I think the salary he is offering compares quite well with most salaries in the field. That being so, it seems strange to me that the department cannot get a person to fill the job in the space of three years. I think that he ought to have somebody out there actively trying to recruit capable persons and offering the salary to them, rather than waiting for them to come to him.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Of course, the civil service commission does the advertising and the recruitment; but, in addition to this, last year, efforts were made by the head of the school of social work of the University of Toronto—and he is interested—to try to get someone, interested in this work, applying for this job. He has not been successful.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I am going to suggest two reasons why the hon. Minister has not been successful: One—and I know, personally, many well-qualified people in other provinces who would be very interested in coming into the province of Ontario because of its size—the biggest reform institutions set-up—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: And the best.

Mr. MacDonald: Not the best; this is precisely why they will not come. Its atmosphere is such that they simply do not want to come into it.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Where is there a better atmosphere?

Mr. MacDonald: In British Columbia and Saskatchewan and other provinces—

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): We just got a man from British Columbia and one from Saskatchewan—

Mr. Trotter: There are a lot of people from Ontario out there.

Mr. MacDonald: There is another reason, Mr. Chairman. A general does not like to be leading a non-existent army. The hon. Minister had a director of social work, for years in the department, who grew very lonely because he had no social workers to direct, or so few; here is one reason why the hon. Minister is not getting them. It is because his predecessor brought in a director of social work who tried to build a staff and could not get the social workers; he was a general without an army.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Why could he not get the social workers?

Mr. MacDonald: For reasons I have already explained. The facts speak rather eloquently; they have not got them.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Every penal system in every jurisdiction in the world is short of social workers—every one of them, without exception, and that goes for Saskatchewan and British Columbia and the federal—

Mr. MacDonald: They are not as short as the hon. Minister is.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I will tell the hon. member about that before these estimates are over.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Chairman, I will not dispute what the hon. Minister says about a general shortage of these professionally trained people, but surely when he has had a key position of this nature vacant for three years it is time that he treated it as an emergency and got somebody out actively recruiting—not merely through the school of social work at the University of Toronto. I do not think that it is legitimate to let it go on for any longer.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, just before we leave this last point, do you realize the point? The hon. Minister of Education is refusing to give grants to a school that is proposing to train social workers just 100 miles west of here, and the recommendation of the hon. Minister who should be sitting directly to his left shows he is in favour of this? He obviously needs them and yet the government is not providing money for this.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Other efforts will be made which I hope to be able to announce shortly.

Mr. Singer: Is the hon. Minister going to start a school of social work?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Not really.

Mr. Singer: Not really. I did not think the hon. Minister was. The hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) needs them too.

Mr. Bukator: Mr. Chairman, the city of London was mentioned, and the city of Windsor, pertaining to the cost of administration of justice. I just found the Ontario municipal association resolution—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Read it.

Mr. Bukator: I would like to read it because—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I think about 50 municipalities endorsed that. We might read them all.

Mr. Singer: We are trying to emphasize that, because it does not seem to get through.

Mr. Bukator: The point I am trying to make is that they are working on it, and they are trying to persuade municipalities and counties to take part. I would like to read this portion to you to show that they have already taken part. Note after many years, it says here, in fine print:

—province to assume entire cost in the administration of justice including costs of buildings and maintaining courthouses and jails.

From the city of London, endorsed by the city of London—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bukator: I realize that. This is the first one my hon. colleague mentioned. He endorsed the city of Belleville—that is quite a nice city; Brockville; Chatham; Fort William; Guelph; Owen Sound; Peterborough; St. Thomas; Sarnia; Welland, of which I spoke 15 years ago; Windsor; Woodstock—

Hon. Mr. Simonett: What about Killaloe?

Mr. Bukator: The gentleman from Killaloe left some time ago.

The hon. Prime Minister said, Mr. Chairman, that we are not in a hurry. I will read another resolution into the record.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Do. I am not going any place.

Mr. Bukator: Whereas under existing legislation local municipalities are required to provide the jails and lock-up facilities and to pay the salaries of jail guards, the courthouses for the counties' and supreme courts, and to pay coroners, pathologists, post mortems and inquest fees—I wish my own colleagues here would give me an opportunity to get it across to you.

Interjections by hon members.

Mr. Bukator: —to pay for witnesses and jurors. Can you imagine counties having to pay for witnesses and jurors. Talk about an obsolete law!

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Yes. That is not my department.

Mr. Bukator: Where in your estimates is that?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That is not my department.

Mr. Bukator: It is pertaining to jails. I will get to that.

To provide accommodation for division courts—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, that is in this estimate.

Mr. Bukator: What vote is that? By the way, what vote are we on?

An hon. member: The Attorney General. Now we know what we have been suspecting.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, would you advise the hon. member of the department whose estimates we are considering?

Mr. Bukator: It will read good in the record when these people from the different municipalities will say that at least there was one who mentioned it on our behalf; because several cities here were not mentioned by anyone.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Ten municipalities out of 940, George, so keep on going.

Mr. Bukator: Do you want me to keep on going?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bukator: I have another resolution here from the mayors and reeves.

An hon. member: What about the county councils association?

Mr. Bukator: I have not met with them yet, but I intend to take it up—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Surely it must be obvious to the hon. Prime Minister that we are all wasting our time?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, I am just going to demonstrate that this is a perfect example of how the log jams occur.

Mr. MacDonald: Now, Mr. Chairman, just a moment. Let us deal with this point. This is a perfect example of how we waste our time by a silly procedure of sitting until five minutes to 12. Any sensible civilized Parliament that sits in the evenings sits from 8 p.m. to 10 p.m. or 10.30 p.m. If the hon. Prime Minister is going to adopt the procedure of his predecessor by sitting until 12 or 12.30 p.m. as a move of revenge for us pointing to his handling of business in this House, then he is indulging in the kind of petty things that his predecessor did, and I want to suggest to him that it is unworthy of him. I have no objection to the House sitting to 10.30 p.m. rather than 10 p.m., but the proposition of sitting here until midnight is nonsense. We are accomplishing nothing; we are slap-happy. Let us go home and have a sleep.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, I would just simply say that this little outburst just serves to show—

Mr. MacDonald: It is not an outburst.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: This is what I call an outburst.

Mr. MacDonald: Then it is about time you burst out.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: We are here to do the business of this province. If we are to sit and listen to resolutions read into the record, all of which have been delivered to this government and have been examined in every department of government, we will sit here and we will wait until this is finished. Then, I hope, we will get on with the business, which is dealing with these estimates. That is why we are here.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say, first of all, that I think that the resolutions which are being presented are trying to emphasize a point. We have been going through these estimates—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: But they were read by the previous member.

Mr. Thompson: We have been through these estimates and we take it extremely seriously—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Thompson: If you think we should be going till one o'clock when these are men's lives we are discussing, then we will have a look at some of the facts of this department. I mean the truth of whether they are doing a job. You have 12,353 offenders, whose criminal history is reported—980 were first offenders—I am quoting from the hon. Minister's report—1,122 were second offenders, 844 were third offenders, and 3,709 had a record of more than three previous offences. There is no record available on 3,348 offenders, but of those about whom facts are available, and it amounts to some 9,005, more than half are repeaters, and more than a third have a record of more than three previous offences. I suggest that with the province spending a great deal of money that even though we are tired, we are getting a viewpoint expressed in consideration of these estimates expressed.

Now, I respect the hon. Minister in many ways, but I think he is taking a defeatist attitude in some ways. He is telling us he cannot get social workers, he is telling us he cannot get staff. Well, let me say if he is doing an—I use this, it is a trite term, but I use it with sincerity—it is a war on poverty. If the hon. Minister and his government really saw this as a priority, they would get the right people to do the job and get out of this disgraceful record which has come right from his report. He would make an enormous priority with it.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We have.

Mr. Thompson: And he would not be telling us that he could not go to a commission or he could not do this or that. He is saying do not rock the boat; he should say: "I am going to get on with this and we are going to do it." That is what we seriously think.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We are doing it.

Mr. Thompson: I suggest in fairness that after 12 o'clock none of us is going to be able to give the deliberation and thought which these estimates should demand.

Mr. Bukator: I have not finished yet. I would like to finish this resolution. I do not think it is nonsensical; I think it represents a lot of people who are thinking. I will just read the last paragraph, I think that is the important portion.

An hon. member: Read it all.

Mr. Bukator: "Therefore be it resolved"—I think the Minister of whatever you call yourself, who does absolutely nothing in this House but heckle, should smarten up because he is getting well paid for doing absolutely nothing. This is the sort of thing that goes on in this House when one tries to put over a point that I think is important to the people.

Mr. E. A. Dunlop (Forest Hill): It has been made, actually.

Mr. Bukator: I wonder.

Mr. Singer: It has not been made sufficiently to impress the government.

Mr. Chairman: Order, order!

Mr. Bukator: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Therefore be it resolved that the Ontario government be urged to carefully note the inequalities of the situation and to take whatever steps are considered necessary to assist municipalities by removing these costs from the list of municipal financial obligations and to assume the entire cost of administration of justice including the cost of building and maintaining the courthouses and jails.

This is not a new argument in this House. I have made this point every year for six consecutive years that I know of and 15 years ago, also. The government here has been sitting on their hands doing absolutely nothing about it, Mr. Chairman, and if you, Mr. Minister, say that you are doing something about it, it will be a happy day for a lot of us in the province when you do.

Vote 1901 agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves that the committee rise and report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to a certain resolution and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow morning I would like to deal with some of the third readings and the bills that are in committee of the whole House and then we will return to the estimates of this department.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 12.00 o'clock midnight.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

Presenting reports by committees.

Motions.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister) moves that the report of the special commission on redistribution of electoral districts in Ontario be referred to the standing committee on privileges and elections together with any representations which may be received with respect thereto.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak to this motion.

As hon. members know, the report of this commission has been pretty thoroughly examined not only by the hon. members of this Legislature but by various communities and I have received representations from hon. members, from various levels of municipal governments, from chambers of commerce, and so on.

They dealt not really with the principle of redistribution, which I do not think is in question, but rather with the specific recommendations made in the report. Now, were we to introduce a bill here, it would simply require a debate on second reading on the principle, and I think there is agreement among us, the bill would then be referred. It seemed to me that it might be a more expeditious method of dealing with the whole problem if we were to refer the report itself to the committee on privileges and elections where it can be examined.

There have also been, I understand, representations made directly to the commission itself. If the report of the commission goes to the committee on privileges and elections, it can be examined there. Any representations that have been made to me, I will file with the committee so that they may know what they are, and then the committee itself can decide what might be done with the report.

It seems to me that if there is a large body of objections to some of the local situations as a result of the drawing of boundaries, the comment might be referred back to the commission itself—which sits, of course, as a legislative commission, it is not a government commission—and they might re-examine the matter.

I do think that we all want to preserve the impartiality that we achieved by appointing a Royal commission to deal with this problem in the first place. If we have any comments to make upon their findings, it seems to me that the thing to do is refer it back to them with whatever comments we may have to make. They in turn can deal with it from the same Olympian heights from which they made the original examination and arrived at their report. That is why I make this motion this morning.

Mr. K. Bryden (Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make one or two observations on the motion now before us.

As the hon. Prime Minister has said, Mr. Speaker, the decision two or three years ago to set up a committee or a commission to look into this matter was based on a desire to remove it from the political arena. I think there is general recognition that the old-fashioned method of handling redistribution is not a desirable one, that is the method of referring it to a committee of people who themselves will be affected by redistribution.

An independent commission was set up, in effect to take the matter out of politics and to remove any possibility or any appearance that the redistribution would be arranged in a way that might be of political advantage to any party or individual. I think that is a sound principle; it is a principle that is coming to be recognized in more and more jurisdictions.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that now that we have accepted that principle, we should not refer the report of the commission to a committee of members. I think in that way we run the risk of bringing the whole matter back into politics.

None of us can view this report objectively. I believe that there are many hon. members who are unhappy about features of the redistribution committee's report. I think that is natural and I have no doubt that some of the concern and some of the objections to particular features of the report may very well be well founded. I am not disputing any of that. I am just suggesting that a committee of people who are personally affected by the redistribution is not in a position to do any sort of objective work in relation to it.

I had hoped that when the redistribution committee was established that meant the matter was removed entirely from politics except to the degree that we would naturally have to pass the final bill, but I expected that the final bill would be based exclusively on the committee's report. That, as a matter of fact, is what happened with regard to the preliminary redistribution undertaken two or three years ago for Metro Toronto. I think there may have been one or two changes made in the names of constituencies, but the boundaries proposed by the commission were accepted in toto without any changes at all.

Now it may be that in the larger job undertaken by the committee there may be some need for some readjustment of boundaries. I am not convinced of that, I think that we had three independent people, all of whose qualifications and impartiality is well recognized, go to work on this task, and a very great task it is. They came up with what appears to them to be a fair, reasonable and sensible redistribution.

Whether or not I or any other hon. member agree what they did, I do not think is material. I suppose that if there were 10 different redistribution commissions, there would be 10 different results, because there are no absolute principles on this matter. But the commission, I believe, acted honestly and in good faith and brought in as good a result as we are likely to get.

There is, of course, always the possibility that there were factors that they did not take into account and that it would perhaps be desirable for them to take another look at such factors.

But I am suggesting, Mr. Speaker, that the way to do that is not in the charged atmosphere of a legislative committee consisting of political partisans. It is no criticism of the committee to say that it consists of political partisans, that is the way committees are, that is in the nature of things. But I do not think that a committee of political partisans should now get involved in this matter, especially since there seems to be something of a charged atmosphere with regard to the report, if I can place any reliance on various comments and observations I have heard and have seen in the press. I think we should be very careful to keep this matter out of that charged atmosphere.

I would suggest a better procedure would be the procedure which I think—I have not checked this but I think it is envisaged in the federal legislation relating to redistribution. That procedure is something like this: After the report is received a certain period of time, I think 30 days, is permitted when any people who are interested, including elected members, may file written submissions relating to any aspect of the commission's report. After 30 days the commission resumes its deliberations and considers these written submissions and—

Hon. A. K. Roberts (Minister of Lands and Forests): I think my hon. friend is a little wrong in the procedure. I think the procedure is that any ten members in the federal House may require it to go back to the committee and then the House sends it back.

Mr. Bryden: Well, okay; that procedure would be fine, too. All right, if the hon. Minister wants to have ten members refer this back—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: I think we have more than ten members on the standing committee on privileges and elections. My view is that that committee will, without changing it at all, refer the reports back to the commission with any comments they may make; but without changing it. In other words, the final decision as to any changes will be made by the commission itself. Then that report, with any changes they see fit to make, will come back to this Legislature to be dealt with in this House, as it must be.

Mr. Bryden: I am just suggesting, Mr. Speaker, that review by the committee in this sort of situation is not desirable. Let it be a procedure whereby objections could be referred to the redistribution commission, the independent body, without first being reviewed by any body of this House. Whether it is ten members from the House who ask for it to be referred back—that is a different thing from referring it to the committee—or whether it is a matter of permitting people to table written suggestions for revision of the report, I do not care how it is done; all I am suggesting is that we should keep it out of the charged political atmosphere. Let it go directly back to the commission, and let them consider whatever written objections may be filed with them.

Let us not have a hearing by a legislative committee, which could open up the whole political issue again. If it is not going to do that, then it is completely superfluous. If all the committee does is look at it and say it should go back, well, we could do that directly from here. I believe that the commission should consider any objections anybody may see fit to make; but I believe they should be in writing and that the commission should consider them privately. I do not believe in throwing the question back into the political arena after we have made the original decision to take it out of that arena.

Therefore, I would suggest the procedure proposed by the hon. Prime Minister this morning is unfortunate and it would be better if we adopted an alternative procedure. I have suggested one or two different ways of doing it; either of them would keep the matter out of the political arena, keep the amount of heat generated to a minimum, and simply permit the commission to reconsider its report, if it sees fit, privately and in an atmosphere of calm where there will be full opportunity for these distinguished gentlemen to act in an impartial way without being subject to any pressure from any source.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): That is the weakest argument I have ever heard from the hon. member's side.

Mr. A. J. Reaume (Essex North): Mr. Speaker, on this one point I agree with the hon. member. I am one of these people who are affected by the report, and although I agree and think that the board or commission really did an excellent job—it is impartial and I do not think it was thinking in terms of any of us—I think it was thinking in terms of the overall good.

I do not mind having my future placed in the hands of a commission which is impartial, but I must openly admit that I do not want my future placed in the hands of a committee which will be overloaded with members of the opposite side.

Having said that, if there are going to be any changes made at all, I do not think we ought to make them, because we are the people who are actually being affected; in my own case, my riding is being wiped out entirely. There will be no more Essex North. That does not frighten me because I think that the board or commission did a very impartial job; I think that the real purpose of the appointment of the commission was to take this whole matter out of our hands. I was happy with that thought. But now we are bringing it partially back into the hands of the House again. I agree with the words of my hon. friend from Woodbine, and I would hope that we would leave this thing as it is.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, if I may just explain: I think it is fair to say that there is general agreement on all sides that we do not want this involved in any political atmosphere. I agree with you and I agree with the hon. member for Woodbine.

On the other hand, procedurally the commission itself is a creature of this House, created by this Legislature—not by the government, but by the Legislature as a whole—and, of course, its report must come here.

I am merely suggesting that the simple way to deal with that report is to refer it to a committee of this House, which then can gather up whatever material has not been given to the commission and refer the report, plus the comments that have been made, back to the commission. It is not my intent, and I am certain it will not be the intent of anybody on that committee, that they should sit down and start altering the decisions the commission made. What they will do is say: "All right, here are your decisions, here are the comments we have received; we are going to refer the whole thing back to you so that you, as you prepared the first report, may re-examine this report in light of the comments made to us."

But the ultimate decision must rest with the commission and cannot be taken by that committee. Eventually, of course, we cannot, hard as we may like to try in various instances, completely shrug off our own responsibilities in this matter; eventually there will be a piece of legislation before this House upon which we will have to vote, and we will have to examine it. But I want this intermediate step to be taken.

As a matter of fact, as I understand the federal procedure, and perhaps we should have thought of this when we set up our own commission, but—

Mr. Reaume: I am suspicious. I cannot help it—it is just in my nature.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, we have known the hon. member for quite a long time around here, Mr. Speaker, and we recognize this element of suspicion; but perhaps this is a new procedure, which we might have laid down a little more carefully in the beginning—although one learns from experience. But as I understand the federal procedure in this matter, they will in fact print maps of the changes, publish them in local papers, and then proceed to have public hearings; so they are really going to have a very complete investigation by the public.

The comments I have received have come, as I say, from municipal councils. They are not the people who have any interest in the hon. member's seat, or my seat, or who holds which seat.

Mr. Bryden: But there were a lot of comments from these people, too.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: There were also comments from hon. members. I can tell you that one hon. member on our side of the House, for instance, has got four counties in his seat. Anybody who has ever represented a rural riding will immediately recognize, from a non-political point of view, the sheer difficulty in doing this. These are matters that can be drawn to the attention of the commission—that the commission itself can examine to see if anything can be done about it. In some instances, perhaps so, in other instances, in their wisdom, perhaps not.

I can assure the House that among the members on this side there is no intent, there is no desire, that the committee itself should start to make alterations; but there is a desire that these matters should be brought out into the open, to the attention of the commission. The commission can then draw another report, which it will do completely impartially. That report will be resubmitted to this Legislature and then we must accept our responsibility in dealing with that when it comes back. But the changes made will be made by the commission and not by the committee.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I want to add a brief comment to what has been said here. The hon. Prime Minister, in his initial comments, said that ultimately from the standing committee of the Legislature it would go back to the commission, and from their Olympian heights they could once again review the situation.

I do not want to be seriously critical of the commission, but I think they are open to some criticism. I think, indeed, that the hon. Prime Minister's choice of phrase is not inaccurate. The commission did view it from an Olympian height, and it was so Olympian that they did not implement the terms of reference that were given to them fully.

I think this commission did a magnificently exact job in terms of coming up with an application of population. I think they were provided, through their staff, with population blocks all across the province. They pieced them together until they came up with constituencies that conformed with population figures in accordance with the quotas they had laid down. We will not, for the moment, go into debating these quotas.

In some instances I have been told—for example, in the city of Windsor, although I am not really in a position to vouch for this—that there were streets that almost zig-zagged to get out the exact population quota.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): That is right.

Mr. MacDonald: It is nonsense, at least in terms of the local reaction, having this kind of a boundary between two constituencies in an attempt to come up with a population quota that would be exact; particularly, when in my view, the commission ignored other factors that are just as important as population.

I happened to become thoroughly familiar last fall, during the Waterloo South by-election, with that particular area. You can take an area like Wilmot township, now in Waterloo South. Wilmot township has no real connection at all with Galt. Indeed, it has been one of the anomalies for years that Wilmot township is in there. Its whole connection is with Waterloo and Kitchener, socially, in terms of TV, community activities and transportation. You cannot even hear the Galt radio during the daytime up in Wilmot township, in many instances. Why, when you were going to have this kind of an assessment, you would not take into account these sociological factors, I do not know.

I think the hon. Prime Minister said, and I think he is correct, that we are moving into a new approach to this. We are learning, and I suspect that perhaps we can learn, even in Ontario, because the commissioners are the same three people; we can learn from experience on the federal redistribution how it can be handled more effectively.

Therefore, I agree with the proposition that this should go back, since the hon. Prime Minister has dictated it and he has got 77 members here, to the standing committee, but ultimately to the commission, so that they can do the job in what would be a more satisfactory manner.

I would add two concluding points. If the government has decided that those who have now made representations, or any member of the House who wants to make representations, can have those representations tabled on behalf of some, or made personally, at the standing committee, I think it would be wise for that committee to suggest to the commission that they adopt the procedure that, within a one-month period, anybody across the province who wants to make representations should do so.

I think, for example, of the years that we have lamented of the almost nonsensical situation up in northern Ontario, with a constituency that used to include Hornepayne and Sault Ste. Marie. Sault Ste. Marie has been made a separate constituency but to come with a large enough population block in the remainder of the old riding, they have moved east and included Blind River and, along with Blind River, they have got Hornepayne and Hearst in the north. Quite frankly, you might as well put the north and the south pole in the same constituency.

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Hearst is still in Cochrane North, but Mattice and Opasatika villages located on No. 11 highway are in the new Sault Ste. Marie riding. I agree that does not sound—

Mr. MacDonald: All right. I am using this to illustrate a point and I do not want to pursue the details of it. I think if you went up into northern Ontario, even admitting the difficulties of getting association between widely scattered areas, you could come up with some closer association than trying to put Blind River along with Hornepayne in the same constituency because, argue as you will, it is going to be rather difficult for those two areas to believe that they have any association in the same constituency.

This, I think, could have had a better solution. Indeed, some years ago, I suggested that the answer was to take Manitowadge and make it the hub of a wheel and take in all the areas that are around it and you would come up with a constituency that would have a degree of homogeneity. So that is the one point that I wanted to make—that not only those who have had an opportunity and used it, of sending in representations to the hon. Prime Minister or anybody else, not only those who happen to be on that committee, but an open invitation for a month, to any individual, any association, any council, anybody, to submit representations in writing to the commission. Then they will know that they are fully aware of all the other factors, in addition to population.

My second point is by way of caution: If the government has decided, I think mistakenly as my hon. colleague has indicated, to run the risk of this being back into politics, even if fleetingly in a standing committee made up of politicians, I hope the members of that committee will sense the import of this debate and make certain that they do not turn it into what could appear, in any sense in the public view, as being the politicians trying to get back into this picture of redistribution.

If the committee does nothing but present representations that have been made, and any new ones they may have in a quiet, dispassionate, factual way, and then in effect say to the redistribution commission: "Here is your job, go back and take another look at it," perhaps we can avoid the difficulties that my hon. colleague from Woodbine has raised and warned us of.

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I may ask the hon. Prime Minister a question with regard to the procedure that he anticipates in this matter? Is it anticipated that any person, whether a member of this House or some other party who wishes to have a point brought to the attention of the independent committee will have to do it through the standing committee; or would it be considered an attempt at any improper influence if a person simply sent a communication directly to the independent committee?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I can only say that those communications have already gone to the commission itself. In other words, some perhaps that have been submitted to me or to the hon. member have also been sent to the commission.

I think we can leave this to the good sense of that committee. Now we have had a pretty frank discussion of it here this morning and I do not detect any differences in our basic thinking. I think the committee on privileges and elections, as a committee of this Legislature, is free to formulate any recommendations it may wish as suggestions to the commission on how it should handle this matter when it goes back.

In other words, as the hon. member for York South says, public hearings or some opportunity for the public to make representation should be available. A redistribution of this magnitude affects—apart from those ten ridings that were straightened away a year or so ago—just about every person in the province. To my thinking it would be entirely proper for representation to be made to the commission itself, and I would hope that as a result of the opinions that have been expressed here this morning concerning the commission and what we want done, that the commission will see fit to take this action; but I think that we can only recommend to the commission. Its independence is inviolate and we can suggest what we would like them to do, but the final decision as to what they do must be their own.

I feel that there is nothing improper in the committee making suggestions as to how the matter should be attacked so to speak, and I am quite sure that the commission will be more than happy to receive representations, as they have already done.

The other fact is that somehow or other a means has to be established by which these local situations can be brought to the attention of the commission. It is a big province and this Hornepayne situation that the hon. member for York South mentioned is a point in question, but I do not suppose there would be ten per cent of the people in this province who would understand how a situation could develop in that way. Surely we should have a means whereby those people could come and say: "Look, you may not know what you have done, but this is in fact what you have done."

This is the type of subsequent examination I envisage.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of bills.

Mr. J. F. Edwards (Perth): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to take this opportunity to send my welcome to the guests in the gallery who have, as hon. members know, come from the teachers' college in Stratford which is recognized, I am sure, all over this province as one of the most outstanding places of learning.

I would also like to commend them on their decision to enter the profession and I wish them every success in their chosen field.

I would like, at this time, particularly to draw to the attention of hon. members the brochure which is on their desk about the 13th season of the Stratford Festival, which extends from June 14 to October 2. In that period of time drama and music of the highest order may be enjoyed. During August, two Shakespearean seminars by the universities of Canada will be sponsored by McMaster University.

The Stratford Festival is noted all over North America as the most successful promotion in the arts of its kind. If hon. members have never attended, I would suggest please do start this year and visit the festival and the beautiful city of Stratford-on-Avon.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. T. R. Connell (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day I would like to make a statement regarding the disposal of an unusual piece of government property. As all hon. members of this House are aware, the late great philanthropist, Sigmund Samuel, donated his large home in Forest Hill to the province in 1962 in the hope that it would be used as an official residence for the Lieutenant-Governor. It was an outright gift with the understanding that Mr. Samuel could continue to live in it as long as he wished.

When Mr. Samuel died, we studied what would be involved in remodelling the house to the use of the Lieutenant-Governor and found that the cost of such changes were so great that it could not be contemplated. We therefore decided to sell it. Our normal method of disposing of surplus government property is, of course, by public tender, but in view of the way in which this property was obtained and the nature of the house this procedure was not thought suitable.

We put the house in the hands of four reputable companies and a number of bids were received. Some had to be discarded because of the zoning regulations. The public has had an adequate chance to view the property and we accepted the highest bid which was for $116,900.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I will indulge in what is becoming a very pleasant habit here and file further answers to 18 questions: Numbers 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 103, 104, 106 and 107.

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

The Ontario provincial police do not make regular radar spotchecks on any of the highways. The radar is used periodically on a selective basis for the purpose of assisting our personnel in the enforcement of our speed laws in an effort to reduce the accident toll. Radar is used where feasible and when deemed necessary by the superintendent of the district on Highways 400, 403, 27, 11, the Queen Elizabeth Way and the Macdonald-Cartier Freeway, and all other highways across the province.

96. Mr. Singer: Inquiry of the Ministry: Will the Attorney General advise: (a) what basis is used in determining when Ontario provincial police cruisers should be traded in for new ones; (b) when cruisers are so traded, are they replaced as a result of a public tender call or an invitational tender call; (c) are the tenders received opened in public; (d) in 1964, how many cruisers were purchased by the Ontario provincial police; (e) how many tenders were received; (f) how many different purchases were made; (g) from whom were the cruisers purchased; (h) how many Ontario provincial police cruisers are purchased with more than 275 advertised horsepower; (i) how many Ontario provincial police cruisers are purchased with less than 275 advertised horsepower?

97. Mr. Singer: Inquiry of the Ministry: Will the Attorney General advise: (a) how many officers of the traffic division of the Ontario provincial police are assigned to each of the seventeen Ontario provincial police districts in Ontario; (b) what is the ratio of officers to miles of highway to be policed in each of these districts?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

District No. 1, Chatham (a) 102, (b) 36.8; District No. 2, London (a) 140, (b) 49.8; District No. 3, Burlington (a) 150, (b) 12.1; District No. 4, Niagara Falls (a) 101, (b) 22.6; District No. 5, Downsview (a) 226, (b) 13.5; District No. 6, Mount Forest (a) 113, (b) 95.8; District No. 7, Barrie (a) 130, (b) 47.8; District No. 8, Peterborough (a) 100, (b) 69.0; District No. 9, Belleville (a) 44, (b) 111.8; District No. 10, Perth (a) 95, (b) 73.3; District No. 11, Long Sault (a) 63, (b) 97.9; District No.

Note 1. Because of multiple responsibilities of the force, this question cannot be answered precisely. In smaller detachments the same members perform various types of police work. In larger detachments there are specialized assignments. The above chart shows the number of members assigned chiefly to traffic work whenever necessary.

Note 2. The answer to (b) has been based on "highways" as defined in section 1, subsection 10 of The Highway Traffic Act, which includes all highways policed by the Ontario provincial police force: King's Highway, county roads, township roads, etc.

98. Mr. Singer: Inquiry of the Ministry—Will the Attorney General advise: (a) If his department exercises any control over private and independent security forces; (b) If so, what controls are exercised and what is the authority for such control; (c) Are the uniformed and armed employees of such private and independent security forces classed as "peace officers" within the meaning of the law; (d) If there are any standards of training or qualifications for such uniformed and armed employees of private and independent security forces, has any Ontario municipality the right to contract with such a private force to handle its police protection in the same way that it can enter into arrangements with the Ontario provincial police for its police?

Answer by the hon. Attorney General:

(a) No; (b) Not applicable; (c) No. See Section 2(30) of The Criminal Code (Canada).

(d) There appears to be no standard of training or qualifications for such uniformed and armed employees of private and independent security forces.

According to the provisions of Section 3a of The Police Act, RSO 1960, chapter 298, as amended by section 3 of The Police Amendment Act, 1964, chapter 92, Ontario municipalities have no right to contract with such private forces to handle their police protection in the same way that they can enter into arrangements with the Ontario provincial police for their policing.

However, the provisions of subsection 3 of the above-mentioned section 3a, indicate that "In exceptional cases, the commission may approve of a system of policing that does not comply with this section."

Note 1. Prior to the enactment of the above-mentioned section 3a of The Police Act, four towns—Copper Cliff, Coniston, Levack and Lively, and one not designated village, Creighton Mine—had entered into a policing contract with the International Nickel Co. Ltd. Under the provisions of such contract the private police force of INCO is responsible for all policing in the above-mentioned municipalities. This arrangement has been in operation for several years.

Note 2. Members of the INCO security force, acting as municipal policemen under the contract, are classed as "peace officers." Section 2(30)(c) of The Criminal Code (Canada).

If not, would the department suggest that this area be acquired by the county of Simcoe to be developed under The Parks Assistance Act?

Answer by the Minister of Lands and Forests:

The Department of Lands and Forests now owns approximately 300 acres on Little Lake in Vespra township. This land was obtained from The Department of Highways as surplus to their needs and is one of a number of park reserves for possible future development.

Bill No. 4, An Act to amend The Probation Act.

Bill No. 5, An Act to amend The Mortgages Act.

On Bill No. 6, An Act to amend The Used Car Dealers Act, 1964:

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I may make a few brief comments here? It conceivably could be done on the hon. Attorney General's (Mr. Wishart's) estimates when all pieces of legislation do not come up.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wishes this could be held if he wants the hon. Attorney General to hear his remarks.

Mr. MacDonald: No, I would just like to put it on the record and I think the hon. Attorney General can see it later or perhaps, even more important, his registrar of used car dealers.

In the past few weeks there has emerged considerable publicity on particular techniques which, I think, if the administrators of this used car legislation do not face up to, that legislation is not going to be effective. I want to suggest three points to which the government should give some consideration to or, more particularly, the immediate administrators of the Act.

The first one is this problem of private sales—to overcome the kind of private sale approach that we have had in the so-called “Mr. Smith” case that Ron Haggart had in one of his columns. It seems to me that all used car dealers should have to display, prominently outside their establishment, their used car dealer licence number—and the actual size of the sign should be set out in the regulation so that it would make it easier for municipalities to enforce local zoning by-laws.

The importance of this may escape some hon. members if they are not aware of the fact that what is happening is that a used car dealer will be using his home, and often his home will be in one of the better class, higher property valued areas of the city. If he has to put his used car dealer sign and number outside the house, if this is what is being done, if this is the only way of coping with it, at least the public are going to be alerted to what is happening. Because, in some instances—this has now been solidly documented—so-called private sales were being made by a used car dealer.

Second, to avoid the catchy kind of sales contract used by Ted Williamson and others, there could be either a uniform conditional sales contract to be used by all dealers, or each contract could be approved by the registrar. Some of these “operators,” if I may use the term, have contracts which do permit the hoodwinking of the public; and it seems to me a uniform contract could be okayed by the registrar and would eliminate the possibility of that kind of abuse.

Finally, I think it would be useful for the registrar to give some consideration to the proposal—which has been made in a number of quarters—of each car having a logbook. I recognize that this is not foolproof—in fact, nothing is foolproof if you are trying to cope with some of these people—but I think it is still the best way for each prospective buyer to know what the circumstances are with regard to a certain car. If there was a loophole in that the logbook could be lost, then no sale can be transacted until a check has been made at a central agency available at The Department of Transport.

What happens with some of these cars is that the exact nature of the car becomes lost, or is hidden by three or four rapid sales. It may have been a taxi; it goes to one used car dealer, or to a junk lot, and so on along the way, so that it is impossible to trace it—unless you have a logbook which will record all the sales that have taken place. In that way the prospective buyer will be alerted to the possibility that he is getting a taxi with a pretty sorry past, instead of a car which has really been driven only by some old maid who only took it out on Sunday for the last five or ten years.

I put these three proposals forward, Mr. Speaker, in the hope that they may appear to be worthy ones on the part of the registrar.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. Minister might tell us what the present time limit is on applications for assistance in centennial commemorations?

Hon. J. W. Spooner (Minister of Municipal Affairs): I think it is August 1, 1965, for applications.

Mr. Nixon: Are you going to extend this time for the Indians, since they have just now been given the possibility of taking part in it?

Hon. Mr. Spooner: If there are any Indians interested, we will treat them justly and fairly; and if it is necessary to extend the time, we can do that at the next session. I would not worry about it.

Mr. Nixon: You have not worried about them very much, as a matter of fact. It has been brought to the attention of the government several times that they were not permitted to take part in centennial celebrations; and it was not until this bill was introduced a few weeks ago that the government recognized this. I certainly hope that it will be extended especially for them, and I am worrying about them.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: To my knowledge, Mr. Chairman, we have had no applications, no inquiries, from any Indian bands or councils or Indian reservations. It is just in the hope that there might be some; and if it happens that they are not filed on time by the date we have already extended once—we extend it by regulations—we will do it again. I want to assure the hon. member and the House that if there are any Indian bands interested in preparing for a centennial project, they will be given every consideration, like everyone else.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, it might very well be that the reason the hon. Minister has received no applications is that, by law, they were not eligible for the money.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I would doubt that very much, Mr. Chairman.

THE MUNICIPAL FRANCHISE EXTENSION ACT

House in committee on Bill No. 63, An Act to amend The Municipal Franchise Extension Act.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, on section 1—I suppose really it is section 2—is that the one where the hon. Minister intends that it should be made clear that persons over 21, who are allowed to vote in municipal elections by reason of the extension of the franchise, cannot vote on money bylaws? It seems to me this section is a strange anomaly—to have it put in one of our statutes at this present time.

First of all, the opinion in the province seems to be that anyone over 21 who lives in a municipality should be allowed to vote. This is one of the recommendations of the select committee.

Secondly, the validity of keeping a distinction between voting on money bylaws and voting on other matters seems to be enshrined really in history, going back well over 100 years, and has very little purpose at all today.

Finally, the most ludicrous thing about the whole principle involved in this section 2 is that these people, who will not be allowed to vote on money bylaws, can run for the council, can be elected to the council, can sit on the council, spend all the money—but they cannot vote on the money bylaw which is going to spend it.

If there is anything more foolish in our statutes than this sort of an idea, I do not know what it is. Here is a person who can be the head of a municipality, if he can get enough people to vote for him, and he can direct all of the affairs of that municipality, and he can bring before the municipality any sort of bylaw that can be brought before any municipal council, and he can vote on it at council. But, if it is a type of money bylaw which requires a public vote and the matter is put on the ballot, he cannot vote. What sense does that possibly make?

In addition to that, all sorts of expenditures can be made by municipal councils, far more important than matters that have to be voted on, in which this same person who cannot vote on a money bylaw can vote and lead his particular council in favouring.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: But the hon. member is not giving us the facts.

Mr. Singer: I will be through in just a minute and then the hon. Minister can get into it.

Surely to goodness, in this day and age, one would think that the hon. Minister would be anxious to be reasonably consistent in his approach to matters of municipal affairs; and surely, when this sort of an amendment is brought forward to clarify and protect something that is really no protection at all—it is rather a petty niggling—the hon. Minister would go in the other direction, would go in the direction that is indicated by the report of the select committee? For all these reasons I cannot understand why the hon. Minister brings in this section at this time.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Well, Mr. Chairman, in answer to the hon. member's question and his incorrect statement, I think that he is confusing a voter who, because of ownership of land or tenancy of land, is entitled to a vote and entitled to sit on a municipal council, as against the person who obtains a vote in a municipal election by municipal bylaw under The Municipal Franchise Extension Act. There are two different breeds, and the hon. member knows that very well; he knows it much better than I do.

Mr. Singer: But the same breed can be elected.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Sit down now. I tried to give the hon. member some information and he would not listen, so he should be quiet.

Now, insofar as section 2 of this bill is concerned, you must remember that the voter who votes on a money bylaw is placing a mortgage on his property. I do not think that you or anyone else would want to have a roomer, who obtains a vote under The Municipal Franchise Extension Act, have the right to vote to place, not a first mortgage but a mortgage that takes precedence over a first mortgage, on your property. That is why we want this amendment in the Act.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, the hon. Minister, I am afraid, is awfully confused this morning.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: I am not at all.

Mr. Singer: But the same person can be elected to council.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. Singer: It certainly has, it is the very essence of the whole argument. This person can be elected to council, he can be the head of the council, he can have all the authority that the head of the council can have; and the hon. Minister says you would not want him to vote about something that would put a mortgage on your property. As head of the council or as a member of council he can levy any tax rate that he wants or be a part of levying any tax rate that he wants. And that can be as big a mortgage as you can possibly imagine. So where is the consistency? There is no consistency at all.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: It is all consistent.

Mr. Singer: You are setting up the rather fantastic situation that the mayor, say, of the largest city in the province, the mayor of the city of Toronto, could qualify to run for mayor under The Municipal Franchise Extension Act and be elected mayor and yet could not vote on a money bylaw.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: May I make one comment on this and point out the real fallacy of the argument? There could only be one mayor of Toronto and if this ever happened you would have one individual mayor and he would only have one vote; but you could have 50,000 of these people in the city receive the franchise under this Act and they would then be voting too. So it really is not a very apt, fair nor logical comparison.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, in reply to what the hon. Prime Minister says, surely anyone would recognize that the mayor of a large municipality could have just a little more influence in getting matters before the public than the average voter who might be worried about the mortgage. The mayor would have a substantial amount to say about how high the tax levy is going to be.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, he would be only one out of the whole group of enfranchised voters.

Mr. Singer: That is right, but he is the leader of the municipality and he could well be a second-rate citizen so far as voting on money bylaws is concerned. If this makes sense to this government, well it doesn't to me.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Mr. Chairman, again the hon. member is confusing two pieces of legislation on the statute books. With very great respect may I suggest to you that a person who is entitled to a vote under The Municipal Franchise Extension Act is not entitled to seek a seat on council. Now, that is the very point and the hon. member is insisting on confusing these two things.

Mr. Singer: With great respect, I do not think the hon. Minister is right.

Hon. Mr. Spooner: Now, if I may be permitted, Mr. Chairman — Mr. Alcombrack, would you mind giving me the Act and we will send it over to the hon. member.

Mr. Singer: Thank you.

On vote 1902:

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, under vote 1902, as I peruse the annual report of the department and the Part 2 Training Schools, I notice some quite interesting bits of information.

On page 33 under "Mentality of Pupils Committed or Admitted," were you to take their mentality and follow through with a Bell curve you would find you would have a practically perfect Bell curve with an IQ of the average person committed in the high 80s or low 90s. Then when you take this and turn to page 34 and find, "Factors Contributing to Delinquency of those Committed or Admitted" on the first page, we can assume that the average person who is committed is the normal boy or girl. Then when we find the reasons for the delinquency, we find that practically 90 per cent of those who are in the institutions are there as a result of lack of parental control, either lack of parental control or some difficulties with the parents. It could be, as listed in here, alcoholic parents, mentally defective parents, or either the father or the mother dead.

From these statistics, one can only assume that we may be putting the wrong people in the institutions.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Mr. Chairman, is the hon. member leading up to the point that belongs in this role of rehabilitation?

Mr. Newman: Yes, I am leading up to the rehabilitating. More time should be spent looking into the home conditions of these individuals that happen to be institutionalized and something done with the parents so that when a youngster is eventually released from the institution he comes back into home conditions that are a little more ideal and a little better and he does not return to the institution later on.

Now, does the department do any type of work with these parents or the family of the youngster that is institutionalized?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate that my opening speech was somewhat long, but I did point out there that one of the duties of a rehabilitation officer was to prepare the home, where it was possible to do so, while the youngster was still in the training school. The hon. member, I am sure, will appreciate that there are some homes which, as a matter of fact, are not really homes. Very little can be done, but they make every effort. They visit the home on numerous occasions to prepare the family for the return of the child.

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton): Mr. Chairman, first of all I would like to congratulate the hon. Minister and the department on the hon. Minister's report this year, both parts of it. It as been considerably brightened up and, more important, it contains some very good information.

I note for example, Mr. Chairman, that page 7 in part 1 of the report—reconvictions over a five-year period—deals with the Brampton training centre. These figures are set out quite clearly. The report states that 66 per cent of those released from that particular training centre have no further convictions. I am not saying, Mr. Chairman, that this is an ideal figure, but it shows progress.

My point is that these young people, for the most part, are being rehabilitated and are obtaining some benefit from the programmes in our training schools. It would indicate that most of them become peaceful, law-abiding citizens and further, Mr. Chairman, that second offenders are not necessarily picking up unfortunate bad habits in our institutions, as illustrated by the graph on page 11 of this report.

I note that out of 556 men admitted to Guelph reformatory as second offenders, only 15 had been there before. This, Mr. Chairman, I think helps to correct the impression that young first offenders are being incarcerated in the company of older, hardened criminals. Also, it again shows some effectiveness of the programme carried out at our correctional institutions.

Pages 8 and 9 refer to drug addiction and alcoholics. I read that 37 per cent of those who have been to the Brown memorial clinic once have been free from drugs for three years and of those who have been to the clinic twice, 23 per cent are drug-free after three years.

Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I do not know if these figures are commendable or not. However, they are certainly better than I had been led to believe. I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. Minister could give me some idea as to the psychiatric care and facilities in our reform institutions? I am particularly interested in knowing whether or not each institution has a psychiatrist or a psychologist on staff or in the area, who regularly serves the institution.

I wonder particularly, Mr. Chairman, if there are other procedures whereby there is a file on each inmate, his progress, his attitudes, what training he might need while in the institution and information on what he hopes to do when released.

Possibly the hon. Minister's answer could give us some idea as to what professional personnel are on staff regularly, or from time to time, who are trained in assessing the mental and emotional problems of the young inmates.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, first I would like to thank the hon. member for his kind comments insofar as they relate to the department and myself. The answer to the question about whether we have a file on each inmate with all the information that has been accumulated on him is, of course, yes. In all our institutions there is a rather extensive file with all the social history that we have been able to obtain, with medical history and all that sort of information. Regarding the specific question about the psychiatrists, we have 15 working for the department. Each of them works on a part-time basis, attending according to the time they have available or by demand by a particular institution. In other words, the services are reasonably flexible.

In the training school system, we have psychiatric services available at all of them. At Bowmanville we have a psychiatrist working four and a half days per week and, on occasion, we have called in an additional psychiatrist for a particular case.

This particular psychiatrist, Dr. Butler, also works two half days per week at Cobourg.

At Simcoe, Dr. Downe works two half days per week.

At Port Bolster, Dr. Boothroyd works one day per month and may see girls in his office on other occasions.

At Lindsay, the psychiatrist sees girls on appointment in his office and is on special call.

At Galt, of course, we have the reception diagnostic centre where Dr. Wright provides psychiatric services.

At the training school in Guelph, Dr. MacKinnon's services are available one day per week.

At Galt, Dr. John Hall is with the school one day per week and Dr. Richardson is there on a half-time basis.

In our adult institutions our main psychiatric services are centred on the neuro-psychiatric clinic in Guelph and at the addiction clinic in Mimico.

In all adult institutions other than Millbrook and Mercer reformatory, they are working in conjunction with the position in the same way as is done in the community. The doctor examines a man either at the man's request or at the request of the staff and, when necessary, recommends transfer to the neuro-psychiatric clinic in Guelph. In the adult field this is by far the most appropriate method. The system was devised on the advice of psychiatrists and we find it works out extremely well.

If the hon. member would like it, I could go into greater detail. I could go into all of the institutions—but generally this is the way the psychiatric services are made available. Does the hon. member feel this answers his question?

Mr. Kerr: Yes. In other words, Mr. Chairman, there is a regular attendance; there is a psychiatrist, either in the area or on staff, who regularly attends these institutions. Is that correct?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Insofar as you could consider a psychiatrist who comes in two half days a week, or one full day a week, he is on staff. This is the way we handle the psychiatric services. As a matter of fact, it is the only way we can obtain these kind of services; we expand them as much as is possible when they are available.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): Mr. Chairman, that was the question under the particular vote. You did not expect the hon. member who was also the chairman of the committee on commissions, to do anything else but congratulate you. You said in your answer to the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville that you prepared the family for the return of the young boy or girl after they returned from your training schools. It is very unfortunate, Mr. Minister, that there are no agencies of the government to prepare the family long before the youngster ever got to the training school.

I notice this foreword to part 2 of your annual report, in which you say:

It is our hope that the training we are able to give them, and the care and support we provide after they leave our schools, will help them to appreciate that somebody does care and will teach them the value of care, guidance and love when they in turn raise their own families.

That is a very nice foreword, Mr. Chairman, but it is unfortunate that that care and love is not provided. We have not enough social workers and counselling; because, as you read the report, you will find that most of the youngsters are there generally because of home conditions—broken homes, divorce, alcoholism of one or other of the parents. If there were far more social workers in our cities, then probably they would get the care at home and not get the care and love that the hon. Minister provides for them in these training schools.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, all I can say is that I agree wholeheartedly with the words of the hon. member. We, of course, realize that a training school is no substitute for a home. In fact, if most of these youngsters had a decent home, they would not be in training schools. How we attack this is a very difficult problem.

I was privileged to be a delegate to the Governor General's conference on the family—this is precisely the subject which was attacked—and it is hoped that from that conference will develop some sort of plan of campaign to get at the source of most of the problems, not just in our juvenile institutions but in the adult institutions as well. When one reads the files of even the most hardened criminal, one generally finds it stems from his very early days with very poor home surroundings.

Mr. Troy: I am awfully glad that the hon. Minister has gone to this department from the liquor control board of Ontario, because in that he saw the problems.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: So am I.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, under this vote the Mercer institution is mentioned. I do not want to get in again to the various accusations and counter-accusations but I would like to know if the hon. Minister would outline to us what has been changed in the administration of Mercer since the visit of the grand jury.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I wonder, Mr. Chairman, whether this would not be just as well brought up in the next vote, under the particular institution.

Mr. Singer: Are we not on 1902?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Yes, this is parole and rehabilitation. In 1903 you would have the particular institutions. I would suggest the hon. member keep his question for that. I will have the information more readily available.

Mr. Singer: Oh, yes, I am sorry.

Mr. Troy: Just another reference in this vote, Mr. Chairman, to the hon. Minister. When you notice the amount, $605,000, is to be voted for this particular branch of your estimates—there are salaries, $462,000, and travelling expenses, $100,000—it seems to me that the amount of $30,000 for rehabilitation assistance is not very much. When you compare the travelling expenses and salaries, it is very small. With your research and your knowledge of the department, and in this particular service, do you really think that is enough?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: To which figure is the hon. member referring?

Mr. Troy: $30,000 for rehabilitation services.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member asked about the $30,000 rehabilitation assistance. This is actually money that is used for cash outlays for releases. In other words, money is required to buy them some tools and money is required to give them some extra in their pocket for accommodation, for something special of that nature. That is what that money is for.

Mr. Troy: Thank you very much; you would not understand that by just looking at the item.

Mr. Newman: Mr. Chairman, how much is actually spent then on rehabilitation assistance to families? Is it a substantial amount?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That is the figure—$30,000. That is for direct assistance. Would the hon. member like me to explain how this is done?

Mr. Newman: No, I simply wanted to relate that figure to the total amount spent for parole and rehabilitation services, if that is the purpose.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Most of the money, the vast portion of the money of course, is spent for services, just as it is called, not for direct cash outlay. In other words, we need all of this staff to counsel, assist and supervise paroling. This is for staff and the services associated with it. But the $30,000 is for cash outlay for the releasee. In other words, as I pointed out earlier, if a releasee who is properly motivated, and appears to be the sort of person that is willing to accept help, seems to be the sort of person who can use it, he is helped—sometimes with cash, sometimes we pay his accommodation, his rent for a while, other times tools may be bought for him, because of the fact he may need them to get a job—this sort of thing. That is what the $30,000 is for.

Mr. A. E. Thompson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister to clarify, if he could, certain impressions one has in connection with parole service. As I recall, in his last estimates he, and I think very rightly so, gave a great deal of emphasis in connection with parole; because, after all, you can have a prisoner who fits in in every way within an institution but the real test is what he is going to do when he gets out in society again. I think that you must place a particular emphasis on parole services. It is my impression that parole may be somewhat patchy around the province, that you rely to an extent on both voluntary agencies—you even may rely on police stations for the reporting when they get out—to keep an eye on them. I would like to know sir, have you got a systematic parole service in every community throughout the province? Who are helping the people and are these qualified parole people?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We have. The supervision is done 95 per cent by our own staff right across this province and five per cent by private agencies.

Mr. Thompson: How many parole officers have you got?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Fifty-nine.

Mr. Thompson: Fifty nine. What case load have they got?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The average is 45.

Mr. Thompson: There must be quite a number of people released who do not have any parole service.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: If the hon. member is asking me whether we are satisfied with this case load, the answer is no. We would like to have a smaller case load, but again this is a matter of getting sufficient and qualified staff for it. We are taking on additional staff and as they become available we will take on still further, because we want to reduce this case load. Of course, the smaller the case load, the better job they are going to be able to do.

Mr. Thompson: I agree with you on the smaller case load. I am not a mathematician, but I am trying to figure out how many are actually getting probation or parole services. You say you have a case load of 45; and how many parole officers do you have?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Fifty-nine.

Mr. Thompson: I cannot add that up in my head, but I would suggest there must be a large number of people who leave institutions and are not covered by any kind of parole services. You are saying that 95 per cent are handled by you.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I can understand the hon. member not thinking about this, because most people forget about it from time to time. You must remember that the only people we have any control of from the standpoint of parole, and the only people we are allowed to parole by law, are those who are on indefinite sentences, so there are many who come out of our institutions who are never eligible for Ontario board of parole, so we cannot supervise them. But if you will multiply 45 by 59, I think you will come to the figure of about 2,655. I think you will find that works out pretty well to the figures in the table on page 29.

I should also point out, Mr. Chairman, that they must be doing a fairly good job, because of the success ratio on parole. The hon. member will note that the number of paroles which were effected were 894, and the number successfully completed were just over 77 per cent; there were six per cent still incompleated as of the date this was made up. So the rate of success would be around 80 per cent, I imagine. They must be getting fairly good supervision.

Mr. Thompson: Is this adult parole we are talking about?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: This is adult parole. You will find it on page 29.

Mr. Thompson: Could I ask you, in regard to your training institutions, if these boys and girls, when they leave, would still be under supervision? And how many—do you have a separate division of parole officers for them?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: It is the same group of rehab. officers, except that in the larger areas, like Metro Toronto, for example, there is a sufficient number of cases to divide them up between a juvenile division and an adult division.

By and large, across the province, the same people are doing the rehabilitation work. I think the hon. member would appreciate that, even if it were desirable—and we are not too sure about that—to have different rehab. officers for the juveniles than we have for the adults across Ontario, it would be impractical—to have, for example, a rehab. officer going out of a training school to visit some youngster, say 100 miles from the training school, and an adult rehab. officer doing the same thing, moving 100 miles, when the same person could really look after both of them.

Mr. Thompson: I think that the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville has already raised the question in connection with rehabilitation, but I feel it is tied in with parole as well. I think probably the hon. Minister would agree with me that in many cases where children are in institutions, if you want to get at the root cause, you can look to the parents. I have often felt that sometimes a child is in there, taking the treatment and the punishment, when we should be doing something with respect to the parents. I think you have agreed with me on this; I know others have, but we never do anything about the parents. I realize that with The Juvenile Delinquency Act there are limitations about what we can do with parents. There is a set fine and so on, not used very much, with respect to parents.

But I know in some jurisdictions that where a child has come before a court and is placed within an institution, it is mandatory, to an extent, for the parents to come together anonymously for group experience on family life. I wondered if you have ever thought of this—while the child is being helped—that you go to the root problem, which is the parents, and arrange that the parents themselves have to take some kind of group family life approach?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Again, Mr. Chairman, I do not know how I can answer that any differently than I answered the hon. member for Nipissing. It is a difficult problem that has been with us for a long time. I think you will appreciate that you would require a Solomon to solve this.

We do our best. Of course, the juvenile court judge does his best to bring the family into the court, but by and large, when one reads the files, one comes to the conclusion in many instances that you are not getting too much sympathy from the parents. Many of the parents who will treat the children the way they have, and who will neglect the children the way they have, are really beyond reasoning. There are, of course, many families to whom reasoning can be of some assistance; we have found this to be the case.

How you move into the family circle is, I repeat, a problem that was discussed at the conference on the family. All people in this field—social workers, psychiatrists, everyone—came to the conclusion that a lot of the work you are doing is fairly useless because you are not getting at the family source. We appreciate this.

But appreciating the problem, and being able to do something about it is another thing. All I can say is that we hope, again from this family conference and the studies now going on on this problem, we will be able to attack it a little closer at the source. We are doing the best we can with the knowledge we have and the facilities available.

Mr. Thompson: I appreciate the hon. Minister's insight into this. I would make this suggestion, realizing all the implications attached to it, where there is a sacred aspect to a family. What I would suggest is that if you, for example, were to let magistrates know in various centres around Ontario that when children come up to be sent to one of your institutions for treatment, if the magistrate is so considerate that he would suggest—I do not know if it is in his legal power to order the parents—that they should have to meet at a YMCA or a Catholic church or somewhere, to meet with someone whom you would make available. If you would suggest that these facilities would be there, I think this would be a worthwhile experiment.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We are working with the magistrates. We have a very good relationship with them. Whether the magistrate has this authority or not I would not be in a position to say. Off the cuff, I would say that he usually takes what authority he feels is necessary in dealing with a family, except if he is dealing with a recalcitrant parent or parents who do not care. With those people, it is beyond anyone's imagination. But the hon. member's suggestion is a good one; to try and perhaps expand this and put a more intensified campaign on with the magistrates when we meet with them. We are meeting regularly now with the magistrates. I think the hon. member will recall in my remarks prior to the estimates, that I did point out that we have finally arranged for regular visits to our institutions by the magistrates. There is a great deal more co-operation between the magistrates and our department than there has been in the past. And I think we are finally getting to the stage where we begin to understand each other's problems which, in the final analysis, will help the youngster.

Mr. Troy: In looking at the estimates, Mr. Chairman, in 1902 we have a total asked for of $605,000. Then you look at your vote 1903 and you find in salaries alone you have practically $10,500,000. About the salaries in your institutions; compare that amount with the request in vote 1902 and you find it is about five per cent. Do you think, sir, that this is adequate, particularly when we find in your institutions that many of them that are there are former offenders? In fact, I understand that 3,709 out of a total of 12,353 offenders had a record of more than three previous offences. Does the hon. Minister not think that it would be far better and much more valuable to spend more money on the rehabilitation service with the possibility of reducing the recidivism? In the rehabilitation services, it seems to me it would be money well spent. In one case, I think the way it is being spent now is penny-wise and pound-foolish. About 40 per cent of the inmates, I understand, are either second or third offenders, and there are some with more than three. It seems to me that it would be advisable to spend more money on this particular service because the hon. Minister seems to have an appreciation of the value of this rehabilitation service. You could reduce the expenses of operating your institutions; you could possibly keep them out, because I think it is much more expensive to keep them in an institution than doing what you can in the rehabilitation service.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should point out to the hon. member that he is comparing the estimate for just the parole and rehabilitation service, with the total salaries of all of the institutions, which makes it, of course, five per cent. But, of course, if he takes the total salaries for the training schools he will find—this is just a rough figure, I am just going down each institution—that the figures for salaries for the training schools run into well over $2 million. So he has compared all the salaries for the whole department, with the $605,000 which is allotted just for the parole and rehabilitation service.

Mr. Newman: Some of these rehabilitation officers then are under salary—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Oh, yes, they would be.

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, you mean that they are under the salaries of 1903, too?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: No. Perhaps I have not made myself clear. The hon. member pointed out that it appeared that we were spending for the youngsters about $605,000. Is that right?

Mr. Troy: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: And that $605,000 is not just for juvenile schools, this is the total for the parole and rehabilitation service only. The hon. member compared that with $10 million for salaries, which we show for all of our institutions. Well, of course, the $10 million salaries includes all the institutions as well as the training schools.

Mr. Troy: Oh, I am not referring only to training schools.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: You are suggesting that the five per cent we are spending is, perhaps, too little for rehabilitation? We should remember that within all of these institutions we are spending hundreds of thousands of dollars—I suppose it would run into millions—out of the $20 million roughly of the estimates for people who are in the rehabilitation service. For instance, social workers, psychiatrists, psychologists and counsellors within the institutions, who do not show in this particular vote. So there would be millions spent within all of the institutions for rehabilitation, which does not show in this vote.

Mr. Troy: It makes it rather difficult, then, for someone to criticize your department when you label here “rehabilitation services” and then you say other departments are doing all kinds of it. It would seem better if we knew just how much you are spending on rehabilitation, then we would not criticize and say you are not spending adequate funds.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I appreciate this, but how else could you do it? Your parole service consists of those officials, those civil servants who are doing the direct rehabilitation of people coming out of the institutions and preparing a place for them, and that sort of thing. The others are all within the institutions. It would be a very difficult thing. As a matter of fact, everybody in an institution is supposed to be involved in rehabilitation work, even the custodial officers. The hon. member will recall in my opening remarks that I stated that we were building up staff training for every custodial officer, as well as others, because we appreciate that he is the person who can do a great deal of rehabilitation work. So it would be very difficult to sort this out from the standpoint of moneys spent. The custodial officer, for example, is doing custodial work as well as rehabilitation work. How would you divide his salary to show it this way? It would be very difficult.

Mr. Troy: All right. Are you proud of the record that with all this rehabilitation in the institutions, there are almost 4,000 out of 12,000 who have been there a number of times? There must be—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, I am proud of the work that is being done in the institution. If the hon. member would ask the question in a different way—"if I am satisfied"—I would say no. Nobody in our institutions is satisfied. Incidentally, I think it would be a good thing to point out at this time that the figures can be misleading. This is why we are trying to develop a good statistical service, because when we quote figures like 12,000 and 20,000, and when you go into the figures as to how many people have been committed all over the province, you run into some 55,000-odd people. Many have been in and out half a dozen times a year, in the adult institutions particularly, and they do not show. You would think from this that these are different people, that there have been 55,000 people. The figure that the hon. member has used, 12,000 might give the impression that 12,000 different people have been in the institutions. This is not so. Many of them repeat within a year—for example, the chronic type of offender. I was at the jail out in Windsor and they pointed out to me a man who, I think the governor told me, had been in there 38 times in a year. That person would show on the record here; it would show 38 commitals and 38 convictions, so the figures really do not give a true picture. This is, incidentally, where we may get a distorted picture of the number of people who are put in our institutions as against another jurisdiction which keeps its statistics in a different way. This is what we are trying to arrive at, so that we will get a better picture. Surely the hon. members will agree that with the new report we are trying to give them a clearer picture. Next year you will find more improvements.

Mr. Troy: My suggestion to the hon. Minister is that he ask the questions of the IBM machine and we will probably get the right answers.

Mr. D. A. Paterson (Essex South): Mr. Chairman, one short question regarding rehabilitation as it relates to the training schools and industrial farms. We in Essex and Kent counties are not too familiar with these operations. I have only been to one such institution. Are the inmates being trained at all in agriculture and, if so, are they allowed to work out part of their rehabilitation on individual farms?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: At most of our institutions we do. The hon. member knows that on the industrial farms they are doing farming work. If he is talking about a specific course in training, I suppose that just by being there you learn a lot about farming. Perhaps you might recall that in my opening remarks I said that we were planning on opening a special farm-training centre so that we can train some of these men who do not seem to be suited for anything else, who do not have the ability to absorb academic training, who appear to have the willingness to work; if we find some of them that way, we will train them for farm work and hope to place them on farms.

In answer to the other question: None of our people are allowed to go out, while they are in our charge, and do farming work for others at cost. From our training schools, we do put youngsters out on placement; sometimes they go into a home as mothers' helpers and they get paid, but of course this is their own money; and they go out to farms, but this, in effect, is on parole. We do have some training at Bowmanville, we have Cold Springs camp there, and we are moving further into this field, but the hon. member will also appreciate that you have to select people carefully for this, because you have to be able to trust them in this open setting.

Mr. Paterson: I do realize the psychological and social problems of the inmates and the persons with whom they are going to be placed, but I just wondered if the hon. Minister would consider placing this new institution in Essex or Kent county. We are facing a dire farm labour shortage this year, and if persons could be screened that could be placed in this area I am sure they would be very welcome and accepted by the people of the area.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, we would be very glad to consider that when we are establishing this training farm.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, during the Throne debate I put forward the suggestion that this department could well be bulked with The Attorney General's Department, because many of the functions are more closely akin to functions that that office is carrying on; and there would be a continuity of control and operation from the time someone comes into trouble with the law until the time they are sent back into society.

Under this vote we have a parole service which this department supplies; and this service is, as I understand it, supplied to those people under indefinite sentences who are released after the parole board determines they should be released. They are released on that condition and the parole officers handle them. Then, if you turn just briefly to The Attorney General's Department, we have a probation service; and in that vote the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) will be requesting $1,714,000. The hon. Minister of Reform Institutions is asking for $605,000.

While the names are different and the significance, I suppose, is somewhat different, the people who are served by probation services are people who come into difficulty with the law and who are put on probation. In other words, the difference between parole and probation is that the people on parole have been in an institution and are let out, and the people on probation, perhaps with the same sort of problems, have never been in an institution but are let go on generally the same type of understanding. They will report, and they are given counselling, and there are certain restrictions to which they are subjected.

By and large, these functions of these two services are substantially the same. There is a difference in definition but, by and large, the functions are substantially the same. We have two branches of government going off and doing the same function in different ways under different control, and perhaps with different rules.

Then there is another vote in The Attorney General's Department dealing with magistrates, and juvenile and family courts; and while the whole of that vote, which is $1,125,000, is not devoted to rehabilitation work, a lot of that money will be spent within that vote on the same general sort of thing insofar as juveniles are concerned.

It would seem somewhat reasonable to me, Mr. Chairman, that when this government has, as it must be, the problem of dealing with people who are in trouble, and trying to rehabilitate them—I do not care whether you say they are being rehabilitated on parole or probation, or because they have come into problems with the juvenile and family court—then it would seem reasonable to me you should have one sort of central control doing all of this work. You should have a standard of qualifications so that the people who are equipped to do this work, the people who should be hired to do this work by the government, would all have the same qualifications whichever of these three branches they are serving in.

I would like to hear the hon. Minister's views on this, and his justification for the continuing separation of these responsibilities.

I would like to know, in addition, what training the parole officers have; what educational qualifications are required before they are taken on as parole officers; their salary range—he perhaps has said it, I did not catch the figure; the number of parole officers he has; and if he is aware—he may not be—whether these qualifications in the probation service are the same as for the people who work in magistrates' courts. I wonder how much real liaison there is and how much thinking or studying there has been done about unification in these various services.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, Mr. Chairman, regarding the general principle of the combination of parole and probation officers, the hon. member is probably familiar with the fact that this is a classical dialogue that goes on in many jurisdictions. Some jurisdictions, as a matter of fact, have combined them. There is, I find, some resistance in this country, and particularly in this province, on the part of some of the judiciary, for example, about combining them. This has been discussed and, as a matter of fact, the inter-departmental committee between the representatives of the Attorney General's department and our department have this on the agenda for further discussion. But it is a problem, because some people feel they should not be combined; some people feel that you are dealing with two types of people.

For example, there would be a resistance, it is claimed, on the part of those who are on probation and had never been in an institution to be considered in the same category, or be supervised by the same person who is supervising those who have serious criminal records. There is this problem. This is a discussion, as I say, with a great deal of merit; it has been suggested that they be combined but, as I say, there is a great deal of resistance as well. I would say that this is not, by any means, a closed book.

The other question which the hon. member has raised—I am told that these are questions which he put on the order paper. I recall now that they were. Would he prefer to wait for that, because we can get the information in greater detail? I know that he has asked so many questions that he has forgotten, but it is on the order paper; is it all right if we let it go until then?

Mr. Singer: That is all right. What about comparative levels between salaries to parole officers and to probation officers? Are they the same?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Probation officers' salaries are higher.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I think from this that I should suggest to the hon. Minister that we can do a great deal more in the parole area. From his report he has emphasized that it is one of the most important aspects of this whole approach in rehabilitating people. I want to emphasize again that it does not really amount to very much if you have some convict who fits in well and has an exemplary manner within the institution. The real test of success is when he is back again in society. I think that the suggestion of my hon. friend is a very good one and I appreciate that he is studying this because I am going to charge that he has a patchwork approach with respect to parole throughout the province.

I notice in the hon. Minister's report—he is very frank and honest in this report and I congratulate him on that—that there are only five outside officers around the province. This means that there must be many areas where people, when they leave an institution, do not have any parole supervisor.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I think that the hon. member should be advised—I do not know whether it is in the report—that there is a parole officer in every institution throughout the whole of the province.

Mr. Thompson: But the point I am emphasizing is that I am not focusing on the institutions, I am focusing on the rehabilitation of the man when he gets out and goes back to a city. I think this is really where it must be built up.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The parole officer works out of the institution. There is one located, in addition to these five centres, in each institution and he works out of that institution. If the hon. member is suggesting that we should have more than one in each institution, as well as the balance of the staff we have, we agree with him. We would like to have more, and are intending to do so, but the province is covered insofar as covering the geography and the people in those areas is concerned. Because, in addition to the main office staff and the five districts, there is one in every institution.

Mr. Thompson: I am suggesting—and I think that we are in agreement on this—that a parole office should be located, for example, in Toronto; a parole office in Sudbury or Ottawa; and so on. I notice that they are located in Toronto, Hamilton, London, Ottawa and Port Arthur; but the responsibility of this parole office, and the rehabilitation officer in it, is to do the job of keeping a check on the man after he has left the institution.

I can see the rehabilitation officer in the institution helping to amass the facts for the parole board and helping to find out about the parole, and I would hope that this man would be going from the staff of the institution and at least making several visits to the men's homes.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That is his job.

Mr. Thompson: I think he must have a tremendous case load.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Where the case load is larger he would get assistance from the balance of the staff; but there is one located in every institution, as well as the general staff which deals with the home problems as well. The hon. member should remember that he alone does not do this counselling inside—there are others who do it as well. There is a chaplain, and a social worker, and other who are counselling at all times.

We do not think that it is patchwork. We say that it is not as adequate as we would like it to be, and I do not suppose that it ever will be as adequate as we would like it to be. Again, it is a matter of a staff-to-inmate ratio; we like to have that as large as possible.

Mr. Thompson: To bring this out, could I ask the hon. Minister if there are children who leave institutions on indeterminate sentences—do some parolees who leave these institutions report to a police officer because there is no parole officer?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am told that there are adult parolees who do; children, of course, do not.

Mr. Thompson: This is what I say.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: There are some areas—and I found this out when I was in my childhood—in which the police officer is a good man for the person to be paroled to; there may be a particular area where there is respect for a particular police officer, where there is a good relationship and it works out very well. Even if there were more rehabilitation officers in some of these areas, you would still co-operate with particular policemen because of their relationship with the community.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, the question to which the hon. Minister was referring was question number 8, I think.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Excuse me—

Mr. Singer: I will be very brief.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: All right.

Mr. Singer: There is a question the hon. member for Yorkview (Mr. Young) asked. Some of the things were the sort of questions I was directing to the hon. Minister earlier. There are a number of questions, a number of expansions on his questions perhaps, which I propose to put to the hon. Minister when his estimates are called again; so, as far as I am concerned, there should be more information. Perhaps the hon. Minister will have time between now and when we come back to—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: On this vote?

Mr. Singer: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Why does the hon. member not ask them and I will get them ready for him?

Mr. Singer: All right. Fine.

I want to know the qualifications they have to have before you hire them. The hon. member for Yorkview says: "What are the academic and experience qualifications of each one on staff?"—and I want to know what the standards are, and what training they have had. I would like to know what the salary levels are, and I would like to know what the turnover has been in the last 12 months.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves that the committee rise and report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report progress and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Monday we will continue with the estimates of this department and clear the estimates of The Department of Labour. Following that, we will deal with The Department of Energy and Resources Management, and following that one, with The Department of Economics and Development. I had The Department of Highways in there, but it has been moved.

Mr. Speaker, The Department of Energy and Resources Management will be next and The Department of Economics and Development will follow that.

I would point out that on Wednesday next, the House will not sit. There have been two legislative tours arranged: One to London to visit the children's psychiatric research institute, which is a new development in the field of mental health, and the London vocational centre, which is the most recent of our vocational centres. There is another tour going to Douglas Point, the nuclear power plant there, which is, I think a very interesting and very important development in the life of the province.

I would suggest to the hon. members that the House is not sitting in order that they make take advantage of these tours; and if we are going to lose a day here I hope that the day will be properly spent in these endeavours and will not be looked upon simply as a mid-week break.

Details of these trips will be circulated to all hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 1.05 o'clock p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

MONDAY, APRIL 5, 1965

The House met at 3 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are always pleased to have visitors to the Legislature and today we welcome as guests, in the west gallery, students from Our Lady of Sorrows separate school, Etobicoke; and in the east gallery, students from John Fisher public school, Toronto.

Petitions.

Presenting reports by committees.

Mr. D. Bales (York Mills), from the select committee appointed to consider Bill No. 80, An Act to amend The Legislative Assembly Act, presented the committee's report which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee begs to report the bill with a certain amendment.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Mr. D. A. Paterson (Essex South): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Economics and Development (Mr. Randall). The question was duly submitted:

Will the hon. Minister give any assurance that a study will be undertaken regarding daylight saving time and its effect on the economy as it relates to the St. Clair region of the province?

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Economics and Development): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the question is: "No." I would like to make a comment on this: I received a proposal from the St. Clair regional development association on March 10 asking us to carry out such a study. As hon. members know, we have received requests from many sources requesting the department to carry out specific economic studies, or requests that the department provide assistance. In this case, if the association wishes to carry out such a study, we are prepared to provide background information as we do for all requests. However, it is not physically possible to carry out these studies within a department or to provide staff for them.

Within the next few weeks, the department will be undertaking an economic survey of the St. Clair economic region; it will be published in a series of similar studies done for other economic regions in the province. I believe that this study will be more productive than the one they requested.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Highways (Mr. MacNaughton), notice of which has been formally submitted. What is the reason for The Department of Highways' delay in approving designation of streets as connecting links for the city of Hamilton's $500,000—

Mr. Speaker: Order!

I do not believe I received the member's question in my office. Has the Minister received any notice?

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Minister of Highways): Mr. Speaker, I have received no notice of this question, I regret to say.

Mr. Speaker: Apparently there has been a slip-up in the question getting to my office.

Mr. Newman: I will ask it tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The 51st order; House in committee of supply; Mr. W. E. Sandercock in the chair.

On vote 1902:

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Mr. Chairman, early the other afternoon when we adjourned, a number of questions were asked by the hon. member for Downsview (Mr. Singer) and I would like to deal with those. I promised to have the answers for him.

But even before dealing with them, I would like to make something clear. In reading the transcript, and the questioning that was put to me by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Trotter), I appreciate the fact that a misunderstanding could be arrived at from reading Hansard. The hon. member was referring to the fact that there were 24 accommodated at Ingleside and I kept insisting that there were 40. The misunderstanding arises from the fact that I generally think of the Brampton treatment centre as one unit—that is, the women's guidance centre, otherwise known as Ingleside, and the women's treatment centre.

The guidance centre, or Ingleside, does in fact accommodate 24 and the treatment centre accommodates 16, which makes 40; and while, technically, we were both correct, I would not want anyone to get the idea that I was denying something which, in fact, was so.

The hon. member for Downsview asked a number of questions. The first one is: What are the salaries of the rehabilitation staff? The "rehabilitation officer 1" salary scale is from $4,200 to $4,800. They remain as "rehabilitation officers 1" for two years, then write examinations set by the civil service commission and thereby qualify as "rehabilitation officers 2" with a salary range of $4,800 to $5,750. "Rehabilitation officer 3," that is supervisor, receives a salary of $5,500 to $6,600. "Rehabilitation officers 4," assistant directors, are $6,900 to $8,200.

A further question was: What was the turnover of rehabilitation staff during the past year? The answer to that, Mr. Chairman, is that on March 1, 1964 there were 49 rehabilitation officers on staff. Since that time nine new staff members have been recruited and the complement was depleted by one due to the death of Mr. B. A. Snow. It is interesting to note that, in the past 15 years, only two officers have resigned from the service and one of these has since returned.

The hon. member for Downsview also asked: What are the qualifications for the position of rehabilitation officer in the department? The answer is: Grade 13 education, with some experience in related work; or Grade 12 education, with two years of relevant experience in an institution involving considerable personal contact with inmates. Successful completion of the civil service examination is designed to select suitable staff based on their knowledge of and aptitude for rehabilitation work.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Is there an age limit?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Yes, I was about to come to that. The age limit is 25 to 45 years of age.

Third, the ability and co-operation to win the confidence of persons with anti-social attitudes; patience; tact; good judgment; willingness to travel and work on unscheduled hours when required; ability to drive a car; and personal suitability.

A further question from the hon. member for Downsview is: What training is given a rehabilitation officer by the department? The answer is: Many of the staff have been recruited from within the department and have attended our staff training course. Also, we encourage the officers to participate in university extension courses, seminars, and so on. Rehabilitation conferences are conducted regularly, the last one having finished at the end of March.

At the present time discussions are being held with the civil service commission and two other departments who have related services. Consideration is being given to the establishment of a training course which would be beneficial to staff from each of the departments.

I hope I have answered the hon. member's questions.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Chairman, I was wondering if the hon. Minister had the answer to my question regarding how many psychiatrists and psychologists had come in and out of the department in the last ten years.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I have that answer. I was hoping to deal with this when we started on the last vote. I thought that it belonged more properly under "institutions." If it is all right with the hon. member we will hold it.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, I have one further question regarding the grants to various institutions in rehabilitation. Would the hon. Minister tell me what standards are set up in regard to staff in institutions such as the Harold King farm, the John Howard society and other similar agencies?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, there are no standards in respect to staff requirements for them, as far as our department is concerned. The John Howard society, of course, does varying types of work and, as far as I know, the Harold King farm or any other halfway house is a private agency; and, as I mentioned the other day, they do not get grants from our department at all. The halfway houses get their grants from The Department of Public Welfare; the others, of course, get their grants from us, but they are private agencies.

Vote 1902 agreed to.

On vote 1903:

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, if I may, I will deal with the answers to the questions of the hon. member for Parkdale.

In reply to the hon. member's question of Friday last, regarding the turnover of professional staff, the following are the facts. In this we have considered all who were on staff on April 1, 1960, and those appointed since that date. The total number of psychiatrists is 23; the number of those 23 still on the staff is 13; of those ten who separated, seven resigned due to the pressure at their own practice, two to accept positions in the Ontario hospital and Homewood sanitarium, Guelph; and one was over-age. Psychologists: 39 were on staff as of April 1, 1960; the number still on staff is 20; of those 19 who separated, six resigned to accept another position, two transferred to The Department of Health, four because of a change of community, four because of home responsibilities, two returned to private practice, and one re-enlisted in the army.

Does that answer the hon. member's questions?

Mr. Trotter: I rather gathered from the transcript, and I know we discussed going back five or ten years—do I take it that the hon. Minister is only able to go back five years? Is that correct?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Actually, in the interests of getting the answers today rather than three or four days after my estimates had been completed, I thought it would be better to give the hon. member the answers we had for the five years—these are much easier to get—particularly when the questions were asked late last Friday. But if the hon. member wants us to go back further—

Mr. Trotter: I would be curious to see that figure because even this period of five years, Mr. Chairman, I think, points out the criticism which has been made of this department and its inability to hang on to trained staff. The department has lost 13 out of 23 psychiatrists, and 20 out of 39 psychologists; in fact it has lost slightly more than half, which is a tremendous turnover. I know there may be different reasons why these people left, but it is certainly an extremely high rate of turnover. There must be something wrong within the department—either the rate of pay or the atmosphere that seems to prevail.

Very seldom does any company, or probably any department in government, have the turnover that the hon. Minister has among his psychiatrists and psychologists. I know that some of the other government departments, including The Department of Health, have trouble getting trained help, but they certainly do not have the turnover that The Department of Reform Institutions has. I think it bears more looking into on the part of the Minister in charge.

Again the hon. Minister may say that it is hearsay, but I hear so much of why different psychologists and psychiatrists become fed up—because of the atmosphere, and the attitude of the head men within the department. Maybe it is because there have been so many Ministers in this department that it has not had the proper guidance; but we have had all this hearsay—if you want to call it that—and I would say from these figures that, over only a short period of time, it bears out the criticism that there has been a tremendous turnover. So I would say that there is a lot more than meets the eye.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, there is one thing I would like to get into the record: It is, of course, more difficult for any corrective institution to retain this type of staff than it is for any other department, as far as I am able to ascertain. This is also endemic across the whole world, because in our work there is a great deal of room for differences of opinion; quite often psychologists and psychiatrists, particularly, differ in their views as to what should be done. Some of them feel frustrated if their views are not accepted, and they leave. As a matter of fact, without mentioning any names, there were a few in the number I mentioned who, because of differences of opinion, left The Department of Reform Institutions and went with the addiction research foundation; after being there a short while, they left there as well because of differences of opinion.

As I say, this is not just in our jurisdiction. I have just had handed to me a recent report of the commissioner of penitentiaries for Canada. On page 3 of that report he states:

The situation described in the previous report—

That would be the 1963 report:

—has not changed appreciably as regards recruitment of professionally qualified staff. Half of the establishment for psychologists remains vacant, and group counselling is at a standstill in most institutions due to the lack of adequate professional supervision.

This is the federal system. I am not saying that it would not be a good thing to have this professional staff; and I am not saying it is a good thing that some of them keep moving around, but again I suggest to the hon. member that one of the problems, as I said earlier, is that there is room for differences of opinion; and, as the hon. member knows, I am sure, there is no group of people with greater differences of opinion, and their own views, than psychologists and psychiatrists.

Mr. Trotter: I still think, Mr. Chairman, and I will not belabour this particular point, if there was leadership given, if psychologists and psychiatrists felt that something was going to be done, that the department had some drive—and again I repeat that this is what has been wrong with this department and I hope the new Minister can change it—but there seems to have been no sense of purpose as to where they have been going. Too many of the old theories have been held by those in command. I do hope that the new Minister will give this department a new look.

Still on this vein, I would like to ask: How many psychiatrists do you have in the department now? I think you told us this earlier in your talk, but I just want to make a comparison. How many psychiatrists are with the department now?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Thirteen.

Mr. Trotter: Does that include full time and part time?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Yes.

Mr. Trotter: How many are full time?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: All of our psychiatrists are part time.

Mr. Trotter: All your psychiatrists are part time?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That is right.

Mr. Trotter: Would you take full-time psychiatrists if you could get them?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We certainly would, but of course the hon. member must appreciate the fact that psychiatrists can pretty well write their own terms insofar as salary is concerned. I have spoken to a number of them personally and no matter what salary you offer them they would not want to leave private practice. Many of them feel that the kind of work in which they are engaged in private practice is the most rewarding from their own point of view. They deal with a group of people with whom they become personally acquainted and are able to follow them through a good portion of their lives. They do not find it as interesting to come into institutions where there is merely a fleeting connection with some of those whom they are trying to treat. They have them today, and six or seven months from that day they are gone. They do not feel this gives them sufficient scope.

That is in addition, of course, to the matter of salary. As I pointed out to the hon. member, our part-time psychiatrists get paid $40 to $50 for half a day.

Mr. Trotter: Well, now, if you are going to pay a psychiatrist full time what, approximately, would his pay be?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member I think can judge that, by the fact that we are paying them at the rate of I suppose $20,000 to $25,000 a year.

Mr. Trotter: Would you pay that much if you could get one?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: My inclination would be to say yes, except that I would not give a definite answer to that because it is something we have not had to face. We have been discussing this with psychiatrists and have not had anyone get to the stage where he was interested in considering it and was therefore prepared to talk terms.

So I would not give a definite answer because the hon. member knows I do not control salaries. This is a matter for the civil service commission. If I had a prospective psychiatrist prepared to come in full time I would then discuss it with the civil service commission.

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. Minister if in his attempts to gain psychiatrists, to hire psychologists or psychiatrists—in any of these fields—have you attempted to go abroad to England?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, I can say from my personal experience when I was in the UK I discussed the matter with people who were involved in this work in the permanent Home Secretary's office and there was not a hope. They were having the same problem we were and they were quite prepared, if it was necessary, to outbid somebody else because they were anxious to get more on staff as well.

Mr. L. Troy (Nipissing): I agree with the hon. member for Parkdale that it is a sort of "on-again, off-again Finnegan" with this department. In the short period I have been here there have been three Ministers. I do not know whether it was the purpose of the leader of the government to do some reform in that regard also.

I can just say this: If you pay psychiatrists $25,000 a year to go in your department, you would find there would be all kinds of vacancies then in the Ontario hospitals, because I do not think they get anywhere near that amount.

It is a strange thing, too, Mr. Minister, I believe that the government does subsidize graduates of universities by very substantial amounts to study psychology and psychiatry, but there are very few of them that accept their obligation and spend a certain time in the employ of the government.

Have you got psychologists, too, in addition to psychiatrists?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Oh yes!

Mr. Troy: How many?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Twenty psychologists.

Mr. Troy: Twenty—that is 33. Full time or part time?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Twenty full-time psychologists.

Mr. Troy: And counsellors?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: And 11 social workers.

Mr. Troy: Any counsellors?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, the social workers, plus 60 rehabilitation officers who do counselling work.

Mr. Troy: How many guards of all categories have you?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am sorry—the hon. member is speaking of how many guards?

Mr. Troy: Yes. You know, all the categories: Guards, corporals, sergeants, matrons and so on. How many in your employ?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The total of the staff of the department is about 2,400 to 2,500.

Mr. Troy: This is guards?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: No, total staff. Do you want to know how many guards?

Mr. Troy: I want to find out just how many you have—not primarily in rehabilitation, but those that are guards and matrons—the staff in your institutions.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Correctional officers.

Mr. Troy: Thank you very much for your information, but the number?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am told that you will find that on page 19 of the report. They are outlined here. Captains—

Mr. Troy: One thousand, five hundred and eleven.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: These are adult institutions.

Mr. Troy: 1,511 altogether, and when you take—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, these are other staff as well.

Mr. Troy: Yes, the total number. I believe there would be between 900 and 1,000 guards; or as you call them, correctional officers. It seems to me though that the percentage of those who are actually engaged in rehabilitation of offenders is very small. I guess you employ 10 correctional officers to one counsellor; that is in proportion to those that are engaged definitely in the rehabilitation aspect of your institutions, those who definitely might help to reform a person. I think the percentage of those is quite low. Do you agree?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: This question was asked on Friday and the hon. member will recall my answer at that time was that we consider everyone in the department as doing rehabilitation work. Our custodial officers, if you want to call them that, are trained for this sort of thing. We have on-going in-staff training for them. We encourage them to take courses at the university in this work. They attend seminars, all for the purpose of keeping them up to date so far as what is required in rehabilitation work.

The hon. member will also recall, I am sure that I stated last week that we appreciate the fact that the officer who is in the institution 24 hours a day in close contact with the inmates, so far as adult institutions are concerned, is more important to the offender from a rehabilitative point of view than even treatment staff, because he is with them all the time. This is becoming more and more evident in all correctional jurisdictions. We consider those people as doing rehabilitative work as well.

Mrs. A. Pritchard (Hamilton Centre): Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak to the estimates, particularly as they relate to Mercer reformatory, I do so in accordance with my statement that I would give this House a clear picture of Mercer as I found it on Friday, January 15.

Initially, I was shocked and disturbed at the news reports emanating from the findings of the grand jury. However, the action of the hon. Minister of this department in holding an immediate press conference was commendable and reassuring. With the door of the Mercer thrown wide open, the newsmen were able to see for themselves.

However, it was obvious that this sort of inspection could only deal with surface matters. I felt much more was needed and I was much reassured when the hon. Minister so quickly announced that an investigation would be made. I thought it was only proper for me to wait for this investigating committee to complete its findings. A great number of people jumped on the band wagon, asked for an investigation and then, without waiting for the report, condemned everything about the Mercer reformatory.

It was encouraging, as time went on, to find an occasional voice denying a number of these charges—people who were in a position to know—but it was still important and essential to get the full factual report. We have it now and I studied it with great interest, but before commenting on it I would place on record Mercer as I found it Friday, January 15, without additions or omissions.

First, Mr. Chairman, the building, admittedly, is old. It is immaculately clean. Obviously it should be replaced—probably this is in the future plan. The girls and women were going about their allotted tasks. The atmosphere, to my inexperienced eye, was not belligerent. I respected their unfortunate position. In the kitchen, dinner was being prepared. Four girls were preparing vegetables; baked haddock with parsley sauce was the main dish. In the laundry, washing and ironing was in progress and about 15 girls were at work. I talked to several of these girls. They were polite and ready to talk, and asked where I was from and what I wanted to know. One girl of 19 told me her story—broken home, common-law parents, five foster homes, a baby at 15. This girl also stated that, on being sentenced to Mercer, she was scared, but added it was not so bad.

In the sewing room about 20 were at work, mending or making the various uniforms and other clothing. Some were critical, some resentful, but in the limitations of the surroundings this was not surprising.

I visited the cells, the library, and the basement, especially the detention cells. I did not like them, but behaviour problems must be dealt with and isolation seems to be the prescribed form.

There must be rules and regulations, and they must of necessity be obeyed. The staff at Mercer is expected to follow instructions. I have every compassion and sympathy for the unfortunate inmates, in many instances victims of their environment. However, we must think at the positive level. I suggest that perhaps the reform should start with an examination of the criminal code with respect to the sentences meted out for the various misdemeanors in the light of changing standards.

Of the 80 inmates, 11 were in for drug addiction, 12 for prostitution, 13 for theft, 12 for a breach of The LCA, five for uttering, the rest for other offences. Sentences ranged from one to 17 months in the jail, and from one to 36 months in the reformatory.

Drug addiction is of great concern and I read here a short excerpt from the report in the Canadian Journal of Corrections, April, 1964, by Maurice S. Flint, director of chaplain services, Department of Reform Institutions:

Female addicts are apprehended by law enforcement officers and are usually held at a local jail for several days or weeks for sentencing before being moved to a provincial or federal correctional institution.

After transfer to the Mercer unit they are now appraised medically, psychiatrically, interviewed, psychologically tested, and given up to ten weeks to find freedom from the sense of physical dependence upon the drug. During this period, the addicts are given an opportunity to volunteer for treatment at the OWTC, Brampton. Only those who volunteer and are willing to accept the rigorous routine at the new treatment centre are considered for inclusion in treatment.

It has been found that there are certain factors militating against choice to participate in the treatment process which include: The lack of desire to face the unknown. Treatment in the reformatory is acceptable, but treatment in a unit unknown to them is considered of dubious value.

The custodial setting of the Mercer unit, with its locked doors, separate inmate room, detention room, and the large inmate population, appeals to many narcotic addicts for locks mean security, rooms spell privacy, punishment to some is rewarding, and to know that one can be lost in the crowd is helpful for others.

I talked at some length to the assistant matron, who seemed to be a practical, well-adjusted person, interested in her job. She made some astute observations and suggestions from her experience, which I noted pending the study of the expected report of the advisory committee.

My next visit was to Ingleside at Brampton, a branch of Mercer for first offenders. I lunched there—fish and chips, and chocolate pudding. I toured the building—ranch style and completely open. Here is the modern method and I have nothing but praise for the programme carried out. The girls are kept busy and seem to take pride in their rooms. Typing and bookkeeping courses are available and I saw some good paintings, the work of the girls. I then went over to the alcoholic clinic. The therapy class was in session, and every effort is made to assist these unfortunate women.

Mr. Chairman, I have attempted to give a calm, factual appraisal of Mercer reformatory. I have no wish to oversimplify the profound problems of human behaviour. The need for sympathy and understanding, and a greatly improved rehabilitation programme, is apparent—subject, of course, to finding the qualified staff.

I would remind the hon. members that the Stewart committee in 1954 went into the whole subject of reform institutions in great detail, made recommendations, and arrived at conclusions which were accepted by all parties in this House. With particular reference to the Mercer reformatory and the programme for female offenders, it would seem that with the exception of the replacement of the old buildings, most of the recommendations have been carried out.

At this point, it is interesting to bring to light the fact that in the Stewart report, in its mention of Mrs. Burrows, described her as a very able superintendent. Where were all these apostles of truth, who simply let the grand jurymen's misstatement go by the board when they knew better?

To revert to the report of the hon. Minister's investigating committee, I think this is a most valuable document. It deals with each particular subject in sufficient detail, showing the amount of research done on this and the care taken to ensure that all points were investigated. It would be pointless to repeat what was reported upon, and very time-consuming, too, so I would just like to mention one or two things that struck me in going through this.

The whole atmosphere of the report gives the impression of people who knew what they were doing. The psychologist knew what his job was, and was doing it. The matron, the superintendent, the librarian, the rehabilitation officer, were all obviously on top of their jobs; and, when a detailed survey was made, they proved to be doing them very well.

The next thing of interest was the number of volunteer social agencies we have working with the women in Mercer. They are doing a most worthwhile job; and, in case the hon. members have not read this section of the report in the detail I think it deserves, I would like to repeat the names of these agencies and individual workers who are giving positive expression in their desire to help people in trouble:

Miss G. Simon, Ingles House, Toronto, who represents the Anglican Church, has been visiting Mercer for 20 years, counselling inmates and offering help to them on their release.

Miss Winifred Hunter, of the Hope Harbour home, represents the Baptist Church. She has been working in this field at Mercer since 1953.

Miss E. Hart, of the Fred Victor mission of the United Church of Canada, gives after-care and counselling services.

Mrs. MacLean, a rehabilitation worker with the Legion of Mary, represents the Roman Catholic Church, and seeks to find suitable homes for inmates, and openings for employment.

Another very active group, of which we are all aware, is the Salvation Army, with three separate phases of rehabilitation services offered to the women who leave Mercer. Major Thelma Worthylake works at the courts and in institutions, befriending girls on discharge. Incidentally, Major Worthylake said that she felt the programme at Mercer had something to offer the inmates. She had followed the careers of ex-inmates and knew of many who had been rehabilitated. Brigadier Pike is the superintendent of the Salvation Army receiving home, and Major E. Peacock is in charge of the Salvation Army home on George Street. Neither of these two ladies reported hearing serious criticism from ex-inmates of Mercer.

I would like to repeat what is said in the report, and I quote:

The church workers were unanimous in their appreciation of the co-operation of the superintendent and staff of the Mercer.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that any man who is honest in his own heart will readily believe these workers who are devoting their life to this field and take their judgment, which has been formed over the years, rather than split-minute opinions, arrived at perhaps even before seeing what was going on.

With reference to the Elizabeth Fry society, which unfortunately is the one exception, I have no personal knowledge of their particular problem. I know they do a great deal of valuable work. Perhaps in their zeal for penal reform, following in the footsteps of their worthy founder, they were involved in supporting statements which they now regret. This is what I have read in the news reports. I hope that there will be a much better understanding in the future.

Mr. Chairman, supervising a reform institution must be a terrible job. It is difficult enough keeping order amongst an ordinary group of school children, and even perhaps on occasions in this august assembly. It is even more difficult to make people change their ways.

I think from what I have heard and read in the last few months we owe a debt of gratitude to the staff of Mercer reformatory. I appreciate the problems that are part of trying to rehabilitate the inmates and I would close my remarks, Mr. Chairman, by putting on record my own personal appreciation of the good work they are doing in this most difficult field.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Chairman, just one or two points.

The last speaker just said that the Elizabeth Fry society made remarks for which they are now sorry. I went to the trouble of reading into the record letters made public by the Fry society and I know of no recantation on their part. They have objected to Mercer in the past and in the main, they supported the grand jury report. They did not support everything the grand jury said and I know of no change that they have made, so I think it is most improper for the hon. member to have said that, because there certainly is no public record of which I know where they said that they were sorry.

Again, I do not want to rehash all the statements that were made about Mercer. I might recommend to the hon. Minister though, that if he ever wants another whitewash committee that he get the hon. member for Hamilton Centre as the chairman, because certainly that is what her statement amounts to.

An hon. member: Shame, shame.

Mr. Trotter: Now while we are on the subject of Mercer, I would like to ask the hon. Minister if changes have been made in the medical treatment setup at Mercer? I rather suspect there have been and I would like to know what he has done.

Mrs. Pritchard: Mr. Chairman, if I may reply to the comment made by the hon. member? I read in the press, very clearly, that there was some disagreement among the people in the Elizabeth Fry society as to what was quoted. I certainly based what I said here on what I personally read in the press. I would suggest that if we are going to have a McCarthy chairmanship, perhaps the hon. member would be available.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, I am all for gallantry in this House, but let us deal with the facts that are presented by any member, no matter who the member is. I would suggest that if the hon. member who rose in defence of Mercer really wanted to find both sides of the story, she would have gone first to the one organization that was critical and not taken something from the paper; she would have checked with the organization itself. Instead, she went to all those organizations from which she thought she would get material to support her particular presentation.

The fact of the matter is that the newspaper reports she saw were with regard to one or two people in the Elizabeth Fry society who had differences of opinion. I do not want to get involved in those differences, but they involved personalities and a lot of other things. They are being critical of Elizabeth Fry and they made some comments; but I would suggest to the hon. member for Hamilton Centre that if she wanted to know what the Elizabeth Fry society thought and she wanted to present a balanced view of what she considered to be the case with regard to Mercer, she would have gone to Elizabeth Fry, the one organization which was critical. But she obviously avoided that.

Mrs. Prichard: Mr. Chairman, for the record, I did not go to any. I am reporting from the—

Mr. Singer: The hon. member should have.

Mr. MacDonald: It is obviously a whitewash.

Mr. Trotter: A report appeared in some newspapers, and just for the record I will read a copy of the letter sent by the corresponding secretary of the Elizabeth Fry society to the editor of the Toronto Daily Star, trying to correct what appeared. The letter is dated January 15, 1965, to the Toronto Daily Star. They sent similar letters to the Globe and Mail and to the Telegram.

The letter to the Daily Star reads as follows:

Dear Sir:

The Elizabeth Fry society is extremely puzzled and much disturbed by the report in yesterday's paper, the item headed "Three Fry officers Quit over Mercer Case." On looking through our records we find that Mrs. Hall Humpherson resigned from the society in 1962, two years before the current grand jury report. Mrs. Mason and Mrs. Kelly were not officers nor even members of the board at the time of the resignations.

Our society has a membership of 444 individual members and 24 corporate members, so the resignation of two members, whilst regretted, hardly amounts to a significant percentage.

The report brought in by the grand jury was on their personal inspection of the Mercer reformatory. It was not completely endorsed by our society—see your report, November 6, 1964. Miss Phyllis Haslam, executive director of the Elizabeth Fry society, made a statement to the press at the direction of the board of directors. No reference to personalities was made by the Elizabeth Fry society in this or any other press statement.

Yours truly,

Mrs. N. Moody
Corresponding Secretary
Elizabeth Fry Society

I wish that the hon. member for Hamilton Centre had seen the letter, in the "Letters to the Editor" section. That is the only instance that has come up of which I know. I know of no instance where the Elizabeth Fry society tried to back away from what they said. Quite frankly, from any correspondence that I have read that they sent out to their members, or to those of us who have actually been receiving the correspondence over a long period of time, I think they have been most reasonable. Quite frankly, looking over the record, they have been most accurate.

So again I would like to repeat this question to the hon. Minister: How are they now treating the inmates in the medical setup at Mercer?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, at first, before I forget, that last sentence seems to be equivalent to the one: "Have you beaten your wife lately?"

First, I would like to thank the hon. member for Hamilton Centre for having taken the trouble as she did—

Mr. Troy: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. What right has the hon. member for Hamilton Centre to make that report? I thought that we were on the estimates. It has been the practice in this Legislature that the member for the government side, the Minister, makes his report; then the Opposition leads off, both our own party and the NDP.

This is not a question on the estimates at all. This is somebody that is practically planted to make this statement and enhance reputations in view of what the hon. member for Parkdale and others have said.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, I would agree with the hon. member, if the Opposition had followed this practice in this session and the last one. He must surely appreciate the fact that one of the complaints of the members of this House has been that this practice has not been followed. Time after time, hon. members of the Opposition get up and make long speeches on particular votes. The hon. member must appreciate this, and surely he would not deny the hon. member for Hamilton Centre the same privilege.

Mr. Troy: Why not make it in a Budget speech, then?
